LOMBARDI v. CALIFORNIA STREET CABLE R. CO. (S. F. 977.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 14, 1899.)

JURORS—COMPETENCY—ACTUAL BIAS—REVIEW—NEGLIGENCE—PERSONAL INJURIES—DAM-AGES—LOSS OF PROFITS.

1. Error in disallowing a challenge for bias to a juror is prejudicial, where he was thereupon peremptorily challenged, and the party challenging him, thereafter, by reason of the exhaustion of its peremptory challenges, was compelled to accept jurors whom he otherwise would have challenged peremptorily.

2. A juror, on his voir dire, answered that he knew one of the parties, and had dealt with him for years; that, if compelled to serve, he would go according to the evidence, and be impartial, but that he would not like to have to bring in a verdict against him; that, if the evidence was equally balanced, he would give him the benefit of the doubt, and (the damages being unliquidated), if the party recovered, and there was any dispute as to the amount, he would go for the largest sum. Held, that the juror was disqualified, under Code Civ. Proc. § 602, subd. 7, making the existence of a state of mind evincing bias or enmity for or against either party, in a juror, a ground for challenge.

3. Under an allegation, in a complaint for personal injuries, that plaintiff was a restaurant keeper, and did the cooking, and that by reason of the accident he had been compelled to hire another cook, to his damage in a stated sum, evidence of the estimated profits of plaintiff's business during the time the injuries incapacitated him from working was inadmissible on the question of damages.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Jeanne Lombardi, executrix of the will of Cherubino Lombardi against the California Street Cable Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Henley & Costello, for appellant. J. B. Mhoon and Osgood Putnam, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action was prosecuted in the court below to recover from the defendant, a corporation, damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by its negligence. The plaintiff recovered judgment in the sum of $1,500, and defendant appeals therefrom, and also from an order denying its motion for a new trial. After the appeal was perfected, said Cherubino Lombardi died, testate; and Jeanne Lombardi, the duly-qualified executrix of his will, was thereafter, by an order of this court, substituted as plaintiff and respondent herein.

Appellant contends for reversal: "(1) Because the court should have sustained defendant's challenge of the juror Harris Schemanski for cause; that, because of the refusal of the court to sustain said challenge, defendant was obliged to challenge said juror peremptorily; that all its peremptory challenges were exhausted before the jury was completed, and thereby defendant was compelled to accept jurors whom it would have otherwise challenged peremptorily." Counsel for appellant present the question in two ways, being in doubt as to the proper practice. They first set out in their statement on motion for a new trial the examination of the juror, the ruling of the court denying their challenge, and an exception thereto, and specify said ruling as an error of law; and they also, in support of their motion for a new trial, presented an affidavit of one of them setting out the examination of the juror in full, the ruling of the court, an exception thereto, and stating facts tending to show that appellant was injured thereby, as above stated.

As to the question of practice, it need only be said that the mode of presenting the question must depend upon circumstances. If the facts appear without contradiction, or in such form that but one conclusion can legally be drawn, it involves purely a question of law; otherwise, whether the juror is or is not qualified is a question of fact. Hence the circumstances of each case must determine the manner in which the question should be presented upon appeal. But it does not necessarily follow that, because the court erred either as to the law or the fact, the judgment or order denying a new trial should be reversed because a challenge for cause was improperly disallowed, since the constitution, while guarantying the right to an impartial jury, does not guaranty the right to any particular jury or juror. Asevado v. Orr, 100 Cal. 293, 301, 34 Pac. 777. If, therefore, it should appear, for example, that the court erroneously refused to sustain a challenge for cause, and the complaining party was thereby compelled to challenge the juror peremptorily, and it should be made to appear that a jury was secured without exhausting his peremptory challenges, he could not say that by the erroneous ruling he was compelled to submit his case to a jury that was not wholly impartial. In this case the affidavit of counsel shows that all his peremptory challenges were exhausted before the panel was filled, and that the defendant would have exercised other peremptory challenges, if they had not been exhausted; and these facts stand unquestioned. If, therefore, the court erred in refusing defendant's challenge to the juror Schemanski, the judgment and order should be reversed. People v. Brown, 72 Cal. 392, 14 Pac. 90.

The challenge was made under subdivision 7 of section 602, Code Civ. Proc. That section provides: "Challenges for cause may be taken on one or more of the following grounds: * * * (7) The existence of a state of mind in the juror evincing enmity against or bias to or against either party." The juror, after being questioned as to residence, etc., was asked: "Do you know any reason why you cannot give a fair and impartial trial in this case? A. No, sir,"—and, in reply to a question by defendant's counsel as to whether he ever had any litigation with these railroad companies, answered: "No, sir. I want to state that I know the plaintiff and his family. If that makes any difference, I won't try the case. I had some dealings with the Lombardis for years." In reply to further questions, he testified that he knew them very well for many years; that, "if there was any benefit, I would give him the benefit, I suppose." And again: "Well, I could give a fair trial; only, as I say, I know the parties on the other side, and I would not like to sit on this case. Q. You would not like to have to give a verdict against them? A. Well, I would not like to have to do it. If there is anything in their favor, I would give them the benefit, I suppose. Q. We want to know just why you want to be excused. A. If I sit on a case, I don't want to know either of the parties; I want to be impartial on both sides. Q. But still you could be impartial? A. Well, if I am sworn in, I would have to go according to the evidence. Q. Would you do it? A. Yes, sir; if I was sworn in. Q. And, if you was sworn as a juror, would you go according to the evidence and the instructions of the court? A. Yes, sir. Q. And without prejudice? A. Certainly. I know his family. By counsel for defendant: Q. Suppose the evidence is evenly balanced; do you think you would then find in favor of your friend? A. I suppose so. Q. You feel, then, do you, in sitting as a juror, that you might not be able to do entire justice? A. That is what I mean; yes, sir; if it was equally balanced I would give him the benefit of it." The juror further testified, in substance, that he did not mean he would give the plaintiff a verdict if he did not show that he had a cause of action, but, if it was equal, if there was any benefit to be given he would do it; that he was very well acquainted with the plaintiff and his family, in a business way and personally, "and he has dealt with us for years." The juror was then asked: "Could you hear all the evidence, and weigh it carefully and justly? A. Yes, sir; I could, most certainly."

The juror, after repeating that his long acquaintance with the plaintiff might induce him to find in his favor, was asked by defendant's counsel: "Q. You feel, then, do you, that, owing to your long intimacy with the plaintiff, that it might interfere with the proper discharge of your duties as a juror? Is that the proposition? A. Yes, sir. It requires nine for a verdict. If four would be for five thousand dollars, and four would be for twenty-five hundred, if the verdict would be for the plaintiff I would go to the biggest verdict. If there would be no verdict for him, I would go according to the evidence of the court. Therefore I would rather be excused. Q. You would give the plaintiff the benefit of the doubt, would you? A. Yes, sir; if he was entitled to damages." In reply to questions by the court, he said that, if the testimony was evenly balanced, he would decide for the plaintiff; and, if the testimony was against the plaintiff, he would go against him. Does this examination show "the existence of a state of mind in the juror evincing" a bias in favor of the plaintiff? If so, is this ground of challenge removed or overcome by the statement of the juror that, if the evidence was against the plaintiff, he would go against him, that "he would go according to the evidence of the court," and the other similar statements? That the juror was candid, honest, and sincere in all his statements is beyond question; and any such man, if compelled to serve as a juror, would, to the best of his ability, decide according to the evidence and the instructions of the court. When pressed with questions of that character, he could only reply as he did. If he had said, "No; I will decide for my friend, whatever may be the evidence," he would have shown himself to be a man who would not even try to do right. It may be that some men may be just and impartial towards an enemy, or even remove from their minds and memory and heart all the leanings, inclinations, and desires that so naturally draw them to the side of a friend. But the statute makes no exceptions. It does not add the qualification, "But if the juror will swear that he can impartially try the case notwithstanding his bias toward his friend, or his prejudice against his enemy, the challenge shall be disallowed." It is apparent that such an addition to the statute would make a material change; but can the court, by any line of examination it may see proper to permit, thus change it? Doubts that a juror may entertain as to the weight, effect, or credibility of the evidence are not to be resolved by the ties or persuading influence of friendship, but by the declared and impartial rules of the law. That the juror doubted his ability to impartially consider the evidence and determine which party should prevail is abundantly shown. But, if the jury should find that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, still another question remained,—the amount of compensation to which he should be entitled.

Upon this question he announced that he "would go to the biggest verdict." Suppose the defendant had conceded its liability, and the sole question for the jury was to ascertain the amount of damages the defendant should pay; would this juror have been accepted by the court, even in the absence of a challenge? or, if challenged, would the court have hesitated to sustain it? Yet the defendant was as much entitled to an impartial jury upon this branch of the case as the other, and should not be compelled to submit its case to a juror who, before he heard the evidence, declared that, if the plaintiff should be entitled to recover, he "would go to the biggest verdict."

Respondent contends, however, that the evidence heard upon the trial of this challenge was conflicting, and that, therefore, the finding of the court cannot be disturbed. The only evidence heard upon the trial of the challenge was the testimony of the juror. As to whether the juror was biased in favor of the plaintiff, there was not even the shadow of a conflict or contradiction; and the only controversy was as to whether, notwithstanding his bias, he could impartially try the case,—a matter about which the juror could only express an opinion, and which could not be affected by its expression. The right to unbiased and unprejudiced jurors is an inseparable and inalienable part of the right to a trial by jury guaranteed by the constitution. Upon this proposition all the authorities agree. As was said by Sir Edward Coke (1 Coke, 157b) in discussing the right of trial by jury, under the head of "Propter affectum," "For all which the rule of law is that he must stand indifferent as he stands unsworn." The rule excluding jurors for actual bias in civil cases must not be confounded with the rule stated in section 1076 of the Penal Code in relation to opinions founded or based "upon public rumor, statements in public journals, or common notoriety," and which permits the acceptance of the juror "provided it appears to the court upon his declaration, under oath or otherwise, that he can and will, notwithstanding such an opinion, act impartially and fairly upon the matters to be submitted to him." This is the only important statutory exception to the common-law rule excluding jurors upon the ground of actual bias, and was enacted because of apparent necessity.

Appellant contends that the court erred in admitting certain evidence as to the profits plaintiff was realizing from his business at the time of the accident, and in giving to the jury certain instructions on that subject. The complaint, after alleging the cause and manner of the accident, and the character of the injuries received, alleged that thereby he had suffered damage in the sum of $10,000. The complaint then proceeded as follows: "(7) That plaintiff has been for a period of three months confined and sick, owing to said injuries, and has been compelled to employ nurses and physicians during all of said time, and up to the date hereof, to his damage in the sum of six hundred dollars. (8) That plaintiff has been unable to attend to his business on account of said injury, and has been compelled thereby to hire said business and work done during all of the time since said accident, to his damage in the sum of two hundred and thirty dollars, and will be compelled to hire said work done in the future,"—and prays judgment for $10,830. The accident occurred on March 31, 1895. It appeared from the testimony of the plaintiff, without objection, that at the date of the accident he was engaged in the restaurant business on Pine street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets, with his partner, Jules Semeria, each having an equal share in the business; that plaintiff was the chief cook, and that Semeria attended to the other part of the business; that after the accident he could not work, because he could not use his arm. The plaintiff was then asked by his counsel: "What was the income you were making from your business in March, 1895?" Defendant objected on the ground that it was not an element of damage, and therefore immaterial and irrelevant. The objection was overruled, and an exception reserved. The witness answered, "About two hundred dollars per month," and explained that that was his share of the profits after all expenses were paid. Jules Semeria, plaintiff's partner, called by plaintiff, was asked, in chief: "Can you state what the net proceeds of this business were, on the average, for some months prior to this accident?" Defendant objected that the question was immaterial and irrelevant, and not authorized by any allegation in the complaint. The court overruled the objection and defendant excepted. The witness answered that it was, on an average, $400 per month. These rulings were erroneous. Waiving the question whether, in some possible case, the profits of the plaintiff's business may be shown to be an element in the computation of damages in actions of this character, when properly pleaded, it must be clear, as a general proposition, that such profits cannot be looked to in estimating the plaintiff's damages. A business such as that conducted by the plaintiff and his partner includes capital as well as the services of other people, as shown by the evidence, and may be conducted without the personal attention or services of either or both of the owners. The complaint alleged that plaintiff was compelled to hire another to take his place and do his work, and alleged his damage because thereof to be $230; and that covered all the time from the date of the accident to the filing of his complaint. What he paid represented the value of his time. There is no allegation that the business suffered, or was otherwise less profitable, because of his inability to do the work he had formerly done. The authorities are not agreed as to the extent to which the evidence may go, in the absence of allegations as to special damages sustained by the plaintiff; but I know of no exception to the rule that where the plaintiff has specially alleged a particular damage resulting from the injury, and the amount of such damage, he is concluded by his allegation, and, having alleged the value of his time as the basis of estimating his pecuniary loss, he cannot give evidence of the net profits resulting from the business in which he was engaged. There are many cases in which it has been held that, without a special averment, the plaintiff may show that he was incapacitated from attending to "his business," or "his ordinary business," but that such evidence was admissible because it tended to show the serious character of the injury, and not for the purpose of showing special damage. Neither in Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 574, 22 Pac. 266, nor in Curtiss v. Railroad Co., 20 Barb. 282, cited in the former case, did the instructions commented upon touch upon the question of the loss of profits or the extent of profits resulting from plaintiff's business; nor was that question discussed by the court in either case, although "loss of time" was considered. In Silsby v. Car Co., 95 Mich. 209, 54 N. W. 761, it was claimed that the court below "erred in permitting the plaintiff to show, as an element of damage, that he had been obliged to close his shop, and further to show what the profits of his shop had been in the past." It was held that this was error. The court said: "The declaration did not count specially upon this alleged loss of profits, and the case falls within Joslin v. Ice Co., 50 Mich. 516, 15 N. W. 887. Furthermore, the loss of profits in conducting a business involving the labor of others is not a necessary consequence of personal injury to the plaintiff. The extent of his recovery upon this ground would be what his services were worth in the conduct of such a business as he was engaged in," citing 3 Suth. Dam. 268; Marks v. Railroad Co., 14 Daly, 61; Masterton v. Village of Mt. Vernon, 58 N. Y. 391; Johnson v. Railway Co., 52 Hun, 111, 4 N. Y. Supp. 848; Bierbach v. Rubber Co., 54 Wis. 208, 11 N. W. 559. Neither in the offer or admission of this evidence, nor in the instructions to the jury, was there any limitation upon the effect of this evidence; and we must therefore assume that it was considered by the jury in estimating the damages awarded to the plaintiff.

In this connection we would refer to instruction No. 15, in which the jury were told that in estimating the damages to be assessed, while they could not take into account the wealth or poverty of the plaintiff, they could take into account the character and extent of the business in which he was engaged, together with the incapacity caused by the injury to transact such business. Under the allegations of special damage set out in the complaint this instruction was misleading and erroneous, for reasons hereinbefore stated.

Some other exceptions to rulings upon questions of evidence were reserved by the defendant, but as they do not go to any vital point, and may not be presented upon another trial, they need not be specially noticed. I advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; PRINGLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

TUFFREE et ux. v. STEARNS RANCHOS CO. (L. A. 387.)

ABATEMENT—TRANSFER OF INTEREST—DEATH—APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 385, provides that an action does not abate by the death of a party, or by the transfer of an interest therein, and that in the case of a transfer of interest the action may be continued in the name of the original party, or the court may allow the person to whom the transfer is made to be substituted. Held that, where a person to whom one of several defendants in an action to quiet title has transferred his interest, though he has actual knowledge of the suit, does not have himself made a defendant until after an appeal from a judgment has been decided on the merits and the case remitted for entry of judgment in accordance with such decision, he is bound by the judgment so entered, and cannot have it amended as to his interest on the ground that his vendor having died after the judgment appealed from was rendered, but before notice of appeal was served, due service of such notice having been accepted by a firm of attorneys for all defendants, the supreme court obtained no jurisdiction as to the interest that had been transferred.

2. Where a judgment has been entered in the lower court in accordance with directions in a mandate of the supreme court, a purchaser of the land involved, who has been substituted as defendant, may appeal from the judgment, and by bill of exceptions bring before the court the merits of the appeal.

In bank.

Action by J. K. Tuffree and wife against Moses Hopkins and others to quiet title. The Stearns Ranchos Company, having been substituted as defendant, appeals from an order refusing to amend a judgment entered in pursuance of a decision on a former appeal (41 Pac. 806, 108 Cal. 670) from said judgment, from an order refusing to correct certain file marks, and also from an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

For opinion in department, see 54 Pac. 826.

GAROUTTE, J. Moses Hopkins, claiming to own an interest in a tract of land, was joined with others as a party defendant in an action to quiet title. Bicknell & White appeared as attorneys for all the defendants. During the litigation, and five years prior to judgment, Hopkins transferred his interest in the property to the Stearns Ranchos Company. After judgment, and prior to an appeal therefrom by plaintiffs, Hopkins died. Thereafter Bicknell & White accepted notice of appeal in behalf of all the defendants, and the case was heard and decided in this court upon its merits. Upon the return of the remittitur to the lower court a judgment was entered in accordance with the directions therein contained. Whereupon the Stearns Ranchos Company, by E. W. McGraw, its attorney, having had itself substituted as a party defendant, moved to amend the judgment as to the interest represented under the name of Moses Hopkins, upon the ground that this court failed to obtain jurisdiction over the Hopkins interest in the realty by reason of the fact of his death at the time the notice of appeal was served upon Bicknell & White. No substitution of any party defendant in lieu of Hopkins was ever made until the substitution of the Ranchos Company, as stated. The present appeal is now prosecuted from the order of the trial court refusing to amend the judgment as prayed for. The Northam interest in the real estate involved in this litigation stands generally in the same position as the Hopkins interest, at least as far as the law involved is concerned; and we refrain from setting out the facts as to that interest for this reason.

Section 385 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads: "An action or proceeding does not abate by the death or any disability of a party, or by the transfer of any interest therein, if the cause of action survive or continue. * * * In case of any other transfer of interest the action or proceeding may be continued in the name of the original party, or the court may allow the person to whom the transfer is made to be substituted in the action or proceeding." This provision of the law was construed in Walker v. Felt, 54 Cal. 386, where the court said: "Section 385 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that in case of any transfer of interest the action may be continued in the name of the original party, or the court may allow the person to whom the transfer is made to be substituted in the action. Under that section it was the right of the successors in interest in this case to prosecute this action in one of these forms. The party who had transferred his interest divested himself of any power to control the action. He could not dismiss it, because his successors had a right to have it continued. The validity of the order of dismissal in this case rests solely upon the consent of the original plaintiff, given ten years after he had transferred his interest in the action. As he had no right to interfere with the action, the court, on being advised of that, should have vacated the order based upon it." In Malone v. Mining Co., 93 Cal. 384, 23 Pac. 1063, this court said: "Under this section, if property is conveyed during the pendency of litigation in regard to it, the grantee may thereafter continue to prosecute or defend the case in the name of his grantor, or may cause himself to be substituted in his place." In Plummer v. Brown, 64 Cal. 430, 1 Pac. 704, it is declared: "After transferring his entire interest in the subject of the controversy, the defendant was only nominally a party to the action. The real parties in interest were his grantees. The entry of his default affected them, not him."

It is quite apparent from these authorities that the statute contemplates the prosecution or defense of the action by the transferee of the interest sold; and he may prosecute or defend in his own name by obtaining an order of substitution, or he may prosecute or defend in the name of the original party. That the legislature has the power to say that an action may be prosecuted or defended in the name of one not the real party in interest, we have no doubt. Hopkins, at the time of his death, having no interest in the property, his executor or administrator was not a proper party to be substituted as defendant. It therefore follows that the action either should have continued in his name, or his vendee should have been substituted. Yet the statute and the cases cited plainly say that the vendee has the right to exercise the option of substitution, or continue the litigation in the name of the original party. If the original party is a mere nominal party, and the vendee is the real party in interest,—if the nominal party has no right to conduct the litigation upon any particular lines as against the wishes of the real party in interest; if the real party in interest, the vendee, has the control of the litigation, and this is decided by the cases cited from the reports of this state,—then it would seem to be wholly immaterial whether the original party to the action lives or dies. For the purposes of the litigation he is a mere dummy anyhow,—a John Doe alias; at least, this must be true aside from any question of costs, and, as to those matters, certainly the real defendant has no reason to complain. Possibly the opposing party, for reasons readily perceptible, might be desirous of having the real party in interest substituted as a party to the record; but if such party is willing to have matters stand statu quo, and the real party in interest is content to have matters proceed upon the old lines, we see no legal bar to the practice. The real plaintiff or defendant simply uses the name of another in the further prosecution or defense of the action. The Stearns Ranchos Company, the vendee of Hopkins, knew all about the pending litigation. A lis pendens was filed. Actual notice of the litigation was before it. By affidavit it is admitted that it had "casual notice" of the appeal to this court. The attorney of the company was E. W. McGraw, who was also a director of the corporation. He is now the attorney representing the corporation defendant upon this appeal. Prior to the first judgment in the trial court he assisted in the taking of depositions to be used upon that trial, representing some of the defendants. He filed a petition for rehearing in this court, signing himself as counsel for the defendants. The Ranchos Company was the owner of the interests of all the defendants before the final judgment was rendered in the trial court, and

It is quite apparent that it knew all about this litigation from start to finish, at least as to all material and substantial matters. Under these conditions, this conduct upon the part of the Ranchos Company can only mean that it defended this action in the name of Hopkins from the time it became his vendee, and it should not now be heard to the contrary. Knowing that Bicknell & White were appearing at all times and upon all occasions for all the defendants, we are confirmed in the belief that these attorneys, as to the question now before us, were representing the Ranchos Company in this litigation. In representing Hopkins they were but representing the company. The Ranchos Company, in matters material to the appeal, was a party to the action under the name of Hopkins, and, of necessity, Hopkins' death was wholly an immaterial matter as in any way changing the aspect or situation of the litigation. Pedlar v. Stroud, 116 Cal. 462, 48 Pac. 371, and cases akin to it, do not bear upon the proposition here under consideration.

2. Defendant appeals from the judgment rendered by the trial court in conformity with the directions of this court. It is now claimed upon the part of respondents that upon such an appeal the only question which may be heard is, has the trial court entered judgment in accordance with this court's mandate? Defendant has also appealed from an order denying his motion for a new trial. This motion was made after the judgment was entered in the trial court in accordance with this court's direction. It is insisted by respondent that there is no such practice as taking an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial under those circumstances. Brady v. Feisel, 54 Cal. 180, supports this contention; but, in view of the fact that the appeal from the judgment raises substantially all the questions which might be brought here upon appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial, we pass without consideration the soundness of the doctrine laid down in Brady v. Feisel. In Klauber v. Car Co., 98 Cal. 107, 32 Pac. 876, this question as to the right of appeal from a judgment such as is presented in the case before us was given careful consideration, and the reasons for the conclusion there arrived at are set forth in full. These reasons are persuasive and most convincing. Upon the doctrine of that case it must be held that in the present case the Stearns Ranchos Company had the right to appeal from the judgment here attacked, and bring before this court the merits of such an appeal by way of a bill of exceptions. In Randall v. Duff, 107 Cal. 36, 40 Pac. 20, it was said that an appeal to this court from a judgment rendered by a trial court in conformity with the directions of the appellate court was allowable in order that it might be determined whether or not the lower court had entered the judgment ordered. Such is undoubtedly the law; but that case cannot be held to limit the doctrine declared in Klauber v. Car Co.

The single point made by appellant upon the appeal, aside from an unimportant ruling upon the admission of certain evidence, relates to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of fact. We have examined with care the evidence bearing upon the particular findings to which appellant's specifications have been addressed. In all material parts we are satisfied, from an examination of the record, that the evidence is sufficient to support the findings of fact. We see no substantial merit in the appeal from the order refusing to correct the file marks upon the court's decree. For the foregoing reasons the respective orders refusing to amend the judgment and correct the file marks are affirmed. The judgment and order denying a new trial are also affirmed.

OWEN v. POMONA LAND & WATER CO.

(Supreme Court of California. April 27, 1899.)

APPEAL—STAY OF EXECUTION—BOND—SUFFICIENCY —VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

1. Proceedings on a judgment are stayed by the filing of a sufficient undertaking on appeal from an order denying a new trial.

2. A judgment in favor of a vendee of land, who rescinds his contract, that he recover the amounts paid on the price, and the value of his improvements, and declaring such sum to be a lien on the land, which is ordered sold, and the proceeds applied to payment of the amount found due, the clerk being directed to docket a judgment for the deficiency, is not a judgment directing payment of money within Code Civ. Proc. § 942, providing that an appeal from such a judgment should not stay execution unless appellant execute a bond in double the amount named in the order, so that proceedings are stayed by filing the ordinary undertaking without an additional stay bond.

3. Code Civ. Proc. § 945, providing that, to secure a stay of proceedings on a judgment directing the sale of real property, appellant must execute a bond for damages by waste, and for the value of the use of the property pending appeal, does not apply where a vendee of land in possession rescinds and recovers judgment for the amounts paid on the price, and for the value of his improvements, for which amounts the land is directed to be sold.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county.

Action by John A. Owen against the Pomona Land & Water Company. From a decree for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appealed, pending which plaintiff issued execution, and sold the property designated in the decree. Defendant moves to set aside the sale and quash the execution. Granted.

John S. Chapman and A. P. Nichols, for appellant. Otis & Gregg and John A. Owen, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action by the vendee against his vendor to recover monies paid in pursuance of a contract for the sale of land and certain shares of water stock, and for damages. The plaintiff took possession of the land at the date of the contract, and has ever since retained possession. By the judgment of the superior court it was decreed that the contract had been rightfully rescinded by plaintiff, that it should be annulled, and that plaintiff should have judgment for the amount of his payments under the contract and the value of his improvements on the land, in all about $8,000. This sum was declared to be a lien upon the land described in the contract and upon the water stock. By further provisions of the decree the land and stock were ordered to be sold, and the proceeds, after payment of costs and expenses, applied to the payment of the amount found due to the plaintiff. In case of deficiency the clerk was directed to docket a judgment for the unpaid balance. In respect to all these provisions the decree follows very closely and exactly the terms of the ordinary decree in cases of foreclosure of mortgages. In due time the defendant appealed from this judgment, and subsequently took a separate appeal from an order denying its motion for a new trial. Each appeal was regularly perfected by the filing of a proper undertaking in the sum of $300, but no separate undertaking to stay the proceedings was given on either appeal. Subsequently the appeal from the judgment was dismissed for failure to file the transcript in time, but the appeal from the order is still pending. After the entry of the order of dismissal of the appeal from the judgment, but before the issuance of the remittitur, the plaintiff took out an execution or order of sale under which the sheriff sold the property described in the decree, the plaintiff becoming the purchaser. The appellant now moves to vacate and set aside said sale and to quash the execution upon the ground that they were in violation of the right to a stay of proceedings secured by the appeals from the judgment and order denying a new trial.

No question is made as to the power and duty of this court to grant the relief sought by the motion if all proceedings on the judgment were stayed by the appeal from the order denying a new trial. Boob v. Hall, 105 Cal. 413, 38 Pac. 977; Hill v. Finnigan, 54 Cal. 493; Kreling v. Kreling, 116 Cal. 458, 48 Pac. 383; Brown v. Rouse, 115 Cal. 619, 47 Pac. 601; Williams v. Borgwardt, 115 Cal. 617, 47 Pac. 594; Swasey v. Adair, 88 Cal. 203, 26 Pac. 83; Hubbard v. Bank, 120 Cal. 632, 52 Pac. 1070. But the respondent contends, in the first place, that neither the appeal from the judgment nor the appeal from the order operated as a stay, because there was no stay bond, and, if this point is ruled against him, he further contends that it was only the appeal from the judgment that would have stayed execution, and, since that appeal was dismissed before the execution was taken out, the fact that the remittitur had not been issued upon the order of dismissal amounts at most to an irregularity in the proceeding, and is not a sufficient ground for setting aside the sale.

It will not be necessary to consider the second branch of this proposition further than to say that it is now the settled law of this state that proceedings on the judgment can be, and are, stayed by the filing of a sufficient undertaking on appeal from an order denying a new trial. Fulton v. Hanna, 40 Cal. 280; Tompkins v. Montgomery, 116 Cal. 123, 47 Pac. 1006.

The only question, therefore, left for determination is whether the ordinary undertaking on appeal in the sum of $300 was sufficient to stay proceedings on this judgment. If this is not one of the cases provided for in sections 942, 943, 944, or 945 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the $300 bond was all that was required to stay proceedings. Id. § 949. But respondent claims that the judgment here is one which "directs the payment of money," within the meaning of section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that there should have been an undertaking in twice the amount found due from defendant. This claim is based upon the following language in the first part of the judgment: "That said plaintiff do have and recover of said defendant, Pomona Land and Water Company, the amount of the several sums of money hereinafter named," etc. This language, considered by itself, certainly does sustain the contention of the respondent. But it cannot be taken by itself, disconnected with other parts of the decree; and, when the whole decree is read together, it is found to be in substance an ordinary decree of foreclosure, in which certain property is ordered sold, and its proceeds applied upon an ascertained debt, the balance remaining due, if any, to be docketed as a personal judgment. The provision for the sale of the property and the application of the proceeds is not merely a cumulative remedy given for the enforcement of an ordinary money judgment. It is a part, and an essential part, of the only procedure for the enforcement of the judgment, and no execution could have issued against other property than that mentioned in the decree until it had been sold, its proceeds applied, and the deficiency ascertained. It is not necessary to decide whether the superior court could have rendered a personal judgment in this case for the full amount found due the plaintiff,—a judgment enforceable by an ordinary execution against the goods of defendant,—and could, at the same time, have decreed the enforcement of a specific lien upon the property described in the contract of sale. It is sufficient to say that, on a proper construction of the decree, nothing of the kind was attempted. This being so, the case cannot be distinguished from a number of other cases in which it has been held by this court that the provisions of section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure did not apply. Kreling v. Kreling, 116 Cal. 460, 48 Pac. 383; Painter v. Painter, 98 Cal. 626, 33 Pac. 483;

Boob v. Hall, 105 Cal. 413, 38 Pac. 977. The judgment here is, in fact, one directing the sale of real property, and would be governed by the provisions of section 945 of the Code of Civil Procedure, if they were applicable. If the defendant had been in possession of the real property, the bond to stay proceedings should have secured to the respondent the damages by waste, and the value of the use and occupation; but, the plaintiff being himself in the exclusive possession, these clauses of the statute have no application, and, the case not being one of mortgage, no undertaking for payment of the deficiency was required. On the whole it appears that this is a case not covered by any provision of the statute for the filing of an additional stay bond, and proceedings on the judgment were therefore stayed by the ordinary undertaking on appeal. The motion to vacate and set aside the sale and to quash the execution herein is granted, and it is ordered accordingly.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—CERTIFICATES OF DEPOSIT—TRANSFER—JUDGMENT OF DISMISSAL—VACATION—EVIDENCE—DEPOSITIONS.

1. A transfer of property by an insolvent judgment debtor to his wife without consideration, made after an order for his examination in supplementary proceedings had been served, and on the day before that set for the hearing, is fraudulent.

2. The day before the one set for his examination in supplementary proceedings, which was the last day in February, a judgment debtor gave money to his wife, who deposited it in a bank, which issued to her a negotiable certificate of deposit. Several days thereafter the creditor commenced an action to set aside the transfer of the money, and on the trial a witness testified that about February or March the debtor had given witness the certificate, and thereafter the latter had turned it over to another. Held, that a finding was justified that the certificate was transferred before commencement of the action.

3. On the entry of judgment on an order of plaintiff dismissing the action before an answer seeking affirmative relief has been filed, the court loses jurisdiction, and cannot thereafter vacate the judgment on application of defendants, and consolidate such action with another.

4. Where neither the parties nor the issues in two different actions are identical, depositions taken in one are inadmissible in the other.

5. Depositions taken in one action are inadmissible in another as against a party who had no opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county.

Action by Henry Wolters and others against Lena Rossi and others. From a judgment for defendants and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The original complaint herein was filed March 15, 1895. On April 1, 1895, the summons was filed showing proof of service on the defendants Lena Rossi and C. Rossi on March 20th, and on the defendant the Farmers' Bank on March 18th.

Geo. B. Graham and Frank H. Short, for appellants. H. H. Welch, L. L. Cory, and A. M. Drew, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. These appeals are from the judgment and from the order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial. Defendant C. Rossi was a judgment debtor of plaintiffs. On January 29, 1895, an execution issued upon the judgment of plaintiffs was returned nulla bona. On the 23d day of February following plaintiffs instituted proceedings supplementary to execution, and secured an order for the examination of C. Rossi and his wife, the defendant Lena Rossi. The examination was held upon February 28, 1895, before a referee. Rossi and his wife were examined. Upon the examination it was disclosed that upon the day preceding (February 27th) Lena Rossi had obtained from her husband, through the Bank of Central California, the sum of $1,652.19, and that she had deposited this money in the Farmers' Bank at Fresno, taking a certificate of deposit negotiable in form in her name. The certificate of deposit bore date March 1, 1895. Upon March 2, 1895, the court made its order restraining the Farmers' Bank of Fresno and Lena Rossi from making any transfer, use, or disposition of the moneys represented by the certificate of deposit until further action of the court in the premises. Upon the same day this restraining order was served upon the defendants, and, a second execution having been issued upon the judgment, the bank was garnished. Leave was given to the plaintiffs to prosecute an action against the defendants Rossi and the bank to avoid the gift of the moneys by the husband to his wife, as being in fraud of the rights of plaintiffs, judgment creditors of the husband, and this action for the indicated purpose was promptly commenced. In addition to the facts which have already been recited, the complaint averred the gift by Rossi to his wife of the money in question, his insolvency at the time of the gift, and charged that the certificate of deposit from the date of its issue and delivery to the wife, Lena Rossi, until the commencement of the present action, was in the possession and control of the defendants Lena Rossi and C. Rossi, and that they remained in full ownership and control of the certificate and of the money. It was also alleged that the gift was made with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the plaintiffs. Upon the trial the defendants offered no evidence. The facts proved or admitted were that plaintiffs were judgment creditors of C. Rossi, and that their judgment was in full force and effect; that defendant Rossi was insolvent; that an execution issued upon plaintiffs' judgment had been returned nulla bona; that, after service upon him of the order of examination upon the day preceding the date upon which the examination was held, he had given to his wife, without valuable consideration, the sum of $1,652.19, which she had deposited in the Farmers' Bank, taking a certificate of deposit therefor, as above stated. The court, however, found that this gift to the wife was not made in fraud of the rights of any of the creditors of C. Rossi, nor with any intent upon the part of C. Rossi to hinder, delay, or defraud those creditors.

As the law of this state now stands, the undisputed facts in this case would conclusively establish a fraud against the creditors. See section 3442, Civ. Code, as amended in 1895. At the time of the commencement of this action, however, such a transfer by an insolvent debtor was not deemed conclusively fraudulent, and whether or not the transfer was made with a fraudulent intent was a question of fact for the judge or jury. Upon that state of the law respondents contend that the finding of the court is fully justified, and they argue that our decisions declare that conclusive evidence of fraudulent intent upon the part of the donor or grantor is not established by proof merely that he was insolvent, and that the grant or gift was made without valuable consideration. But an analysis of the cases upon which respondents rely will demonstrate that they lend little solace or support to the proposition for which they contend. The Code and fraudulent conveyance act at the time when those cases were decided, and at the time when this suit was commenced, declared that no transfer or charge could be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration. In McFadden v. Mitchell, 54 Cal. 628, there was under review an instruction which was in direct violation of the Code provision, and which declared that, if there was no valuable consideration for the transfer, it was void. While condemning this instruction, as of needs it must, this court said: "Inadequacy of price and insolvency of a debtor may be circumstances more or less potential in the determination of fraud as a question of fact, but failure of consideration is not in itself sufficient to justify a court in finding fraud as matter of law." In Jamison v. King, 50 Cal. 132, it is said: "Doubtless the concurrence of insolvency on the part of the assignor, and inadequacy of price, would be a circumstance strongly tending to establish fraud, but inadequacy or failure of consideration is not of itself sufficient." In Threlkel v. Scott, 89 Cal. 351, 26 Pac. 879, the discussion was upon the necessity of alleging a fraudulent intent in the complaint, and it was held to be an indispensable averment, since, as says this court arguendo: "The fraudulent intent which is itself a question of fact cannot be inferred from the facts stated in the complaint * * * for the further reason that a voluntary conveyance by an insolvent debtor is not necessarily fraudulent and void as to creditors." In Windhaus v. Bootz, 92 Cal. 617, 28 Pac. 557, the refusal of the trial court to set aside as fraudulent and void a deed of gift of real property, made by the defendant to his wife more than five years before execution upon the judgment was returned unsatisfied, was upheld by this court principally upon the ground that the evidence failed to show that at the time of the gift the defendant was insolvent. In Knox v. Moses, 104 Cal. 502, 38 Pac. 318, the trial court found that a voluntary conveyance by Bray, an insolvent, had been made without fraudulent intent, and upon a review of the evidence this court upheld the finding. But in that case the evidence in support of the transfer showed that, at the time the deed was made, Bray, the grantor, was engaged in business affairs of large moment; that his assets and liabilities each approximated $700,000; that he did not know that he was in an insolvent condition; that the deed was to land of trifling value, as compared with his assets; that he was residing with his family upon land of greater value, which he did not homestead, and which passed to his creditors; and that he carried on vast business enterprises for three years and a half after the date of the transfer. In Bull v. Bray, 89 Cal. 286, 26 Pac. 873, the court made certain findings, but failed to find the ultimate fact as to the fraudulent or nonfraudulent intent with which the conveyance was made, and this court held that such a finding was necessary, and that the ultimate fact of a fraudulent intent did not necessarily and conclusively follow from the facts found, saying: "Bray did actually defraud Bull in the making of the deeds by depriving him of property which would otherwise have been applied to the satisfaction of the execution; but it does not necessarily and conclusively follow therefrom that the intent was present in his mind to defraud, or that in making the transfer he may not have been actuated by the most honest motives." In that case the facts appeared as in the case of Knox v. Moses, just preceding. And a most significant and persuasive fact against the argument of fraudulent intent was the finding of the court that at the time of the conveyance Bray was not aware of his insolvency. In the concurring opinion of Chief Justice Beatty in that case it is said: "When an insolvent debtor makes a gift of his property to a donee of his own selection, there can be but one result, so far as his creditors are concerned. They are necessarily deprived of what is lawfully theirs, and the law ought to pronounce such a transaction ipso facto fraudulent and void as to them." Five years after this utterance the legislature, in consonance with it, has so declared. Still further it is said: "There should be no hesitation in stating and in everywhere insisting upon the proposition that a voluntary conveyance by an insolvent debtor is prima facie proof of a fraudulent intent, which throws upon the donee the necessity of rebutting the inference of fraud."

Such a rule may be adopted without doing the slightest violence either to the letter or to the spirit of section 3442 of the Civil Code. By that portion of the section which we have been considering it is declared merely that a transfer cannot be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration, and this court has said, as logically it was compelled to say under that law, that the establishment of the fact of insolvency, with the fact of a voluntary gift, did not conclusively prove the fraudulent intent. In some of the cases above adverted to are shown circumstances which were deemed sufficient to overcome the presumption or prima facie showing of fraudulent intent which is thus established. For example, in Bull v. Bray, supra, while the gift was a voluntary gift, and made by an insolvent, the other facts in evidence, that the insolvent did not know of his insolvency, that he was a man of large business affairs, and that he conducted these affairs for years after the date of the gift, were sufficient to overcome the prima facie showing. In Jamison v. King, supra, the gift partook of the nature of a gift causa mortis, and was not wholly without consideration, but was made, at least in part, in cancellation of a pre-existing debt. So, while the fact that a voluntary gift was made by an insolvent was not, under our law, sufficient to establish conclusively the fraudulent character of the gift,—conclusively, in the sense that no circumstances of explanation or extenuation would suffice to change, in the eye of the law, the character of the transaction (which is the present situation under the Code),—it has not been held, and never could reasonably have been held, that the unexplained fact that an insolvent makes a voluntary gift, whereby his creditors are in fact defrauded, did not compel a recognition of a fraudulent intent.

In the case at bar we have, however, not alone the unexplained circumstance of a gift made by an insolvent without consideration, but we have the added fact that the defendant made the gift to his wife after an order of examination had been served upon him, and upon the day before he was called upon to testify under that order. No other conclusion can reasonably follow these unexplained facts than that the gift was made with the intent to defraud the rights of the plaintiff creditors, and, in this view of the evidence, the finding to the contrary is wholly unsupported.

Another of the findings of the court assailed by appellant is to the effect that the certificate of deposit was not continuously after its issuance, and was not, at the date of the commencement of this action, in the possession or control of the defendants Rossi, or either of them, and that the ownership thereof had been transferred to other persons. The importance of this finding is at once apparent when it is considered that the purpose of the action is to obtain a judgment that the $1,652 represented by the certificate is the money and property of C. Rossi, applicable to the payment and satisfaction of plaintiffs' judgment, and that a decree is sought ordering the Rossis and the Bank of Fresno to apply the money to this end. It is well settled that a certificate of deposit such as was issued in this case is a negotiable instrument, which affords a continuing security to the holder. It is not regarded as overdue and dishonored until after presentation for payment. The date of its maturity is the date of such presentation. "The certificate is payable when payment is demanded by the party entitled to receive the money, and who avouches the fact by producing the instrument with evidence of title." Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 1707. Where money has been placed on general deposit in a bank, and a negotiable certificate of deposit has been issued to the depositor for the amount, there is nothing left in the possession of the bank belonging to the depositor upon which an attachment issued against his property can fasten. The bank by the certificate become liable, not to refund to the depositor the specific money deposited, but to pay the amount of the deposit to the holder of the certificate, whoever he may be, on presentation. McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 365. Equity, however, may restrain the transfer of such negotiable instruments, and order them subjected to such disposition as it may deem just, but before this course can afford the slightest relief it is apparent that the restraining order must be served upon the present holder of the instrument. Only so may the difficulty be met, for the promise of the bank is out, and it is a promise to pay the holder of the certificate upon presentation, and this obligation is unaffected by any litigation in which the instrument is involved, unless the instrument and the party in possession of it are before the court. Plaintiff in this case met the difficulty by his averment that the certificate of deposit remained at all times in the ownership and possession, custody, and control of the defendants Rossi. The court found to the contrary. The only evidence upon the subject is that of the witness B. T. Scott. He testified: "About the month of February or March" Mr. and Mrs. Rossi drove up to his store, and gave him the certificate of deposit indorsed by Mrs. Rossi, and told him to collect it if he chose and use it in his business. Afterwards he was instructed to turn the certificate over to W. Rigby for collection, and he did so. He did not know upon the trial where the certificate was, nor what had become of it. This being all the evidence in the case upon the question, it is clear that at the time of the trial the outstanding certificate might have passed through a dozen hands, and might be held by a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice. Certain it is that the Rossis had parted with the custody and control of it, and that any bona fide holder without notice would be entitled to receive from the bank the amount of money named in it. This evidence, then, supports the finding of the court. The restraining order and garnishment were served upon the bank, as in the case of McMillan v. Richards, after the issuance of the certificate of deposit. The plaintiffs have failed in their attempts to seize or impound the certificate. A judgment in this case compelling the bank to pay the money to the plaintiffs would not protect it against a future demand by the holder of the certificate. The plaintiffs, therefore, have unfortunately failed in their effort to grasp the corpus of the property, and cannot obtain their desired judgment.

It is plaintiffs' contention, however, that, but for an error of the court, Rigby, the last-known holder of the certificate, would have been before the court, and that by showing that he was not a bona fide holder of the certificate they would have proved themselves entitled to the moneys in bank. This contention grows out of the following state of facts: After plaintiffs had instituted this action Rigby commenced suit against the bank, averring that he was the holder of the certificate of deposit, and that the bank, after presentation and demand, had refused payment. The bank applied to the court for leave to deposit the amount named in the certificate in court to await its action, and asked that upon such deposit it be dismissed from the action, and plaintiffs in this case be substituted in its place and stead. The order was made accordingly. Thereafter, and before any answer seeking affirmative relief upon the part of the defendants was on file, Rigby dismissed his action, and procured the entry of a judgment of dismissal in due form. Upon the entry of this judgment the action was finally at an end, and the court lost jurisdiction of it. Page v. Page, 77 Cal. 83, 19 Pac. 183; Acock v. Halsey, 90 Cal. 215, 27 Pac. 193; Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171, 30 Pac. 298; Kaufman v. Superior Court, 115 Cal. 152, 46 Pac. 904; Evans v. Johnston, 115 Cal. 180, 46 Pac. 906. Notwithstanding the fact that the Rigby action had thus come to an end, and that the court's jurisdiction over it was thereby lost, the court, upon application of plaintiffs in this action (substituted defendants in the other action), vacated the judgment of dismissal, and consolidated the two actions for trial. Upon the trial plaintiffs offered the depositions of Rigby and one Ehrman, taken in the Rigby action, and objection was made to their reception in evidence. The court excluded them, and properly. The Rigby action was at an end, the order of consolidation was without force and effect, and, except upon the theory that the Rigby action was an existing action consolidated with the present action, the depositions had no place in evidence; this, if for no other, yet for the sufficient, reasons that neither the parties to, nor the issues in, the two actions were identical, nor yet did the defendants Rossi in the present action have any opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses whose evidence was thus sought to be employed against them. We have preferred to discuss the questions presented upon this appeal without regard to the preliminary objection made by respondents to the consideration of the evidence upon the ground of the insufficiency of the specifications of error; but for the reasons given the judgment and order are affirmed.

BISHOP v. McKILLICAN, Sheriff, et al.

(Supreme Court of California. April 15, 1899.)

RECEIVERS—AUTHORITY TO SUE—RAILROADS—MORTGAGES—EXECUTION AND RECORDATION.

1. A receiver has no authority to sue for the recovery of personal property of which he has never had possession, unless authorized so to do by the court that appointed him.

2. Civ. Code, § 456, which provides that railroad corporations, for the purpose of building and equipping their roads, may issue bonds secured by mortgages on their corporate property and franchise, confers merely the power to mortgage, and not the power to mortgage real and personal property as an entirety, irrespective of the statutory requirements as to the execution and recording of real and chattel mortgages; hence, a mortgage covering real and personal property of a railroad, executed and recorded only as a real-estate mortgage, is void as to the personality, under section 2957.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county.

Action by Ira Bishop, as receiver, against Robert McKillican, as sheriff, and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appealed. Affirmed.

E. J. Pringle, for appellant. Sidney V. Smith, Fitzgerald & Abbott, and Reed & Nusbaumer, for respondents.

VAN DYKE, J. In 1890 the Consolidated Piedmont Cable Company, a corporation operating a street railroad in Oakland, executed a mortgage to the California Title Insurance & Trust Company, by its terms including all track and tracks, together with all depot grounds, buildings, machinery, workshops, dummies, cars, rolling stock of all kinds, full equipments, tools, fixtures, and other property which is now, or may hereafter, in whole or in part, be constructed, completed, purchased, acquired, held, or owned by the mortgagor, pertaining to the said railroads, and all the corporate rights, privileges, and franchises of the mortgagor pertaining to said roads, or any of them. This mortgage was acknowledged and recorded as a real-estate mortgage, and contained no affidavit; nor was it recorded as required by the Civil Code in reference to chattel mortgages. Afterwards, it is claimed by appellants, the railroad company acquired certain rolling stock, two bundles of wire cable, some old iron, and office furniture. On the 1st day of November, 1893, the Oregon

Improvement Company, a creditor of the railroad company, brought suit against said railroad company, and caused an attachment to be issued therein. Under this writ of attachment, and on the same day, to wit, the 1st of November, 1893, McKillican, as sheriff of Alameda county, by virtue of said writ of attachment, levied upon and seized the personal property last above mentioned. On the same day, to wit, November 1st, in an action brought by the California Title Insurance & Trust Company, a corporation, against the said Consolidated Piedmont Cable Company, to foreclose said mortgage, the plaintiff herein was appointed receiver, with "authority to continue the business of the Consolidated Piedmont Cable Company, and, as incident thereto, to create such indebtedness as may be necessary in conducting said business, and with the powers incident to the office of receiver."

On the trial of this action in the court below it was stipulated that certain allegations in the answer were true, and that the property described in the complaint herein was held by the defendant McKillican, as sheriff of the county of Alameda, under an attachment issued against the Consolidated Piedmont Cable Company at the suit of the defendant herein the Oregon Improvement Company; and the further following stipulation is entered into between the parties:

"Oregon Improvement Company, Plaintiff, vs. Consolidated Piedmont Cable Company, Defendant. Whereas, in the action now pending in the above-entitled court, wherein the California Title Insurance and Trust Company is plaintiff and the above-named defendant is also defendant, the undersigned has been appointed receiver of the property and assets of the above-named defendant, and has taken charge of all the property of the defendant, except such as was in possession of Robert McKillican, sheriff of Alameda county, under and by virtue of a writ of attachment levied in the above-entitled action; and whereas, the undersigned has taken possession of all the property of the defendant, but subject to the above-mentioned levy, and it is the intention of the California Title Insurance and Trust Company, the plaintiff in the action wherein the undersigned was appointed receiver, to test the validity of the prior attachment levied in the above-entitled action, and it is desirable that the property belonging to the said defendant be used by the receiver, subject to any lien which the above-named plaintiff may, by virtue of the levy under said writ of attachment, have, and it is also desirable that expense be saved in caring for the said property: Now, therefore, I, the undersigned, receiver as aforesaid, do hereby acknowledge that I have received possession from the said Robert McKillican, sheriff as aforesaid, as care taker for him, of the personal property levied upon by him under the writ of attachment in the above-entitled action, and I do hereby agree to restore the same to the possession of the said Robert McKillican, can, sheriff, whenever he shall demand of me so to do. But this receipt shall not prejudice any claim which I, as receiver, may make, that said levy of a writ of attachment is inferior in right to any claim as receiver. Dated Oakland, November 1, 1893. [Signed] Ira Bishop.

"To Robert McKillican, Sheriff: If Ira Bishop, receiver, etc., will sign the foregoing receipt, you are at liberty to appoint him care taker of the property levied upon by you, and the plaintiff will acquit you of any claim for damages arising from any act of his. Dated November 1, 1893. Sidney V. Smith and Warren Olney, Attorneys for Oregon Improvement Company."

And, after the execution of the stipulation, the property, up to the time of levy of execution, was used or held under, and in pursuance to, the terms of the stipulation.

From the facts, as appears in the record, the plaintiff never had possession of the articles sued for as receiver, or in any other way, except as the servant of the defendant McKillican as sheriff, whereas the action seems to be based upon the theory that the property was in the possession of the plaintiff, as receiver, and unlawfully and wrongfully taken from his possession by the defendants. As to this property, the possession of the receiver was never disturbed or interfered with. The facts, therefore, are not consistent with the plaintiff's theory of his cause of action. The only authority the receiver has for bringing this action is the order appointing him. That does not specially authorize him to bring a suit for the recovery or value of property withheld or converted, of which he never was in possession. Beach, Rec. §§ 672, 673, says: "It has been formally adjudicated that a receiver, who has had possession of property by virtue of his appointment as such receiver by a competent court, may maintain an action of detinue for the property. Although such an action could not be maintained, if grounded merely upon the right of property which may be claimed to vest in him by virtue of his appointment, yet, as a mere right of possession is a sufficient basis upon which to found the action, and as he is entitled to the possession, he may avail himself of this remedy. A receiver appointed in supplementary proceedings takes only an equitable right of redemption in chattels mortgaged by the judgment debtor, when reduced to possession by the mortgagee before the commencement of the proceedings, and he cannot maintain replevin for such chattels against the mortgagee. In a recent case in England it was held that the receiver of a pawnbroker's business was not entitled to the possession of redeemable pledges, as against the sheriff, who held them by virtue of a levy under execution made after the appointment of the receiver, but before he had perfected his security." In State v. Gambs, 68 Mo. 289, it is held that an action brought by a receiver could not be maintained, because he had received no special authority entitling him to bring suit; Judge Henry adding: "A suit by a receiver to recover property of which he had obtained possession, but which has been taken from him, rests upon a different ground. In such a case his formal possession created a special property, which would support the action." In Tibbets v. Cohn, 116 Cal. 365, 48 Pac. 372, this court says (page 369, 116 Cal., and page 373, 48 Pac.): "As a rule, however, the receiver cannot sue to recover property which has not come to his possession, or which, being in the possession of the defendant, ought to have been delivered by him. He cannot maintain trover for property of the insolvent converted before the adjudication, nor to recover property transferred by the debtor in fraud of creditors. His appointment is intended to have the effect of a preliminary injunction to preserve the property. It does not appear that there was any order of the court directing or authorizing the suit." Beach, Rec. § 650, says: "The receiver has no right to sue, except by leave of the court which appointed him. Out of the established doctrine that a receiver is the officer of the court—the hand by which it executes its will in regard to the property in its keeping—is deduced the well-nigh universal rule that a receiver may not bring any suit without having first obtained leave of court." And, since the appeal was taken in this case, in the action of California Title Insurance & Trust Co. v. Consolidated Piedmont Cable Co., 117 Cal. 237, 49 Pac. 1, it was held that moneys due the Piedmont Cable Company did not pass to the possession of the receiver by virtue of his appointment as such, and that the same were subject to, and were attached by, Albert S. Black, a creditor of said Piedmont Company. The court says: "The mortgage did not cover the assets of the corporation due therein, beyond the property as hereinbefore stated; and the receiver was appointed, not to collect the debts due the corporation defendant, but only to take possession of the mortgaged property, operate the road, etc. When, therefore, he took possession of the money of the defendant, and collected money due to it before his appointment, which was not covered by the lien of the mortgage, he transcended his authority as receiver." Under the order appointing the plaintiff as receiver, he had no power to bring suits for the recovery of property, or to contest the right of property claimed to belong to the defendant corporation in the suit wherein he was appointed, which would or might involve risk or expensive litigation, without an order of the court to that effect.

The property in question in this action is personal, and not real, estate. The mode and manner of mortgaging chattels or personal property is pointed out in Civ. Code, §§ 2950-2972. By section 2957 it is declared: "A mortgage of personal property is void as against creditors of the mortgagor and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers of the property in good faith and for value, unless:

It is accompanied by the affidavit of all the parties thereto that it is made in good faith and without any design to hinder, delay or defraud creditors; (2) it is acknowledged or proved, certified and recorded in like manner as grants of real property." As already stated, the mortgage in question did not purport to be executed in pursuance of the requirements of the Code concerning chattel mortgages, but only as a mortgage of real property. The first section of the chattel mortgage provision specifies what articles of personal property may be mortgaged, and the first subdivision includes "locomotives, engines and other rolling stock of a railroad"; the ninth, "growing crops." Simpson v. Ferguson, 112 Cal. 180, 40 Pac. 104, and 44 Pac. 484, was a case of a mortgage of growing crops. In that case a real-estate mortgage had been executed, covering the land upon which the crops were grown subsequent to the execution of the mortgage. The court says: "It is urged that sections 2955, and following, of the Civil Code, providing for the manner of mortgaging growing crops, do not establish an exclusive method; that as this class of property may under some conditions be regarded as realty, and under other conditions as personalty, it must follow that under corresponding conditions the property may be the subject of a real-estate mortgage or a chattel mortgage, according to the circumstances, and that, plaintiff having a valid mortgage upon the land, with its rents, issues, and profits, this gives him a valid lien upon the growing crops as effectually, to the same extent, for all purposes, as if executed with the formalities required in the case of a crop mortgage. We are unable to coincide in this view. In the first place, we think it quite manifest from the provisions of the Code in question that the legislature intended thereby to provide an exclusive mode for the mortgaging of growing crops, and intended to declare that for such purpose this species of property shall be regarded as chattels. There is nothing in the statute to indicate that it was not intended to cover every case of a mortgage given upon that class of property." Therefore it was held that the mortgage did not vest the mortgagee with a right to the crops grown intermediate the giving of the mortgage and the foreclosure thereof. If this be "an exclusive mode for mortgaging growing crops," it is likewise as to the property in question here, as it belongs to the same category, and included in the same section. In Southern California Motor-Road Co. v. Union Loan & Trust Co., 12 C. C. A. 215, 64 Fed. 450, the circuit court of appeals, in modifying the opinion of the circuit court, held that a mortgage by a railroad company, under the authority conferred upon such companies by section 456 of the Civil Code, included personal property as well as real estate, although executed and recorded as a real-estate mortgage merely. The court, in deciding the case, says: "There is a great diversity of opinion upon this question in the different states where no express statute exists upon the subject. * * * Several states, owing to the conflict in the decisions of the courts, have settled the matter by direct legislation. * * * The Civil Code of California, in dealing with the subject of railroads and of corporate stock, provides that railroad corporations, for the purpose of constructing and completing roads, may, among other things, mortgage their corporate property and franchises. * * * There are no conditions attached to this power. It is absolute, and gives the railroad the right to mortgage personal as well as real property for the purpose mentioned, without incumbering it with any of the conditions attached to the chattel mortgage act." The same circuit court of appeals subsequently, in Illinois Trust & Savings Bank v. Seattle Electric Railway & Power Co., 27 C. C. A. 272, 82 Fed. 941, had under consideration the same subject-matter of mortgaging chattels by a railroad company under the laws of the state of Washington. In that case the court held that the failure of the trust deed to comply with the chattel mortgage law of that state rendered the mortgage void as to the personal property. The statutes of that state contain provisions for mortgaging personal property or chattels similar to ours. The court, in deciding the case, say: "This court held that a statute of California relating to chattel mortgages similar to that of Washington did not apply where the mortgage of a railroad company covers personal property in connection with real estate and corporate franchises, but in both of these cases the exception was based upon the provisions of the statute conferring upon railroad corporations organized or incorporated under the laws of the state for public purposes the power to mortgage their franchises and real and personal property as an entirety." Section 456 of the Civil Code is found in division 1, pt. 4, tit. 3, under the head of "Railroad Corporations." It is simply intended, as its language imports, to confer upon railroad corporations the power to mortgage their property. Being a corporation, and the creature of law, it would possess no such power without direct authority given to it by law. The section does not in terms, however, as implied in the decision of the circuit court of appeals, confer power to mortgage "their franchises and real and personal property as an entirety," but simply confers the power to mortgage such property, without prescribing the mode. The same power is possessed by individuals. Still, it would hardly be claimed that an individual, owning a railroad and all the other property that ordinary railroad corporations own, could mortgage the whole property, real, personal, and franchises, in one instrument as a real-estate mortgage. See, also, Hoyle v. Railroad Co., 54 N. Y. 314. The mode and manner of executing mortgages, both of real and personal property, will be found in altogether a different part of the Civil Code from that concerning corporations, to wit, under division 3, pt. 4, tit. 15. In article 2 the mode of mortgaging real property is pointed out, from section 2947 to section 2952, inclusive, and mortgages of personal property in article 3, from sections 2955 to 2973, both inclusive; and it is declared in section 2957 that "a mortgage of personal property is void as against creditors of the mortgagor and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers of the property in good faith and for value, unless" executed, acknowledged, and recorded as in that article prescribed. No exception is contained in favor of any person, whether a natural person or a corporation; and the language is too plain to be misunderstood, and requires no construction. It is intimated in the opinion of the circuit court of appeals referred to that if a state, by statute, has "settled the matter by direct legislation," the court would feel bound to follow it. We think that our state has settled the matter in the provisions of the Code referred to, and that it is the duty of this court to follow the law as there laid down. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

BLANKENSHIP v. WHALEY et al. (Sac. 447.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 14, 1899.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—CONTRACTS WITHIN THE STATUTE OF FRAUDS—PART PERFORMANCE—JUDICIAL SALES—TITLE TO PURCHASER.

1. The parol agreement of a landowner that, if an adjoining landowner will help him to enlarge an irrigation ditch on his lands, he will permit the latter to use the waters thereof, is, after performance by such adjoining landowner, and his use of the waters thereunder, enforceable in equity against the owner of the lands on which the ditch is located and those claiming under him with notice, though within the statute of frauds.

2. The purchaser at administrator's sale takes title free from secret defects which he could not have ascertained by the exercise of due diligence.

3. In an action to enforce a water right in favor of a third person against one claiming under an administrator's sale, the court found that the deed, which expressly reserved the water right in question, was duly executed pursuant to an order of the superior court, but made no finding whether the purchaser took with notice. Held that the finding was insufficient to support a judgment that the purchaser took free from any irrigation rights of such third person, since it did not appear whether the reservation in the deed was an unauthorized attempt of the administrator to create a water right in favor of such third person, and hence did not constitute notice, or whether it was inserted in the deed by order of court in recognition of an existing water right, in which event it would constitute notice.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county.

Action by P. N. Blankenship against Samuel Whaley and others. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. W. Holland and Bradley & Farnsworth, for appellant. T. E. Clark and W. W. Cross, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. By his action plaintiff seeks an injunction restraining defendants from interfering with him in the use of a certain ditch upon the lands of defendants. Plaintiff avers that he "constructed a certain irrigating ditch" upon lands which were at the time the lands of one R. G. Rogers, under an agreement with Rogers that he (plaintiff) was to have the perpetual right to the use of the ditch for the purpose of conducting water to his lands, together with the right at all times to enter upon the premises of Rogers to repair the ditch, and keep it in proper condition. He alleged that for 10 years last past he has openly and notoriously, and adversely to all others, used the ditch for the indicated purpose; that about a year before the commencement of the action the defendants became the reputed owners of the land upon which the ditch is constructed, but that they became such owners with full notice of the existence of the ditch, and of plaintiff's rights therein and thereto. Prior to the commencement of the action, defendants informed plaintiff that they would not then, nor at any time in the future, permit him to use the ditch, or run water through it to his lands, or enter upon the lands for the purpose of repair of the ditch, or for any purpose whatsoever. Fifteen acres of plaintiff's land consists of high, sandy soil sown to alfalfa, of the value of $50 per acre. It can be irrigated only by water conducted through the ditch, and without being irrigated the land and the crop growing thereon would be rendered entirely worthless. Unless plaintiff is permitted to use the ditch and run the water through the same without delay, his crop will be destroyed, and he will suffer great and irreparable damage. The answer denied all the material averments of the complaint excepting the ownership of the land, and it is specifically denied that defendants acquired ownership with any knowledge of any rights of the plaintiff in and to the land or to the ditch. The court found that plaintiff did not "construct" any ditch upon the land of Rogers at all, but it found that during the year 1887, while Rogers was the owner of the land, plaintiff and Rogers "entered into a parol agreement, by the terms of which plaintiff, Rogers, and others were to do the work of enlarging and increasing the capacity of the ditch mentioned and referred to in plaintiff's complaint herein, and, in consideration of said work being done as aforesaid, the parties performing the same were to have the use of said ditch and the water flowing therein, and jointly use the same during the irrigating season for irrigating purposes; that pursuant to said agreement the work of enlarging the said ditch and increasing the capacity thereof was done by said plaintiff, the said Rogers, and others, the said work being finished during the year 1887." "Thereafter, at various times between the year 1887 and the year 1893, the said parties to said agreement used said ditch and the water flowing therein for irrigation purposes." "No written conveyance of any interest in said ditch, or the water flowing therein, was ever made by said Robert Rogers, or any one else, to plaintiff." "On the 28th day of October, 1895, the said land [of Rogers], and all ditches and water rights appertaining thereto upon, over, and across the same, together with the use and possession thereof, were, by the administratrix of the estate of Rogers, then deceased, conveyed to the defendant Samuel Whaley by a deed duly executed by said administratrix in pursuance of an order of the superior court of Tulare county, state of California." "In addition to the conditions and covenants usually contained in conveyances of real estate, the deed above referred to contained the following language, to wit: 'Saving and reserving from the premises above described, and from the operation and effect of those conveyances, all the right, title, and interest in and to the old chartered ditch and the water flowing and to flow therein, for the use and benefit of the lands and premises known and described as sections 9 and 10, in township and range, and it is hereby fully understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that the said ditch shall be and remain and the same shall continue over and across the lands and premises hereby conveyed to said lands and premises hereinbefore described as sections 9 and 10, which shall retain and be entitled to all their rights and privileges in and to said ditch and the water therein flowing, and the lands hereby conveyed shall have and are entitled to their pro rata share of water from said ditch, and all the right and title to the lands hereby conveyed in and to said ditch, and all persons having an interest in or to said ditch may lawfully enter upon said premises to repair or clear said ditch at any time while using the water therefrom on their said land.' Plaintiff's land is in section 10." No finding was made as to the defendants' knowledge or lack of knowledge of the alleged rights of plaintiff at the time they obtained title to the ditch and lands. From these findings the court concluded that the defendant Samuel Whaley was the owner in possession and entitled to the possession of the lands and the control of all ditches upon and across his lands, in connection with his co-tenants, of whom plaintiff was not one; and that the plaintiff had no right, title, or interest in and to the ditch upon and across the land for any purpose whatever. Judgment followed for defendants, and plaintiff appeals upon the judgment roll.

Notwithstanding the fact that the interest to which plaintiff pleaded he was entitled is an estate in real property, and that an agreement for the conveyance thereof is within the statute of frauds,—a proposition which is well settled in this state (Hayes v. Fine, 91 Cal. 391, 27 Pac. 772),—and, notwithstanding the further fact that the court finds that the agreement in this case was in parol, nevertheless the court further finds such an execution of the parol agreement as under the authority of Flickinger v. Shaw, 87 Cal. 126, 25 Pac. 268, would entitle the plaintiff to a specific performance of the agreement, and to a conveyance of the interest which he claims, had his action been prosecuted against the original owner, Rogers. The findings, it will be noted, declare that such an agreement was entered into; that plaintiff performed his part of the agreement; and that he thereafter used the water, at different seasons, under the agreement. If the defendants purchased the land, the ditches, and the rights appertaining thereto with knowledge or notice of plaintiff's interest, which interest stood, not as a legal interest, but as an interest subject to equitable enforcement only, plaintiff would have the unquestioned right to enforce it against them. To save this point, he pleaded that the defendants took the property with knowledge of his rights. Defendants acquired title at the administrator's sale. At such a sale the maxim caveat emptor is held to apply; but, while the purchaser at such a sale is not warranted in his title, and is chargeable with knowledge and notice of that of which, by the exercise of due diligence, he could have acquired knowledge, he is still protected by the recording acts; and secret defects in a title apparently good are, as to him, no defects at all. Love v. Berry, 22 Tex. 371; Banks v. Ammon, 27 Pa. St. 172. There being nothing of record to charge the defendants in this case with constructive knowledge of plaintiff's right, it became incumbent upon plaintiff to plead and prove, as he did, that they took title with knowledge. Upon this material question there is absolutely no finding whatsoever.

Again, by the findings it appears that the administrator's deed, through which defendants deraign title, was "duly executed in pursuance of an order of the superior court." The deed contained the exception or reservation above set forth. The administratrix could not, by any reservation or exception in her deed, whether made in pursuance of an order of court or not, create a new right or interest in the land conveyed, in the ditch, or in the waters flowing therein; but if, at the time of the deed, there were any such existing rights, it was perfectly proper for the administratrix under order of court to have noted those rights, and excepted them from the conveyance of the interest of the decedent. The finding in this regard is ambiguous. It declares that the administratrix duly executed her deed pursuant to the order of court. If, in truth, the court had ordered the deed to be made with such exception in recognition of plaintiff's rights, defendants, in taking the deed, would have been charged with notice of them. But if, however, this language in the deed was but an unauthorized attempt of the administratrix to declare a reservation, and create an interest where one did not exist, then it was void, and of no avail. Thus it appears that the findings are insufficient to support the judgment for lack of an essential finding as to the knowledge of defendants. If defendants took with knowledge of plaintiff's right, the other findings of the court clearly establish that this right was sufficient to entitle plaintiff to an execution of the parol agreement. The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREETS—VACATION—CERTIORARI—WHEN LIES—EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION.

1. Under St. 1889, p. 70, which authorizes the board of supervisors to "close a street, in whole or in part, whenever the public interest or convenience may require," the determination to open or close a street by the board is the exercise of a legislative, and not a judicial, power, and hence certiorari will not lie to review it.

2. St. 1889, p. 70, provides that, after the board of supervisors has acquired jurisdiction to make improvements, it shall appoint commissioners to assess benefits and damages, unless the proposed work is for closing up the street, and it appears that no assessment is necessary. Held, that such determination is the exercise of a legislative function; hence certiorari will not lie.

3. The diminution in the value of a lot abutting on a street, resulting from the narrowing of the street, is not such damage as entitles the owner to compensation, where the means of ingress and egress and the supply of light and air are not impaired.

4. Persons who have not suffered such damage by the action of a municipal board as would entitle them to a private remedy therefor, but merely such damage as is sustained by the public in common, cannot maintain certiorari to review the action of the board.

5. Certiorari will not lie to review the action of a municipal board merely because it results in damage to petitioner, where the board have acted within their authority.

6. Whether the lands affected are remote from or abut on a street is immaterial, in a certiorari proceeding by the landowners, in determining whether a municipal board acted within its authority in narrowing the street.

7. Certiorari to review the action of a board of supervisors in narrowing a street will not lie on the ground that it does not appear what disposition is to be made of the area vacated.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Petition by one Brown and others against the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco for a writ of certiorari. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the petition, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

Alex. G. Eells and T. W. Nowlin, for appellants. Sullivan & Sullivan, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Turk street, in the city and county of San Francisco, between Masonic avenue on the east and St. Josephs avenue on the west, was originally laid out with a width of 100 feet. The board of supervisors of said city and county passed an order April 19, 1897, declaring the northerly 31 feet and 3 inches of said portion of Turk street to be closed and vacated. The appellants herein are owners of lands abutting upon the southerly side of said portion of the street, and instituted the present proceeding for a review of this action of the board of supervisors, and a judgment annulling said order, upon the ground that in adopting it the board acted in excess of its jurisdiction. In their application to the superior court, they allege their ownership of the abutting lands, and that they had filed with the board written objections to the adoption of the order, but that the board adopted the order without considering these objections, and in disregard thereof. The appellants also alleged that they would sustain injury and their lands be damaged by the closing of that portion of Turk street, and that the said order was adopted without making or providing for any compensation therefor, and that the board by said order adjudged that they were not entitled to any compensation for said damage, and that such determination was made without any opportunity on their part to be heard in reference thereto. A demurrer to the application was sustained by the superior court, and, the petitioners declining to amend, judgment was rendered denying their application. From this judgment the present appeal has been taken.

Counsel for both the appellants and the respondent have discussed the appeal upon the theory that the proceedings for the improvement of the street were taken under the provisions of the act of March 6, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 70), upon the ground, as suggested in the briefs, that the provisions in Act 1893, p. 220, purporting to limit the provisions of this act to cities having a population less than 40,000, is special and local legislation, within the prohibition of the constitution, and, without passing upon this question, we shall consider the appeal upon this theory.

The writ of certiorari can issue to review the action of a board or inferior tribunal only when the act to be reviewed was performed by the board or tribunal in the exercise of judicial functions, and the board or tribunal has acted in excess of its jurisdiction. Code Civ. Proc. § 1068; People v. Bush, 40 Cal. 344; Quinchard v. Board, 113 Cal. 664, 45 Pac. 856; People v. Board of Sup'rs of Contra Costa Co. (Cal.) 55 Pac. 131; Frasher v. Rader (Cal.) 56 Pac. 797. The appellants do not controvert this rule, but they insist that in the passage of the order in question the board of supervisors acted judicially, and without observing the provisions prescribed by the statute.

The act of the board of supervisors in determining whether a street shall be opened or closed, or widened or contracted, or otherwise improved, is a legislative act, performed in the exercise of the power which has been conferred upon the municipality by the legislature to enable it to provide for the welfare of its citizens; and, although the board is called upon to exercise its judgment in determining whether to authorize the improvement, such judgment is not the exercise of any "judicial functions," but is the conclusion which they form in the exercise of the discretionary power that has been intrusted to them, and upon a consideration of the public welfare and demands for which they are to provide. "The essential elements of judicial action are wanting, namely, the ascertainment of existing rights." People v. Board of Sup'rs of Contra Costa Co. (Cal.) 55 Pac. 131. We are aware that in some of the early opinions in the Reports of this state there is language that is not entirely consistent with this rule, but, although there are expressions that such a proceeding could be reviewed upon certiorari, we are not aware of any decision to that effect. Whatever dicta of this nature there may be are inconsistent with the rule, and must be considered as overruled by the later decisions.

The authority to close a street "in whole or in part," which is conferred by the act of March 6, 1889, authorizes the board to diminish the width of the street, and the adoption of the order is a determination by the board that the public interest or convenience requires the improvement. "The legislature has, by the statute referred to, conferred upon that body the power to open and close streets 'whenever the public interest or convenience may require,' and the determination of this question by that body is not open for review by the courts." Symons v. City & County of San Francisco, 115 Cal. 555, 42 Pac. 913, and 47 Pac. 453.

The act aforesaid provides that, after the board has given notice of its intention to make the improvement, objections thereto may be filed, and that the board shall hear such objections and pass upon the same; and declares that the decision of the board thereon shall be final and conclusive, and, if the objections are overruled, that the board shall be deemed to have acquired jurisdiction to order the improvement. The appellants filed certain objections to the improvement, and a day was appointed for hearing the same, and it is recited in the order that these objections were then heard, and duly considered and overruled. The appellants allege in their petition herein that their objections were "partly heard," and were subsequently considered by the board, and overruled without any notice to them. They do not, however, allege that they were refused a hearing upon any of their objections, or that the board declined to hear any argument they wished to make, and in this proceeding we cannot consider the sufficiency or insufficiency of the hearing which was given to the appellants upon their objections. The hearing thus authorized was not a judicial hearing, but merely a mode of procedure for ascertaining the public interest, and that the board might determine whether that interest would be subserved by the improvement. Whether the lands of the appellants would suffer damage by the improvement was proper for the board to consider in determining whether the public interest was such as authorized the improvement notwithstanding such effect; but if, after considering this question, it decided that the objections were insufficient to overcome the public interest, its decision, in the language of the statute, became "final and conclusive," and it acquired jurisdiction to order the improvement.

It is contended by the appellants that the board had no jurisdiction to adopt the order without at the same time providing for an as-essment of the damage that would be sustained thereby, and providing for its payment. The statute provides that, after the board has acquired jurisdiction to make the improvement, "unless the proposed work is for closing up, and it appears that no assessment is necessary," it shall appoint commissioners "to assess benefits and damages." The proper construction to be given to this provision is that commissioners are not to be appointed if the proposed improvement is for closing up the whole or a part of the street, unless an assessment is necessary, and that the necessity of an assessment is to be determined by the board, and may be determined irrespective of any previous notice therefor, or after such hearing and investigation as it may deem appropriate. There can be no assessment necessary unless there is some damage for which an assessment is to be made, and, in the absence of a showing that damage will result from the closing up of the street, the board is authorized to hold that an assessment is not necessary. This provision necessarily means that the board must in the first instance determine whether an assessment is necessary, and its jurisdiction to order the improvement does not depend upon a correct determination by it of that question. The board is not authorized to determine the amount of damage or the individuals or lands which will be damaged by the improvement, but it is authorized, in the exercise of its legislative discretion, to determine, in the first instance, whether any damage will result. See Parker v. Catholic Bishop, 146 Ill. 167, 34 N. E. 473. Whether it errs in this respect or not, its action cannot be reviewed under a writ of certiorari.

It is claimed by the appellants that by the passage of the order the city damaged their lands without providing any compensation therefor, and they also allege that in their objections to the order they stated that their lands would be damaged by its adoption; but the only injury claimed is the diminution in value of their lands by reason of the reduction in the width of the street, and in their argument herein they contend that their right to have the street kept at its original width is property, which cannot be taken or damaged without making compensation to them therefor.

The property which an abutting owner has in the street in front of his land is the right of access and of light and air, and for an infringement of these rights he is entitled to compensation. This right is peculiar and individual to the abutting owner, differing from the right of passing to and fro upon the street, which he enjoys in common with the public, and any infringement thereof gives him a right of action. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 712. In Eachus v. Railway Co., 103 Cal. 614, 37 Pac. 750, the right which the abutting owner has to the use of the street fronting upon his lot is defined to be an easement therein for the purposes of ingress and egress, which attaches to the lot, and in which he has a right of property as fully as that which he has in the lot itself, and any act of the municipality by which that easement is destroyed or substantially impaired for the benefit of the public is a damage to the lot itself, within the meaning of the constitutional provision, for which he is entitled to compensation. The appellants herein do not, however, claim that the reduction in the width of the street will in any respect interfere with their enjoyment of light and air, or that access to their lots is in any degree impaired. Indeed, in view of the fact that by the proposed reduction of the street it will have the same width as the majority of streets in the city, such contention could not be made. The provision in the constitution invoked by them was inserted therein to provide for instances in which property was not taken from the possession of the owner, or into physical occupancy by the public, and applies only to such damages as may be recoverable under established rules of law. The damage which the appellants may sustain by reason of a diminution in value of their lands is consequential, and damage for which they are not entitled to compensation. Mere diminution in value is not a damage to the land. "Where no portion of the land is taken, and the damages suffered are consequential, by reason of what the corporation does upon its own land or that of another, it does not seem that there is any warrant for instituting proceedings for the ascertaining of such damages." Stetson v. Railroad Co., 75 Ill. 74; American Bank-Note Co. v. New York El. R. Co., 129 N. Y. 252, 29 N. E. 302. "The right of abutting owners in the streets is not of that absolute character that they can resist or prevent any and all interference with the street to their detriment, or which can be asserted to stay the hand of the municipality in the control, regulation, or improvement of the streets in the public interest, although it may be made to appear that the privileges which they had theretofore enjoyed, and the benefits they had derived from the street in its existing condition, would be curtailed or impaired to their injury by the changes proposed." Reining v. Railway Co., 128 N. Y. 157, 28 N. E. 640. It has been held in other states that even the entire closing of a street upon which property abuts does not give to the owner a right of compensation, so long as there are other public streets by which he has access to his land. The mere inconvenience thereby experienced is not a damage for which he is entitled to compensation. Coster v. Mayor, etc., 43 N. Y. 399; Smith v. City of Boston, 7 Cush. 254; Egerer v. Railroad Co., 130 N. Y. 113, 29 N. E. 95; Fobes v. Railroad Co., 121 N. Y. 505, 24 N. E. 919. If the appellants are not entitled to any private remedy for damages sustained by the order of the board, they are not entitled to question the validity of the order by means of the writ of certiorari. Davis v. Commissioners, 153 Mass. 218, 26 N. E. 848. "Whether the order will have the effect to diminish the value of the plaintiffs' land, or to cause them damage, is not a ground for annulling the act of the board of supervisors, and cannot be considered in this proceeding. If the board of supervisors had the authority to pass the order, and the plaintiffs have sustained any legal damage by reason thereof, they must seek relief in a direct proceeding therefor." Symons v. City & County of San Francisco, supra. Whether the lands affected by the order are remote from the street which is affected, or abut thereon, is immaterial in determining whether the board exceeded its jurisdiction.

The suggestion of the appellants that the effect of the order is to give to the abutting owner upon the northerly side of the street the strip of land taken from the street is not available in this proceeding. No such purpose appears upon the face of the order, and the jurisdiction of the board to make the order is not dependent upon the effect it may have upon the title to the vacated portion of the street. If the closing of this part of the street has the effect to vest the abutting owner with the title thereto, the board is not deprived of its authority to make the order by reason of such result; while, if its effect is to leave the vacated portion of the street public property, it can be disposed of only in accordance with law. See Meyer v. Village of Teutopolis, 131 Ill. 552, 23 N. E. 631. The judgment is affirmed.

BRITTAN v. OAKLAND BANK OF SAVINGS. (S. F. 926.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 14, 1899.)

UNAUTHORIZED SALE OF PLEDGE—RIGHTS OF PLEDGEE AND PURCHASER—STOCK ASSIGNMENT—SUFFICIENCY—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—DISCRETION—SAVINGS AND LOAN CORPORATIONS—PROHIBITED LOAN—VALIDITY—REVIEW—VERDICT—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A sale of pledged property not in accordance with law does not extinguish the lien and interest of the pledgee in the securities, as against the pledgor.

2. A bona fide purchaser of property for value from a pledgee of the same, who sold it in violation of the pledge, succeeds to all the rights of the pledgee.

3. Where one transferred and indorsed bank stock in blank, and delivered the same to his agent, with power to negotiate and pledge the same, he cannot recover for a conversion thereof by the pledgee of the agent, who took it in good faith and for value, without refunding or offering to refund the amount advanced by the pledgee.

4. Delivery of a certificate of stock, with a blank assignment signed and indorsed on the back thereof, is a good assignment.

5. An abuse of discretion in refusing to permit a party to amend a pleading cannot be predicated on a refusal of an application therefor during the trial.

6. A violation of Civ. Code, § 578, prohibiting directors and officers of savings and loan corporations from borrowing therefrom, and declaring that their offices shall immediately become vacant therefor, can only be availed of at the instance of the sovereign power.

7. A loan made by a savings bank to a director, who is prohibited by Civ. Code, § 578, from borrowing therefrom, on penalty of having his office vacated, is not invalid, and may be recovered, and a pledge securing the same held until the loan is paid.

8. A verdict is conclusive, on appeal, as to facts on which the evidence is conflicting.

9. Where instructions, taken together, presented a case fairly, the correctness of a single one cannot be challenged.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county.

Action by Nathaniel J. Brittan against the Oakland Bank of Savings. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appealed. The judgment was affirmed (44 Pac. 339), and plaintiff now appeals from an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Jas. L. Crittenden, for appellant. Dunne & McPike, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. The action here is conversion. The facts of the case, as admitted, not controverted, or established by a preponderance of the testimony, are as follows:

In December, 1881, and prior and subsequent thereto, A. W. Bowman was the agent of the plaintiff herein to collect rents, pay taxes, and supervise his various properties. The plaintiff was the owner of 120 shares of stock of the Bank of California, represented by certificate No. 17, and in December, 1881, or the beginning of January, 1882, as he testifies, he assigned this certificate in blank to said Bowman, for the purpose of raising some money. Bowman was at this time, and prior thereto had been, a director in the defendant bank, and was in the habit of borrowing large sums of money from said bank on securities, generally in the shape of stocks put up by way of pledge. In the latter part of January or the fore part of February, 1882, Bowman presented to the cashier and president of the defendant bank the certificate in question, so indorsed to him in blank by the plaintiff. The certificate was received, and placed to the account of Bowman, entitled "Overdraft Account," and money was thereupon or thereafter advanced and other transactions had, the same as theretofore, up to the time of Bowman's failure, in 1884. On October 15, 1884, the defendant bank surrendered the certificate of stock No. 17 to the Bank of California, and had a new certificate, No. 809, issued to it, in place thereof, for the shares represented in the old certificate and held by it in pledge. Neither the defendant bank nor its officers, other than director Bowman, had any notice or knowledge of the fact that the certificate in question was the property of the plaintiff, up to the demand made by him October 17, 1884. On October 17, 1884, the plaintiff made a demand on the defendant for the stock in question, as the owner thereof, which demand was refused. October 27, 1884, the petition of certain creditors of Bowman was filed to have him adjudged an insolvent, and thereafter, in the usual course, he was so adjudged insolvent. At no time from the date of the transfer of the certificate to the bank was the account of Bowman for moneys advanced to him by the bank reduced below the amount of the securities, including the certificate in question, and his account showed that between July, 1884, and January, 1885, it was not less than $42,500, and, deducting the pledged stock, it was in the neighborhood of $24,000. This action was brought originally November 7, 1885, by Frank Allyn, as assignee of the plaintiff, against the present defendant, the Bank of California, said Bowman, and other parties. The complaint was amended several times, and finally, on the third amended complaint and the answer thereto, the action was tried. Before the third amended complaint was filed Bowman died, and Allyn, the former plaintiff, reassigned to the present plaintiff, who was substituted in his place, and all the other defendants, excepting the respondent here, were omitted from the complaint on which the action was tried. In April, 1895, the action was tried before a jury, and a general verdict rendered in favor of the defendant. An appeal was had to this court from the judgment, upon the judgment roll (112 Cal. 1, 44 Pac. 339), and the judgment affirmed. This appeal is taken from the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. Between the time of the demand made by the plaintiff on the defendant bank for the stock in question and the bringing of the action, to wit, in August, 1885, the defendant bank sold the stock at private sale, without notice, for the sum of $18,941, which, with interest, deducted from the amount then due the bank from Bowman, left a balance of $24,000. In May, 1887, defendant bank assigned its claim against the Bowman estate in the insolvency proceedings to W. H. Chickering for $4,616.73, and at about the same date Chickering assigned the same to the plaintiff Brittan.

1. One of the contentions of the appellant is that the defendant bank, having sold the stock at private sale, without complying with the requirements of the Code, thereby lost its lien and all interest in said stock. But the case here is not that of a mere lienholder or bailee, but it is a case of pledge. The stock, as already shown, was indorsed in blank by the plaintiff to Bowman. Plaintiff dealt with Bowman, and not with the defendant bank. The account, as furnished by Bowman to the plaintiff of his transactions as his agent, as given in evidence, shows this. A further fact going to show that the plaintiff dealt entirely with Bowman, and not with the bank, is that plaintiff filed his claim against Bowman on the balance of his account, in the insolvency proceedings against Bowman, including this same stock, as certificate No. 17, and drew from the insolvency court, through the assignee in insolvency, a dividend or payment on said claim. There was also in evidence an affidavit by the plaintiff for the arrest of Bowman at the time of his failure, for the crime of embezzling the stock in question. In that affidavit he said that Bowman "then and there was the agent of deponent, and, by virtue of his employment as such, there came into the care and custody of him, the said A. W. Bowman, one hundred and twenty shares of the capital stock of the Bank of California, * * * which said certificate of stock was indorsed in blank by deponent, and was then and there of the value of one hundred and sixty-five dollars per share,—in all, of the value of nineteen thousand eight hundred dollars,—all in lawful money of the United States; and the said A. W. Bowman, while then and there having, as aforesaid, the control and care of said shares of stock and the aforesaid certificate, did then and there fraudulently appropriate the same to his own use." This verified complaint or affidavit was filed on the 18th day of October, 1884, being the next day after plaintiff's demand on the defendant bank, and on the 20th day of the same month (two days thereafter) he brought an action against the present defendant, Bowman, and the Bank of California, for an injunction, in which it is also alleged that, for a long time prior to the 15th day of October, the defendant Bowman was the agent of the plaintiff in and about the care and management of the plaintiff's business, and as such agent had the care and custody of the said stock, which was indorsed to him in blank, giving the value thereof, the same as in the preceding affidavit. This court, in Williams v. Ashe, 111 Cal. 180, 43 Pac. 595, distinguishes between a mere lienholder and a pledgee. In that case Ashe turned over certain horses to one Kelly in pledge as security for a sum of over $4,000, and, after holding them some time, and becoming dissatisfied with the first arrangement, Kelly claimed them as owner, and as such sold and delivered them to the plaintiff Williams. Williams supposed he was buying the horses absolutely, and both he and Kelly testified that the sale was intended as an absolute sale. Nevertheless, it was found that the transaction between Ashe and Kelly was that of a pledgor and pledgee. Ashe having got possession of the horses, Williams brought an action to recover them. The jury in the case returned a verdict for the plaintiff, Williams, for the return of the property, and found the value of his interest in said property to be the sum of $4,909.74. The judgment following this verdict was for the return of the horses to plaintiff, and decreeing a lien upon them for the sum named. Defendant Ashe appealed from the judgment. In the opinion of this court it is said: "Williams, it is to be remembered, is suing primarily for the recovery of the possession of the horses, and is basing his claim upon an absolute purchase of them from Kelly. Kelly insists that he was the owner, and sold the horses (and not any pledgee's interest in them) to Williams; that Ashe's debt to him had been completely extinguished, and that the relation of creditor and debtor did not exist between them at the time he made the sale. Ashe, upon the other hand, has the horses in possession, and asserts that Kelly was but a pledgee; and, having sold contrary to his rights as pledgee, having repudiated the pledge and asserted ownership,—in short, having made a wrongful conversion of the property,—the lien is extinguished, and he is entitled to retain possession against both of them. So far as concerns the rights of one who has a mere lien, as distinguished from one who claims as pledgee, the question has been answered repeatedly. It is the general rule that a lienholder who refuses, upon proper demand, to deliver the property without setting up his lien thereon, or who bases his refusal upon a claim other than that of lien, waives his right to claim a lien after action commenced. It is so held in this state by the cases of Lehmann v. Schmidt, 87 Cal. 15, 25 Pac. 161, and Sutton v. Stephan, 101 Cal. 545, 36 Pac. 106; and, from the number and uniformity of the authorities examined, it may with safety be said that this rule is universal. Section 2910 of the Civil Code enunciates the same principle. "It is also the rule that if one having but a lien is sued in replevin, and answers claiming absolute ownership, he will not be permitted upon the trial to assert any right as lienor. His lien is absolutely lost. [Citing a number of cases from other states.] * * * The latter rule is, however, subject to this manifestly just limitation that, if one who has claimed as owner is afterwards proved to have but a lien, he shall not thereafter be deprived absolutely of his lien, if his claim was honestly, though mistakenly, entertained and pressed; but, before he can be allowed his lien, he must abandon the false claim of ownership." Again: "But in the case of a pledgee the rule is otherwise. The reason for the distinction seems to be based upon two considerations: First, that the pledgee has a special property in the chattels which the other class does not possess; second, that a contract of pledge carries with it the implication that the security may be sold to discharge the obligation, while in case of a lien (except as aided by statute) the right of lien is not understood to carry with it any general right of sale. Story, Bailm. §§ 311-325. But, whatever may be the foundations for the distinction, it is now most firmly established in the law that a pledgee may sell or assign either the property or his interest in it to a bona fide purchaser, who will be allowed to hold the property until the extinguishment of the original obligation." The sale in this case, not being in accordance with law, simply passed to the purchaser the rights held by the defendant bank, and if suit had been brought against such purchaser by the plaintiff he would have been required to pay or tender only the same sum that he is required to pay or tender, as against the defendant bank, the pledgee. This court, in the case of Williams v. Ashe, 111 Cal. 180, 43 Pac. 595, says:

"But, after this brief consideration of a few of the cases, it remains to be added that in this state the question was early considered, and decided in accordance with the foregoing views, in the case of Dewey v. Bowman, 8 Cal. 145, wherein it is declared that, if a pledgee sells the property absolutely, without demand or notice to one having full knowledge of his title, while the absolute title does not pass, still the property remains in the hands of the purchaser as a pledge, with the rights to the purchaser which were enjoyed by the original pledgee." See, also, Belden v. Perkins, 78 Ill. 449, and Talty v. Trust Co., 93 U. S. 321. The plaintiff, having transferred or indorsed the stock in blank, and delivered the same to his agent, with power to negotiate or pledge the same, cannot recover from a pledgee of such agent, who took it in good faith and for value, without refunding or offering to refund the amount advanced by the second party, to whom it was so pledged. In McNeill v. Bank, 46 N. Y. 325, it was held that an innocent subpledgee was entitled, as against the original pledgor, to hold the stock for the full amount advanced by the subpledgee. The opinion proceeds: "Where the true owner holds out another, or allows him to appear, as the owner of or as having full power of disposition over the property, and innocent third parties are thus led into dealing with such apparent owner, they will be protected. Their rights in such cases do not depend upon the actual title or authority of the parties with whom they deal directly, but are derived from the acts of the real owner, which preclude him from disputing, as against them, the existence of the title or power which, through negligence or mistaken confidence, he caused or allowed to appear to be vested in the party making the conveyance." Again: "The common practice of passing the title to stock by delivery of the certificate, with blank assignment and power, has been repeatedly shown and sanctioned in cases which have come before our courts. * * * A blank transfer on the back of the certificate to which the holder has affixed his name is a good assignment, and a party to whom it is delivered is authorized to fill it up by writing a transfer and power of attorney over the signature." Civ. Code, § 2991.

2. Another contention on the part of the appellant is that the court below erred in excluding the defendant's assignment to Chickering, and Chickering's assignment to plaintiff, of the claims of the defendant against Bowman and his insolvent estate. The basis of this contention, as appears in the briefs and by the oral argument of the appellant's counsel, is that by this sale the bank had no further claim against Bowman against which to offset or recoup the stock or the proceeds thereof. As appears from the foregoing statement of facts, the original certificate of stock was surrendered to the Bank of California, and a new certificate issued to the defendant. This was held by the defendant in lieu of the former, as a pledge to secure its account for money loaned Bowman; and this account was much greater than the value of the stock at the time of plaintiff's demand, October 17, 1884. When the plaintiff demanded the stock, he made no offer to pay the indebtedness of Bowman for which it was held in pledge, or any part of it; and, the demand being refused, the defendant held the new certificate as such pledgee up to the sale of the stock in August, 1885. After the sale, as already stated, the proceeds thereof were applied on the Bowman indebtedness, leaving still a large balance of indebtedness from Bowman to the bank. The claim filed by the bank in the insolvency proceeding was long after this sale and was for the balance only of the overdraft account or indebtedness of Bowman to the bank, after deducting the proceeds of such sale. The amount received on the Chickering assignment was $4,616.73, as already stated. Appellant, however, claims that the defendant could not apply the proceeds of the stock sold in August, 1885, to the overdraft account of Bowman, but was obliged to keep such proceeds in lieu of the stock, subject to the demand of the plaintiff. But the defendant did apply such proceeds to the Bowman account, and this action is brought for the conversion of said stock by reason of such sale, and the application of the proceeds by the defendant, as aforesaid. Besides, the matter offered in evidence was not relevant to the issues presented by the last amended complaint and the answer thereto, on which the action was tried. It appears, however, that during the trial the plaintiff asked leave of the court to add a paragraph to his last amended complaint, pleading the matter of the assignment by the defendant of its claim in the insolvency proceeding of Bowman, but the court refused to grant such leave, and the appellant assigns this as one of the errors. The matter of granting or refusing leave to amend is very largely in the discretion of the trial court, and we cannot say that in this instance, taking into consideration the time when the application was made, there was any abuse of discretion to refuse the application.

3. At the time of the transaction between Bowman and the bank, as already stated, he was a director in the bank. Civ. Code, § 578, declares that no director or officer of any savings and loan corporation must, directly or indirectly, for himself or as the partner or agent of others, borrow any of the deposits or other funds of such corporation, and declares that the office of any director or officer who acts in contravention of this provision shall immediately thereupon become vacant. This, however, is of no advantage to the appellant, as the violation of the provision in question could only be availed of at the instance of the state or sovereign power. Jones v. Indemnity Co., 101 U. S. 628; Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621. Besides, the transaction was executed,

In Bank v. Burns, 104 Cal. 473, 38 Pac. 102, the court, in answering a similar contention that the transaction was void as being in contravention of the provision of the Code, says: "We do not think this contention can be sustained. The obvious purpose of the section of the Code invoked and relied upon was to protect savings banks and their depositors. To hold, therefore, that if the deposits or funds of such a bank should be borrowed by any of its officers, directly or indirectly, no action could be maintained by the bank to recover the money, would often work out great injustice and wrong." The bank, therefore, could have sued Bowman to recover back the money loaned, and it can hold the pledged stock or its proceeds in a suit for the recovery of the same until such money lent on the faith of such pledge is repaid.

4. Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, in that the evidence, as claimed, shows that when the plaintiff demanded the stock defendant asserted the unqualified ownership thereof, and refused to deliver it on that ground. This is contested by defendant, and there is a substantial conflict in the evidence in reference to this, and the jury found by its verdict for the defendant. In such case, it must be assumed by this court that the facts are in accordance with the defendant's contention on this point.

5. Appellant challenges the correctness of some of the instructions given at the request of the defendant, and of the refusal to give other instructions offered by the plaintiff, and also some of the court's charges to the jury. But, taking the instructions and charges all together, they presented the case fairly to the jury.

It will not be necessary to notice in detail the other points presented on behalf of the appellant. It is sufficient to say that we see no errors in any of them prejudicial to the appellant, or which would justify a reversal. The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

HOLLADAY v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 1,298.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. May 3, 1899.)

SAN FRANCISCO PUEBLO LANDS — DONATION — ORDINANCES.

On June 20, 1855, the city of San Francisco adopted Ordinance No. 822, known as the "Van Ness Ordinance," relinquishing and granting all of the right and claim of the city to lands within its corporate limits to persons who were in actual possession thereof prior to January 1, 1855. On September 25, 1855, it adopted Ordinance No. 845, providing for a map exhibiting the streets and grounds reserved for use of the city; and thereafter the so-called Van Ness map was prepared, and on October 16, 1856, adopted by the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, by order declaring it to be the plan of the city in respect to the location and establishment of streets and avenues, and the reservation of squares and lots for public purposes. On March 11, 1858, the legislature ratified the ordinances and order (St. 1858, pp. 52-56); and on July 1, 1864, congress passed an act (13 Stat. 333) providing that all the right and title of the United States to lands within the city limits, as defined April 15, 1851, was relinquished to the city for the uses and purposes specified in the ordinances.

Held, that Ordinance No. 822 did not itself operate to convey title to one who was in possession of land at the time when it was passed, but that it derived its force from the act of the legislature, and the act of congress confirming it, and that a square designated on the Van Ness map as a public park was dedicated to a public use by reason of these acts, and one claiming and in possession of land in such park prior to January 1, 1855, did not acquire title thereto by such possession.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by S. W. Holladay against the city and county of San Francisco. From a judgment for defendant, and certain orders, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

S. W. & E. B. Holladay, L. D. McKisick, and Jefferson Chandler, for appellant. H. T. Cresswell and Gaillard Stoney, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Plaintiff claims to be the owner of a half block of land lying along the south side of Washington street, between Gough and Octavia streets, in the city and county of San Francisco, and prosecutes this action to quiet his title thereto. Said half block is parcel of the lands to which the city, early in its history, laid claim as successor of the former Mexican pueblo. On June 20, 1855, the common council of the city passed Ordinance No. 822,—the so-called "Van Ness Ordinance,"—the second section whereof proceeded as follows: "The city of San Francisco hereby relinquishes and grants all the right and claim of the city to the lands within the corporate limits to the parties in the actual possession thereof, by themselves or tenants, on or before the first day of January, A. D. 1855, and to their heirs and assigns forever; * * * provided, such possession has been continued up to the time of the introduction of this ordinance in the common council," etc. There were various exceptions, of no present concern; and by section 4 of the ordinance the city reserved to itself "such lots and lands as may be selected and reserved for streets and other public purposes under the provisions of the next succeeding sections." Section 10 of the same provided that application should be made to the legislature to confirm and ratify the ordinance, and to congress to relinquish the right and title of the United States to the said lands for the uses and purposes in the ordinance specified. On September 27, 1855, said common council passed Ordinance No. 845, providing, among other things, for the preparation of a plan exhibiting the streets and other grounds reserved for the use of the city, and to be selected and located pursuant to the former ordinance (No. 822). Thereafter, ostensibly under authority of said ordinances, a map or plan, commonly known as the "Van Ness Map," was prepared by a commission chosen by the common council, upon which was delineated, as set apart for public use, a square called "Lafayette Park," including the premises here in controversy; and on October 16, 1856, a body acting as the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco (the act of April 19, 1856, consolidating the government of the city and county, having meanwhile gone into effect) passed an order in terms adopting the said map, and declaring it to be the plan of the city "in respect to the location and establishment of streets and avenues, and the reservation of squares and lots for public purposes," in the portion of the city to which the same related. The selection so made of land for said park was after the time limited for that purpose by the ordinances had expired, and in some other important respects transcended their provisions. The legislature of this state, by an act approved March 11, 1858, declared that the said ordinances and order "be and the same are hereby ratified and confirmed." St. 1858, pp. 52-56. By the act of congress approved July 1, 1864, entitled "An act to expedite the settlement of titles to lands in the state of California," all the right and title of the United States to the lands within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco, as defined on April 15, 1851 (which included the site of said Lafayette Park), was relinquished to the city and its successors "for the uses and purposes specified in the ordinances of said city ratified by" the aforesaid act of the legislature of March 11, 1858. Some reservations are specified in the act of congress not affecting the present case. 13 Stat. 333. The court below found as a fact that under and by virtue of the ordinances aforesaid, and the said acts of the legislature and congress, respectively, the land described in the complaint was reserved and set apart and dedicated to public use as and for the park aforesaid; also, that the defendant is seised in fee and entitled to the possession thereof in trust for the benefit of the people of the state and of the city, for the purposes of a public park. The court further found, however, that such land has never been used as a park, and that defendant has never had actual possession thereof, but that plaintiff is, and his predecessors in interest ever since and long prior to January 1, 1855, have been, in the open and exclusive possession of the land, claiming to own the same as against the whole world. The judgment was that plaintiff take nothing, and that defendant is the owner and entitled to possession in trust, as declared in the finding.

A fuller history of the legislation above mentioned, and of the title of the city to the pueblo lands, and of the proceedings for the selection of public grounds under the Van Ness ordinance, appears in the reports of some of the cases presently to be cited; notably, in Hoadley v. City and County of San Francisco, 50 Cal. 265; Id., 70 Cal. 320, 12 Pac. 125; Id., 124 U. S. 639, 8 Sup. Ct. 659,—which involved the right of the city to portions of certain other squares, upon circumstances substantially the same as those of the present case. The plaintiff here contends that many decisions which have been rendered concerning the Van Ness ordinance proceed on a false assumption, viz. that the ordinance became effective in consequence of the statutory ratification thereof, and not of its own vigor. Treating as void the attempt of the city officials to dedicate the land to the uses of a park, his chief contention is that the ordinance itself operated to convey the title to his predecessors in possession at the time it was passed; that the legislature had no right to ratify the ordinance, and no right to ratify the order adopting the map; and this, he urges, is a new question in this court.

It is unnecessary to investigate anew the nature and foundations of the title of the city to the pueblo lands. No claim is made that any private right had attached to the land in controversy at the time of the conquest of the country, in 1846; and the title, with that to other unappropriated lands of the pueblo, undoubtedly passed to the United States. People v. Holladay, 68 Cal. 439, 443, 9 Pac. 655; Association v. Knight, 85 Cal. 470, 24 Pac. 818; Galvin v. Palmer, 113 Cal. 52, 45 Pac. 172; Palmer v. Low, 98 U. S. 16; U. S. v. City of Santa Fé, 165 U. S. 701 et seq., 17 Sup. Ct. 472; U. S. v. Sandoval, 167 U. S. 296-298, 17 Sup. Ct. 868. True, the city, as successor of the pueblo, had an inchoate and imperfect right in the land, which was at length, with divers restrictions, confirmed by the United States; but, as has been often held, this was a qualified right,—a trust for the benefit of the inhabitants of the city, and subject to governmental control. Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530, 580, 581; Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 220, 233; Grogan v. City of San Francisco, 18 Cal. 592; Baker v. Brickell, 87 Cal. 334, 25 Pac. 489, 1067, and cases cited; Board v. Martin, 92 Cal. 209, 217, 28 Pac. 799; Ames v. City of San Diego, 101 Cal. 392, 393, 35 Pac. 1005; Grisar v. McDowell, 6 Wall. 363; City and County of San Francisco v. Le Roy, 138 U. S. 656, 667, 11 Sup. Ct. 364. To what extent this power of control resided in the state of California, and to what extent in the United States, is a matter of no great importance here, since both governments assumed to ratify the ordinance substantially upon the terms imposed by the state. City and County of San Francisco v. Le Roy, supra.

The elaborate argument of the plaintiff is largely an effort to show that no reason existed for confirmation of the ordinance by any superior authority whatever. We attempt no exhaustive response to the question, but may observe: (1) The city could alienate its pueblo lands only in accordance with the trust upon which they were held. City of San Francisco v. Canavan, 42 Cal. 542. (2) As the city held the land in trust for all its inhabitants, the wholesale donation contemplated by the ordinance, to persons who had no higher right than mere occupancy, without regard to the extent of their occupation,—whether or not in excess of the building lots and patches for cultivation which the pueblo authorities might have alienated,—certainly tended to subvert the trust with which the city was clothed. The power to make such a grant, if it existed in the city unchecked, might readily have created “a monopoly in the hands of a few of what was before the right of all.” Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 568, 581; Redding v. White, 27 Cal. 285. (3) The predecessors in interest of the plaintiff, who were in possession at and prior to the time of the passage of the Van Ness ordinance, made no claim to the land under grant from any alcalde or other municipal authority. On the contrary, they occupied the land adversely to the city. It is not apparent how the city owed a duty to, or was charged with a trust in favor of, persons who denied its title, and with hostile intent invaded its possession. (4) The ordinance shows on its face (section 10) that the common council regarded the grant as provisional, and subject to further legislative action. Hoadley's Adm'rs v. City and County of San Francisco, 124 U. S. 646, 8 Sup. Ct. 659. (5) The paramount title being in the United States, and the inchoate title of the city being liable to modification by the government of the United States (Grisar v. McDowell, 6 Wall. 365), the common council was incompetent by ordinance to divest that government of the power of such modification. See People v. Holladay, 68 Cal. 439, 9 Pac. 655; Board v. Martin, 92 Cal. 210, 28 Pac. 799; City and County of San Francisco v. Le Roy, 138 U. S. 656, 11 Sup. Ct. 364. Upon whatever grounds the view is founded, it is certain that the courts have uniformly, so far as we discover, assumed that, as an instrument for the transmission of title into private hands, the Van Ness ordinance derives its force from the legislation confirmatory thereof; and in some instances it has been distinctly so ruled. Valentine v. Mahoney, 37 Cal. 389; Hoadley v. City and County of San Francisco, 50 Cal. 265, 273; Id., 70 Cal. 320, 12 Pac. 125; Id., 124 U. S. 639, 646, 8 Sup. Ct. 659. It appearing that the ordinance was of its own force inoperative to convey the land in contest to plaintiff's predecessors, the result is, as remarked in the case last cited (124 U. S. 646, 8 Sup. Ct. 663), that: “The ordinance granted only such title as the city was permitted by congress and the state to convey. In its legal effect, the act of congress conveyed the lands to the city for the uses and purposes specified in the ordinances and the order of the city ratified by the act of the legislature. In this way the * * * squares, as designated in the report of the commissioners, * * * were dedicated to public use.” Sawyer v. City and County of San Francisco, 50 Cal. 370; People v. Holladay, 93 Cal. 241, 29 Pac. 54; San Francisco v. Mooney, 106 Cal. 586, 39 Pac. 852.

Plaintiff further argues that “one of the most vital and controlling questions in the case is, what effect is to be given to the decree of the United States circuit court of the 18th of May, 1865, confirming the claim of the city to the pueblo lands?" Inasmuch as that decree contained a declaration of its own purpose, as follows: "This confirmation is in trust for the benefit of the lot holders under grants from the pueblo, town, or city of San Francisco, or other competent authority, and as to any residue in trust for the use and benefit of the inhabitants of the city;" and since, as has appeared, the land in dispute was not granted to plaintiff's predecessors by the city, but, on the contrary, was dedicated by competent authority to public use,—we cannot think he is aided by said decree. Mills v. City of Los Angeles, 90 Cal. 523, 27 Pac. 354. See U. S. v. City of Santa Fe, 165 U. S. 699 et seq., 17 Sup. Ct. 472. Other views advanced by plaintiff are either sufficiently covered by the foregoing remarks, or have been ruled adversely to him in previous cases. It is so of his contentions that the Van Ness ordinance was a contract between the city and the possessors of the land, and not subject to legislative impairment; that dedication could not be made of the city's land held in adverse possession, and that compensation to the persons in such possession was necessary (Hoadley v. City and County of San Francisco, 70 Cal. 320, 325, 12 Pac. 125; Id., 124 U. S. 639, 646, 8 Sup. Ct. 659; Sawyer v. City and County of San Francisco, 50 Cal. 370; Mills v. City of Los Angeles, 90 Cal. 522, 27 Pac. 354), and that irregularity or invalidity of the proceedings of the commissioners who selected and mapped the land as a park was beyond the curative power of the legislature (City and County of San Francisco v. Mooney, 106 Cal. 586, 39 Pac. 852, and cases cited); and that he has acquired title by adverse possession (Hoadley v. City and County of San Francisco, 50 Cal. 265; Board v. Martin, 92 Cal. 210, 28 Pac. 799; City and County of San Francisco v. Bradbury, 92 Cal. 414, 28 Pac. 803).

We are aware that this opinion is but a threshing over of the straw of long-past litigation. We have, however, upon the urgent insistence of plaintiff, given attentive consideration to the grounds upon which rest some of the more important decisions cited, and perceive no sufficient reason for recommending the disturbance of any of them. The judgment and orders appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

VAN DYKE, J. I concur in the judgment, for the reason that the questions involved in this case, by repeated decisions both of this court and the supreme court of the United States, have become settled, and should not now be disturbed.

FISK et al. v. MITCHELL et al. (Sac. 577.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 3, 1899.)
JUSTICE COURTS—DOCKET ENTRIES—JURISDICTION.

In an action on a default justice's judgment, the jurisdiction of the justice over defendant is not shown by proof of an entry in the justice's docket of the fact of service of the summons on him, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 911, 912, requiring the justice to enter in his docket the date of the summons and the time of its return, without providing for the entering of the fact of service, and providing that the entry of the date of the summons and time of its return shall be prima facie proof of the facts therein stated.

Commissioners' decision, department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Action by A. G. Fisk and others, as executors of Asa Fisk, deceased, against F. D. Mitchell and L. H. Brown. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Brown appeals. Reversed.

J. B. Devine, for appellant. Newman & Clayton, for respondents.

BRITT, C. Action on a judgment alleged to have been duly given and made in favor of plaintiffs' testator in a suit by him against Mitchell and Brown in the justice's court of the city and county of San Francisco. Such judgment was taken by default upon failure of said defendants to appear in the justice's court. By his answer in the present case Brown raised the issue whether said judgment was duly given and made. Upon this issue plaintiffs introduced in evidence an abstract of the judgment itself, and also a transcript of the justice's docket entries pertaining thereto. Such entries showed the filing of a complaint by Asa Fisk, the testator, against the defendants, and that summons was issued; also the following: "May 26, 1892. Summons ret'd. served on defts. Mitchell and Brown, May 10 and 20, '92, and filed." There was no other proof that service of summons in that action was made. The court below, in this case, however, seems to have considered it sufficient, and rendered judgment for plaintiffs. By section 911, Code Civ. Proc., every justice is required to enter certain specified proceedings in his docket, and the next section (912) declares such entries to be prima facie evidence of the facts stated. The fault of plaintiffs' proof is that these sections do not require the fact of service of summons to be entered in the docket, and hence do not impart to such entry, if made, the character of prima facie evidence. The provision of section 911 relating to the summons is merely that its date and the time of its return shall be stated in the docket. It follows that plaintiff failed to sustain the burden of showing affirmatively that the justice's court acquired jurisdiction to render the judgment sued on. Kane v. Desmond, 63 Cal. 464. The judgment appealed from should be reversed, with directions to the court below to grant a new trial.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is reversed, with directions to the court below to grant a new trial.

GILL v. CITY OF OAKLAND. (S. F. 1,288.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 2, 1899.)

MUNICIPALITIES—OPENING STREETS—ASSESSMENTS —OBJECTIONS—COUNCIL—ADJOURNMENT—NOTICE —PAYMENT UNDER PROTEST—CLOUD ON TITLE—LIABILITY OF CITY.

1. Under St. 1889, p. 76, § 20, providing that, if there be a deficiency in assessment for opening a street, or for any cause it appeared desirable, the council might order supplemental assessment, a second supplemental assessment was authorized where a deficiency occurred.

2. Where, under St. 1889, p. 73, § 14, requiring the city clerk to notify objectors to the report of commissioners of assessment of the time for hearing objections and passing on the report by the council, the clerk notified an objector of the exact hour the report would be considered, but the council met an hour before that time, and adjourned to the next night for want of a quorum, and the objector was present at the hour fixed in his notice, and found the council chamber closed, and had no actual notice of the adjourned meeting, and made no inquiry of the clerk regarding it, the action of the council at such meeting in passing on the report and overruling his objections was void.

3. Under St. 1889, p. 73, § 16, making the deed of the superintendent of streets prima facie evidence of the regularity of proceedings to open a street, and conclusive evidence of the necessity of taking the land, and of the correctness of the compensation awarded therefor, the payment of a void assessment under protest to prevent sale and clouding of title was not voluntary, so as to preclude recovery.

4. Under St. 1889, p. 70, whereby the council authorizes an assessment for opening streets, conducts all the proceedings, requires the fund raised to be paid to the city treasurer, who places it in a separate fund designated by the name of the street to be opened, the city retaining control of the fund from first to last through its proper officers, a distinct organization, separate from the city, to wit, a street-opening district, was not created, of which the city became merely a creditor because of advancing money to it; and the liability of the city for an assessment illegally collected was not affected by the fact that it was to reimburse a fund transferred to the street-opening fund, and that plaintiff's money was not in fact used for street-opening expenses.

5. It is no defense to an action against a city that the claim was not presented to, nor acted on by, the council, the charter nowhere requiring it.

6. Where the statute clothes a street superintendent with authority to convey good title to land on which a street assessment is delinquent, one suing for an assessment illegally collected need not show the former's authority to carry out a threat to sell; the complaint showing that the tax was delinquent when paid, and that a deed would have carried good title.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county.

Action by Edward Gill against the city of Oakland. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Dow, for appellant. J. H. Smith, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to recover $2,405.20 alleged to have been paid by plaintiff to the street superintendent of defendant, under protest, as an assessment in a street opening. The city of Oakland by its council, in 1889, adopted a resolution of intention to open and extend Filbert street in said city between certain points. The proceedings were taken under the street-opening act of 1889 (St. 1889, p. 70). No question arises as to the regularity of the proceedings and the collection of the assessment as originally levied. A deficiency occurred of $6,641.31 in the collections under the assessment, to meet which the council advanced this amount by transfer from the general fund of the city, pursuant to section 18 of the act, and upon condition that the general fund should be reimbursed out of a supplemental assessment thereafter to be made. Such supplemental assessment was duly made, and no question arises out of this supplemental assessment. But, after the collection of the whole of this assessment, there still remained a deficiency in the street-opening fund of $3,315.45 to meet the fund transferred from the general fund. A second supplemental assessment was ordered for the purpose of reimbursing the city in full, and to pay the expenses incident to the levy and collection of such supplemental assessment. The commissioners filed their report and second supplemental assessment with said council, showing an assessment against plaintiff of $2,405.20. Plaintiff and others filed written objections to the confirmation of said report and assessment, which objections were set down to be heard September 19, 1892, at 9:15 o'clock p. m., of which hearing plaintiff had due notice. A question arises as to whether plaintiff was bound by the action of the council at this and the meeting which followed the next night. The findings as to these two meetings are as follows: "That at the time set for the hearing of his objections filed to the report of the commissioners, as alleged in section 14 of said amended complaint, there was no session of the said council; that some time prior on that night to the time set for said hearing one member of said city council was present in the council chamber of said council, together with the clerk of said council, and then and there declared the meeting of said council set for that night adjourned to a succeeding night, and that said adjournment was then and there entered by the said clerk upon the minutes of said council; that said plaintiff was not present at said adjournment; that he had no notice thereof, and was not present at said succeeding meeting, and had no notice thereof, and that at said succeeding meeting said council took up said objections and passed upon them, without sustaining them or any of them, and then and there confirmed and adopted said report of said commissioners." On the 22d day of September, 1892, the street superintendent published the fact that he had received the assessment roll containing the assessment against plaintiff's property, and notifying the public that the assessment would become delinquent if the assessments were not paid before the expiration of 30 days thereafter. Within five days after the expiration of the time, as above stated, the said superintendent caused to be published a notice that he would sell at public sale, on November 19, 1892, all lands within said assessment district upon which said second supplemental assessments were not paid, and for the purpose of paying the same. Plaintiff's lots were included among the delinquents. Whereupon, to avoid the sale, he paid the assessment under protest. The finding on this point is: "That said plaintiff did on the 18th day of November, 1892, pay to the said superintendent of streets the said sum of $2,405.20, and under protest as alleged in section 17 of said amended complaint, and that he did pay the same to prevent his said lots of land from being sold for the nonpayment of said new supplemental assessment, and to prevent his title to said lots from being clouded." Plaintiff had judgment, from which and from an order denying its motion for a new trial defendant appeals.

1. Appellant's first contention is that the second supplemental assessment was authorized. Respondent denies this, and claims that the council exhausted its authority in making the first supplemental assessment. Section 20 of the act provides: "If * * * there should be a deficiency * * * or for any cause it appears desirable, the * * * city council may order a supplemental assessment, and report the same in manner and form as the original, and subject to the same procedure." Section 25 reads: "The provisions of this act shall be liberally construed to promote the objects thereof." Without resort to this latter section, we think a reasonable construction of the statute warranted the second supplemental assessment, if the proceedings were regularly pursued. This seems to us too plain to call for argument.

2. It is objected by respondent, however, that the assessment was void, for the reason "that the plaintiff was deprived of his right to appear before the city council at the hearing before it of his objections filed to the confirmation of the commissioners' report of their proceeding in the second supplemental assessment." The facts from which the finding above given was drawn are the following: The hearing of plaintiff's objections to the assessment, which he had duly filed with the city council, were set down for 9:15 p. m., September 19, 1892. The objections were that the council had no authority to make the assessment; that it was illegal and unequal; that plaintiff's property was assessed higher in proportion to other property in said district, and not in proportion to the benefits derived or damages suffered thereby. Plaintiff went to the city hall, the place of meeting of the council, about 9 p. m. of the day fixed for the hearing, and was there at the time fixed, and remained from eight to ten minutes after the time so fixed. Plaintiff testified: "The front door to the main entrance of the building was locked, and I could not get in the building. There were others there, and could not get in at the same time. I remained until after the time set for the hearing, and then left. I had no notice served upon me of an adjournment of the hearing of that evening to any other time. I was not present the next evening when my objections were taken up and passed upon by the council, and had no actual notice of the time the hearing was to be had, or of the adjournment from the 19th to the 20th." He further testified: "During the office hours of September 20, 1892, I did not call at the city clerk's office; nor did I make any endeavor to ascertain anything in connection with the hearing of said objections, nor did any one in my behalf." The minutes of the council show that a regular meeting was called to order by the clerk on September 19th (hour not given). Upon roll call, only one councilman (MacDonald) was present, and ten were entered absent. The minutes read: "There being no quorum present, Mr. MacDonald moved the council adjourn to meet Tuesday, September 20, 1892, at 8 p. m. So ordered. The council then adjourned. By J. M. Brady, City Clerk." The minutes of the meeting September 20th read: "An adjourned meeting of the Oakland city council was held on the above date." Upon roll call, seven members were found to be present, and four absent. "The hour of 9:15 p. m. having arrived, it having been set as the time for hearing the protest of James Borland and others against confirming the new supplementary assessment for the opening of Filbert street, the president declared the said hearing in order." The minutes show the proceedings as to the protestants present and those "not appearing," among whom it is conceded was plaintiff, and that all objections were overruled. It will be observed that the adjournment of the 19th did not fix the hour for hearing plaintiff's objections on the 20th, so that an examination of the minutes would not have informed him at what hour to attend on the 20th. The act requires the commissioners to file their report of the assessment with the clerk, and the clerk to give notice, by publication, of such filing, requiring all interested persons to show cause why the report should not be confirmed, and the clerk must fix the day for the hearing, which must be stated in said notice. Section 13. Objections must be in writing and be filed with the clerk, "who shall, at the next meeting after the day fixed in the notice to show cause, lay the said objections, if any, before the city council, which shall fix a time for hearing the same, of which the clerk shall notify the objectors; * * * and at such time * * * shall proceed to pass upon such report," etc. Section 14. It appears from the complaint and answer that Councilman MacDonald and Clerk Brady attended at the council chamber on September 19th, at the hour of 8 o'clock p. m., and adjourned the meeting, record of which has been stated above.

Had plaintiff notice of the adjourned meeting of September 20th? We do not think he had, and we are of the opinion that the proceedings were therefore, as to him, unauthorized and void. The statute conferred the right to notice, without giving which the council could not pass upon his objections. Williams v. Bergin, 108 Cal. 166, 41 Pac. 287; Schwiesau v. Mahon, 110 Cal. 5+3, 42 Pac. 1065. Upon the power to adjourn a meeting, Mr. Dillon states the rule to be that "a regular meeting [which this appears to have been], unless special provision is made to the contrary, may adjourn to a future fixed day; and at such meeting it will be lawful to transact any business which might have been transacted at the stated meeting, of which it is, indeed, but the continuation." Dill. Mun. Corp. 287. The statute gave to plaintiff the right to be heard at the time and place noticed. He was not bound to attend at an earlier time. It is alleged and not denied, and is found by the court as the fact, that the time for hearing plaintiff's objections was fixed at a stated hour, and the court on sufficient evidence found that there was no session or meeting of the council at that hour. The only meeting held by the council on that day was more than one hour previous to the noticed hearing, and for what purpose it then met is not shown. It was, we suppose, a regular meeting, and may be conceded to have been called for regular business; but the meeting to consider objections was called for the hour of 9:15, and we do not think that that business could have been transacted at 8 p. m., in the absence and without the consent of the parties interested; nor could the council at 8 p. m., without notice to and without the consent and in the absence of such interested parties, adjourn a hearing fixed for the hour of 9:15 p. m. It was the duty of Mr. MacDonald, the sole attending councilman, to remain at the council chamber until the hour fixed by the council for this hearing, namely, 9:15 p. m. Had he done this, his action in adjourning the hearing at that time would have given actual notice to plaintiff, who was there and then in attendance; and, if plaintiff had not been present, he could not be heard to complain of an adjournment of the hearing, of which he had due notice. Plaintiff was not bound to make inquiry from the clerk as to what had taken place at some previous hour of the day by the council, and had he done so, as we have seen, it would not have enlightened him. As we view the matter, the session held at 8 o'clock (if it can be called a session) had no power to act upon plaintiff's objections at that hour, and the council got no greater power by the adjournment than it had at the hour it adjourned. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 267, and note. By failure to meet at 9:15, and either act upon plaintiff's objections or adjourn the hearing to a day and hour certain, the council lost jurisdiction to consider the objections without a new notice to plaintiff.

3. Appellant contends that, even if the proceedings were void, plaintiff's payment was voluntary, and the money cannot now be recovered. The act of 1889 (section 16) makes the deed of the superintendent of streets prima facie evidence of the regularity of the proceedings thereunder, and is made "conclusive evidence of the necessity of taking or damaging the lands taken or damaged, and of the correctness of the compensation awarded therefor." Under the rule stated in Pixley v. Huggins, 15 Cal. 128, many times approved by this court, the deed would cast a cloud upon plaintiff's title. It has been recently held here that, where an officer is about to sell property under a void assessment, he may be enjoined. Chase v. City Treasurer (opinion filed Dec. 2, 1898) 55 Pac. 414. This remedy was open to plaintiff in the present case. But it was not the only remedy available to him. He also had the right to pay the assessment under protest, setting forth the grounds of its illegality, in order to prevent the sale and clouding the title of his property; and he could look for relief in an action at law, which this is. The facts which gave the remedy of injunction gave the remedy at law, and payment after protest, under the circumstances here disclosed, was payment under duress. Where the deed shows on its face that the tax or assessment was void, or the law under which it was levied was invalid, a payment has been held to be voluntary, and not recoverable. Such were the facts in the cases cited by appellant. In the present case, however, plaintiff's rights would have been cut off if he had not paid the assessment or enjoined the sale. It is claimed by appellant that section 3819, Pol. Code, does not apply to local assessments,—citing Elberg v. San Luis Obispo Co., 112 Cal. 316, 41 Pac. 475, and 44 Pac. 572; Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. San Diego Co., 112 Cal. 314, 41 Pac. 423, and 44 Pac. 571; Davis v. City & County of San Francisco, 115 Cal. 67, 46 Pac. 863. Those cases are clearly distinguishable from this case. But we do not understand that this action rests upon the Code section cited, and it is not necessary to decide whether it does or does not apply. The money exacted from plaintiff under duress was not legally due, and might be recovered back irrespective of the Code provision. Meek v. McClure, 49 Cal. 623, citing the cases in which it is so held.

4. It is further claimed by appellant that the city of Oakland is not liable because the fund was for the use of, and to be disbursed by, another organization, to wit, a street-opening district within the city, of which the city was merely a creditor by reason of advancing money to it. We do not think that the act of 1889 creates a distinct organization, separate from the municipality, in the sense urged by appellant. The council authorizes the assessment. It conducts, through its agencies, all the proceedings; and the fund raised must be paid over to the city treasurer, who "shall, upon receipt thereof, place the same in a separate fund, designating such fund by the name of the street * * * or place for the * * * opening or other improvement of which the assessment was made." The city retains control of the fund from first to last through its proper officers. The court found, upon sufficient evidence, that the money paid by plaintiff was turned over to the city treasurer, "and was thereupon used by said city and appropriated by her to municipal purposes." We do not think the liability of the city is less because the assessment was for the purpose of reimbursing the fund transferred to the street-opening fund, and because plaintiff's money was not in fact used in street-opening expenses.

5. It is contended that plaintiff has no cause of action against defendant because the evidence fails to show that he presented his claim to the council, or that it was acted upon by the council. Respondent replies that there is no provision of the charter of the city of Oakland which requires a claim to be first presented to the council or city before a suit can be maintained upon it. Appellant has called our attention to no such provision, and we have found none. Section 40 does require that "every demand must, before it can be paid, be presented to the auditor to be approved." He must examine and approve or reject the claim. If he reject it, he must return it to the council, with his reasons for rejecting it, and a majority of the council may allow it upon the approval of the mayor, and it may then be audited. These and some other provisions are made for the allowance and payment of claims in the ordinary course; but no provision is made for actions against the city brought upon such or any claims. The evidence shows that plaintiff did present his claim to the auditor long before this suit was brought, who rejected it, and it was shortly afterwards sent to the council, and referred to the auditing committee; but no action is shown to have been taken on the claim by the council. We do not think the council could avoid the suit by refusing or neglecting to act upon the claim.

6. Appellant's remaining point is that the complaint fails to state a cause of action because it does not appear therein that the superintendent who threatened to sell plaintiff's property was clothed with authority, real or apparent, to carry out his threat, or that he would have made a deed to the purchaser if the assessment was not paid,—citing Bank v. Chalfant, 52 Cal. 170; Bank v. Webber, Id. 73; Bucknall v. Story, 46 Cal. 589. The Bank of Santa Rosa case was an action to recover a tax illegally assessed. It did not appear from the complaint that the tax was delinquent; nor that the defendant was, when he demanded payment of the tax, armed with authority, real or apparent, to carry out his threat to sell the property. Held no legal duress shown, and that payment was voluntary. In the other case cited in 52 Cal., the proof was that the tax was paid before it became delinquent, and before any threats were made to sell the property for its collection. Held not duress. The case in 46 Cal. was one where the assessment was void on its face. Payment of the tax was made under protest to prevent sale. Held voluntary. In the present case the proceedings of the council and of the superintendent up to the point of advertising the property for sale to pay the tax in question are fully set out. The statute clothed the street superintendent with ample authority to carry out his avowed purpose to sell. The tax was delinquent, and on the face of the proceedings a deed after sale would have conveyed a good title. We think the complaint was sufficient. It is advised that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. HOLLYWOOD CEMETERY ASS'N. (L. A. 525.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. May 2, 1899.)
CEMETERIES—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CLASS LEGISLATION.

1. The ordinance of Los Angeles county, prohibiting the establishment of cemeteries without permission of the county supervisors, is not a valid exercise of police power, within Const. art. 11, § 11, granting to municipal corporations the right to pass police regulations, since the ordinance does not regulate, but prohibits, the pursuit of a lawful business by making the right to exercise such calling dependent on the will of the supervisors.

2. A county ordinance prohibiting the establishment of cemeteries without the permission of the county supervisors is unconstitutional, since it permits the owners of established cemeteries to make burials without the restrictions which are placed on the owners of cemeteries established after its passage.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Suit by the county of Los Angeles against the Hollywood Cemetery Association. From an order overruling defendant's demurrer to the complaint, and from a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Edwin Baxter, for appellant. J. A. Donnell, Cole & Cole, and Silent & Campbell, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Injunction to restrain defendant from establishing a cemetery upon certain lands and interring human bodies therein. The complaint shows that the supervisors of Los Angeles county duly passed an ordinance, the first section of which reads: "It shall be unlawful to locate or establish, extend or enlarge, any cemetery, graveyard, burying ground, or crematory, within the limits of the county of Los Angeles, without the permission of the board of supervisors first had and obtained." The second section directs how to apply for such permission, and what facts shall be set forth in the petition therefor, and that 30 days' notice of the hearing of the petition shall be given by publication in some newspaper published in the county. The third and last section provides for publication of the ordinance. It is alleged that since said ordinance took effect defendant has located, and is now locating and establishing, a cemetery (upon certain lands described) situated in said county, "without the permission of the said board of supervisors first had and obtained, and contrary to and in violation of all the provisions of said ordinance." The complaint then sets out certain acts now being done by defendant in furtherance of its said purpose, and that it "will continue in the work of locating and establishing such cemetery, in violation of said ordinance, * * * and greatly to the injury of the entire neighborhood of the said location, unless restrained," etc. Defendant answered the order to show cause by general demurrer to the complaint and by certain affidavits, which latter were controverted by counter affidavits. The demurrer was overruled, and the court granted an injunction as prayed for, directing defendant to refrain from proceeding further to establish said cemetery and from burying any human bodies in the land described. Defendant appeals from the order overruling the demurrer, and from the judgment and order granting the writ, and from the writ.

The demurrer admits the allegations of the complaint, and raises the questions discussed by counsel. The trial court disposed of the case on the demurrer and on the sufficiency of the complaint. We shall therefore take no notice of the affidavits.

The contention of defendant is that the ordinance is violative of the fourteenth amendment of the federal constitution, and of section 11, art. 1, and section 11, art. 11, of our state constitution, and is an unreasonable exercise of the power to regulate, and therefore invalid. The ordinance before us simply makes it unlawful to establish a cemetery without using it for the burial of the dead; and the complaint does not charge in terms that defendant has used its land, or is about to use it, for the burial of the dead. Counsel on both sides, however, and the court as well, treat the ordinance and the complaint as aimed, not only at the dedication or establishment of the cemetery, but also at the burial of the dead therein. We shall, therefore, assume that the broader meaning of the word "cemetery" is intended in the ordinance and the complaint.

From the opinion of the learned judge who sat in the case (printed in the record), it is manifest that he regarded the establishment of a cemetery for the interment of human bodies "as an avocation which may be well presumed to have an injurious tendency." It is not so stated, but the opinion proceeds, I think, upon the assumption that a cemetery is a nuisance per se, or, at least, may be so regarded in measuring the extent of the police power to regulate it. We cannot concur in this view, nor can we concur in the position that the business of conducting a cemetery is an avocation presumably having an injurious tendency. We think, however, and in this we quite agree with the learned counsel for respondent, that there are many considerations, too obvious to require enumeration, which bring cemeteries within the power of reasonable regulation by both city and county municipalities.

Before proceeding further, it may be well to observe, as to this power of regulation given by our constitution to municipalities, while alike conferred upon cities, towns, and counties, that an ordinance passed pursuant thereto may be reasonable when confined to the limits of a city or town which would be entirely unreasonable when put in operation in all parts of a large county thinly populated in many of its parts. "Regulations proper for a large and prosperous city might be absurd or oppressive in a small and sparsely-populated town or in a county." Dill. Mun. Corp. § 327.

Article 11, § 11, of the constitution of this state, provides as follows: "Any county, city, town or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws." This section is reenacted in the county government act (section 25, Act April 1, 1897; St. 1897, p. 452). Of this provision it was said in Ex parte Sing Lee, 96 Cal. 354, 31 Pac. 245, as to cities and towns, that it is sufficiently broad and comprehensive to "sustain the enactment of any ordinance having a reasonable tendency to promote the health, comfort, safety, and welfare of all the inhabitants of the municipality, and which would not be in conflict with some general law."

Is the ordinance before us a reasonable exercise of the power conferred by the constitution and the statute upon boards of supervisors, and as applicable to counties? It cannot be assumed that the supervisors in the present case legislated with a view to reach the defendant's enterprise especially, or that they knew it was in contemplation when the ordinance was enacted. On the contrary, it must be presumed that their purpose was to promote the welfare of the inhabitants. The validity of the ordinance must be determined from its face alone. The ordinance makes it unlawful to establish, extend, or enlarge any cemetery within the limits of the county without the permission of the supervisors. It does not attempt to deal with or prohibit private interments, nor with interments in cemeteries already established. It declares that in no part of Los Angeles county, however remote from any city or town, even though the location be suitable for the purpose and entirely satisfactory to the neighboring inhabitants, no cemetery shall be established except by permission of the supervisors first obtained. As the ordinance is silent as to interments in cemeteries already established, it necessarily permits burials in such cemeteries without restriction, and thus allows the owners of cemeteries already established the right to exercise privileges denied to defendant. It is not unlawful to establish a cemetery for the burial of the dead, deriving profit therefrom as a business enterprise. To provide for the repose of the dead is as lawful as to provide for the comfort of the living. There are reasons why the burial of the dead should be subject to reasonable regulation which may not justify similar restrictions or regulations as to the homes of the living, but we can see no more reason why the right to establish cemeteries in a county should be subject to the will of the supervisors than that the right to engage in any other lawful enterprise should be so circumscribed. There is a wide difference between regulation and prohibition,—between regulatory provisions as a condition imposed for the exercise of a lawful occupation, and making the right itself to depend upon the unrestrained will of the municipality. It would hardly be contended that an ordinance declaring it to be unlawful to engage in the business of farming or merchandising in the county without the permission of the supervisors would be a reasonable exercise of legislative power, or could reasonably be said to be exercising the power to regulate. The supervisors may impose a license, the payment of which shall be a condition to the enjoyment of the privilege of engaging in lawful occupations; they may regulate the manner of conducting the business, if it be of a character tending to be injurious; but if the business be lawful, and having no injurious tendency, they cannot say who shall and who shall not exercise the right itself. Under the guise of regulating a business, the municipality cannot make prohibition possible by committing to the officers of the municipality the arbitrary power to deny permission to engage in that business. We do not think it was ever intended by the people, in ordaining the section of the constitution referred to, or of the legislature in the statutory enactment, to include, in the power to make and enforce regulations, a power purely personal and arbitrary; “for,” as was said by Matthews, J., in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 6 Sup. Ct. 1064, “the very idea that one man may be compelled to hold his life, or the means of living, or any material right essential to the enjoyment of life, at the mere will of another, seems to be intolerable in any country where freedom prevails, as being the essence of slavery.” In Austin v. Murray, 16 Pick. 121, the ordinance prohibited any person from bringing into the town of Charleston any dead body, or cause the same to be conveyed through the streets, or to be buried on the premises of such person, without a permit from the selectmen of the town. The court said that if the by-law had been limited to the populous part of town, and had been made in good faith, “for the purpose of preserving the health of the inhabitants, which may be in some degree exposed to danger by the allowance of interment in the midst of dense population, it would have been a very reasonable regulation. But it cannot be pretended that this by-law was made for the preservation of the health of the inhabitants. Its restraints extend many miles into the country, to the utmost limits of the town. Such an unnecessary restraint upon the right of interring the dead we think essentially unreasonable.” In State v. Mott, 61 Md. 297, the city council of Baltimore was granted power to pass ordinances to preserve the health of the city, to prevent and remove nuisances, prevent the introduction of contagious diseases within the city, and within three miles thereof regulate the places for manufacturing soap and candles, the erection of slaughter houses and distilleries, “and wherever every other offensive trade is carried on.” The city passed an ordinance making it unlawful for “any person * * * to work, operate, or continue in use, for the purpose of burning oyster shells or limestone, any kiln situated or erected within the limits of the city of Baltimore.” The ordinance was held to be void, because an absolute prohibition of a lawful occupation, which might, on the remote outskirts of the city, be carried on without injury to anyone.

2. Aside from the objections just considered, the ordinance is unequal in its operation. In Ex parte Bohen, 115 Cal. 372, 47 Pac. 55, an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco made it unlawful for any person to purchase or sell any land within the county for the purpose of interring any human body therein, but permitted interments in plots or lots belonging to persons, associations, or corporations, for their families or members. The ordinance was held to be unreasonable and invalid, as assuming to limit the privilege of burial to one class of citizens, and denying it to another class within the same district. It was further held that any restriction of the rights of the individual by virtue of the police power must extend to all individuals who might exercise the right. I am unable to distinguish this case from the one in hand. It is true the ordinance in Bohen's Case expressly gave to the then owners of lots the right to use them for burial purposes, while denying the right to any person who might thereafter purchase a burial lot. It differs from the Los Angeles county ordinance only by expressing in words what the latter clearly implies. Both ordinances discriminate in favor of a class of persons. The fact that the supervisors reserved the power to place all persons on an equality by granting permission does not relieve the ordinance from this objection. There is still a class with unrestricted rights which the other class may not exercise without permission, and whether this permission may or may not be granted rests in the arbitrary power of the supervisors. I can add nothing to the force of the reasoning in the Bohen Case, and the authorities there cited, in support of the principles laid down, need no reinforcement.

It is advised that the injunction be dissolved, and the order overruling the demurrer be reversed, with directions to sustain the demurrer.

PEOPLE v. PICETTI. (Cr. 522.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 4, 1899.)

LIMITATIONS—INDICTMENT—MISDEMEANORS.

Pen. Code, § 801, requiring indictment or information for a misdemeanor to be brought or filed within one year, applies where the information or indictment charges a felony, and defendant is convicted of a misdemeanor.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

John Picetti was convicted of petit larceny, and he appeals. Reversed.

Devoto & Demartini, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Ford, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant was informed against on the 12th day of September, 1898, by the district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco, for the crime of grand larceny, alleged to have been committed on the 15th day of March, 1897. He was tried and convicted of petit larceny. This appeal is taken from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

As the sole ground for this appeal it is claimed that, the defendant having been convicted of petit larceny, the judgment is void, inasmuch as the statute of limitations bars the prosecution of the defendant under such circumstances. This contention is based upon section 801 of the Penal Code, which provides: "An indictment for any misdemeanor must be found, or an information filed, within one year after its commission." Giving a liberal construction to this provision of the Code, we have arrived at the conclusion that the defendant should not have been convicted of the crime of petit larceny. To our surprise, we have been unable to find any provision of the law prescribing a limitation for the prosecution of ordinary or simple misdemeanor. But the provision quoted above does declare, in effect, that all misdemeanors prosecuted by indictment or information are barred by the statute of limitations in one year.

This defendant has been prosecuted by information, and has been convicted of a misdemeanor. He has, therefore, been prosecuted for a misdemeanor by information, and the one-year statute would seem to apply. By a strict construction of this provision of the Code it might be held that it only applied to those specific cases where the information or indictment upon its face charged a misdemeanor. But a more liberal construction would make the statute apply to all those cases where, under the indictment or information, the defendant may be and is convicted of a misdemeanor. Such construction should maintain, especially in view of the fact that otherwise, in every case where a defendant is prosecuted for felony and convicted of misdemeanor, there would be no statute of limitations which could be invoked. These conditions as to such convictions arise every day, and we conclude that the one-year statute of limitations should be held to apply to those cases. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

ACKLEY v. FISHBECK. (S. F. 972.)¹

APPEAL — ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS — RECORD — REVIEW.

1. An order denying a motion for a new trial will not be reviewed upon appeal, where the assignment of errors, though attached to the statement upon which the case is submitted, is not authenticated as a part of the record, and is excepted from the stipulation certifying to the contents of the transcript.

2. Where the judgment is supported by the findings of the inferior court, and there are no assignments of error, the appellate court will not examine the evidence to determine whether it supports the findings.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Edward Ackley against J. R. Fishbeck to recover upon an account for services rendered by plaintiff's assignor. There was judgment for a portion of plaintiff's claim, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Moses G. Cobb, for appellant. Wm. W. Guth, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action for services as physician rendered by plaintiff's assignor, Dr. Daywalt, to the wife of defendant, at the city and county of San Francisco, from February 1, 1892, to April 1, 1894, when the patient died. Plaintiff's counsel, in his brief, states the case as follows: "The wife's sickness was of a malignant character; and the physician's attendance and treatment was part of the time daily, and part of the time weekly or monthly, according as the disease advanced, or according to the wife's presence in or absence from San Francisco. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, the contention being, on the part of plaintiff, that the sickness treated was continuous and the same sickness throughout the whole time, and that the statute of outlawry only began to run from the termination of the service; that the last item in the account drew after it, or took in, all the preceding items, because a part of the same transaction." Defendant denied the indebtedness and pleaded the statute of limitation, and his contention was that each day's service was a separate cause of action, and the statute ran from each day, as the service was rendered. The court gave judgment for five days' attendance, or only those attendances that were within the two years before the complaint was filed. The appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying the motion for new trial, and comes here on a statement of the case.

1. The statement contains no assignment or specifications of errors. There is appended to the statement, but forming no part of it, what is designated as "Assignment of Errors," but it is not authenticated as part of the record, and is excepted from the stipulation certifying to the contents of the transcript. There is nothing to show that it was considered on the motion for a new trial. The appeal from the order is here, therefore, without any specifications of errors, and cannot be considered. Code Civ. Proc. § 659, subd. 3; Sprigg v. Barber, 122 Cal. 573, 55 Pac. 419, and cases there cited.

2. The appeal from the judgment alone can be considered, and we are to determine only whether the findings support the judgment. The court found that plaintiff's assignor attended defendant's wife at different times, "without any express agreement with her or with defendant to attend her for any stipulated length of time or any stipulated sum of money"; that Dr. Daywalt was "free to render his account for services up to any time, and collect for the same"; that he charged $3 for each visit to the house of defendant, and $2 for each visit at his office, which were reasonable charges, and that defendant's wife paid said doctor from time to time on account of his attendance, and that defendant and his said wife were free at any time to dispense with said doctor's services and employ another physician; that said doctor rendered a bill for $505 against defendant, no part of which has been paid; that said doctor attended plaintiff's wife on March 28, 29, 30, and 31, and April 1, 1894; that plaintiff brought suit March 28, 1896. And as conclusions of law the court found that all the items of service rendered more than two years prior to the commencement of the action were barred by the statute of limitations, and plaintiff could only recover for services rendered on and after March 28, 1896, to wit, the sum of $15 for visits on March 28, 29, 30, and 31, and April 1, 1894. Judgment was accordingly entered. The findings support the judgment, and, as we cannot examine the evidence to determine whether it supports the findings, the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

CAMPAN v. MOLLE et al. (L. A. 508.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 16, 1899.)

SALE OF LAND—LOAN OF PURCHASE PRICE—SUBROGATION TO VENDOR'S RIGHTS—HOMESTEAD—PRIORITY OF CLAIM.

1. Where a vendor of land retains the legal title until full payment of the price, so that he has no lien, one loaning the price to the vendee, who agrees to give a mortgage as security after receiving the legal title, which he refuses to do, has no claim to subrogation.

2. Civ. Code, § 1241 (4), makes a homestead claim superior to a mortgage lien created before filing of the declaration, unless such mortgage was executed and recorded prior thereto. Code Civ. Proc. § 726, prohibits more than one action to recover any debt or enforce any right secured by real-estate mortgage. One loaned the purchase price of land to a vendee, who agreed to execute a mortgage to secure the loan on obtaining the title, but he refused, and filed a declaration of homestead. Thereafter the lender recovered a personal judgment for the loan, but did not, in that action, seek to enforce any claim against the land. Held, that any lien which the lender had, in the nature of an equitable mortgage, was not superior to the homestead claim.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by one Campan against J. M. Molle and others. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Appel & Whitney, for appellant. Walter F. Haas, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. On July 11, 1896, the defendant J. M. Molle held an agreement for the purchase of a parcel of land from the owner thereof for the sum of $350, and at his request plaintiff, on that date, loaned to the defendants the said sum of money, for which they executed to him their promissory note, and afterwards applied the money in payment of the balance due on the agreement, and obtained the legal title to the land. The plaintiff alleges, "upon information and belief," that the defendants promised him that, if he would advance the said money, they would secure him in its payment by giving him a mortgage upon the land when they should obtain the legal title thereto; and alleges that, after they had obtained the legal title, they refused to execute said mortgage. Subsequently the plaintiff brought an action upon the note, and on the 29th of March, 1897, obtained judgment against the defendants, and each of them, for its amount. Prior thereto, viz. January 18, 1897, Molle had filed a declaration of homestead upon the premises. The plaintiff seeks by this action a judgment setting aside and canceling this declaration of homestead as void, and that the land be applied towards the payment of his judgment. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained by the superior court, and from the judgment thereon the plaintiff has appealed.

It is claimed in support of the appeal that, by virtue of the transaction between the plaintiff and the defendants, the plaintiff was subrogated to the rights of the vendor of the land, and is entitled to enforce the claim against the land as fully as could the vendor. The complaint does not, however, contain the contract between the vendor and the defendants, or show the relation between them. Nor does it appear therefrom that the vendor had any rights which he could enforce against them. It merely shows that the defendants had the right to purchase the land for a given sum of money. It does not appear at what time the defendants paid the money to the vendor, or when the land was conveyed to them, and, as the vendor was to retain title to the land until full payment therefor should be made, there was no vendor's lien to which the plaintiff could be subrogated. The transaction between the plaintiff and the defendants was merely a loan of money upon their agreement to give him security, which they afterwards refused to do.

Neither can the claim of the appellant that he has a lien upon the land in the nature of an equitable mortgage, prior to that of the homestead, be maintained. If it be assumed that the agreement between him and the defendants constituted an equitable mortgage, the statute declares that the homestead claim is superior to the lien of a mortgage created before the filing of the declaration of homestead, unless such mortgage was "executed and recorded" prior thereto. Civ. Code, § 1241 (4). By putting his claim upon the promissory note into a personal judgment after the declaration of homestead had been filed, he elected to look to the personal obligation of the defendants instead of the security promised by them. If he would have claimed a priority of the lien of the homestead, he should have asserted it in that action. Section 726, Code Civ. Proc., declares that "there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt or the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage upon real estate"; and, if the plaintiff held an equitable mortgage upon the premises, his failure to enforce it in that action had the effect to deprive him of such security. Mascarel v. Raffour, 51 Cal. 242; Ould v. Stoddard, 54 Cal. 613. If the claim of homestead is ineffective, his remedy at law, by means of an execution upon his judgment, is ample. The judgment is affirmed.

DE GROOT v. PETERS. (L. A. 636.)

INJUNCTION—WHEN GRANTED—TRESPASS.

1. Injunction will lie to restrain one from intruding into another's store, and holding himself out as a partner of such other, collecting money due the latter, and converting it to his own use, where he is insolvent, and threatens to continue such conduct, and such claim of partnership has no foundation in fact.

2. A person is not entitled to free access to the store of another, by whom he had recently been employed at a compensation based on a percentage of the net profits of the business, for the purpose of protecting his interest, where the employer avers that the business never yielded a net profit, and the employé shows no reason why his presence is necessary to protect his share of the profits, if there were any.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by Walter I. De Groot against Louis H. Peters. From an order refusing to dissolve an injunction against plaintiff, he appealed. Affirmed.

Fuller & Burnett, for appellant. J. Noonan Phillips and Goodrich & McCutchen, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Plaintiff alleged in his complaint in this action that himself and defendant are partners under the name of the Buffalo Woolen Company, constituted such by an agreement in writing, engaged, it seems, in the business of merchant tailors; and, upon information and belief, he charged that defendant committed divers specified acts of misconduct in the course of said business, wherefore he prayed a dissolution and an accounting. Defendant answered denying any partnership with plaintiff, and exhibiting a contract in writing between them, by the terms whereof (as the court below seems to have interpreted it, and we think correctly) the plaintiff was employed by defendant as a salesman upon a salary in said business, with a contingent right to one-fourth of the net profits of the same, but was not made a partner with defendant. At the time of filing such answer, defendant filed also a sworn cross complaint, in which he averred, among other things, that the written contract exhibited in his answer is the same agreement mentioned in plaintiff's complaint; that plaintiff was in his employ as a salesman, and that, after the commencement of this action, plaintiff neglected his duties in that capacity, and harassed defendant in the conduct of his business, and that defendant discharged him; that nevertheless plaintiff holds himself out to the public as a partner in said business, and intrudes into defendant's office and place of business, and there remains, interfering with defendant's affairs; that he has collected money from the patrons of defendant, due to the latter, and converted it to his own use; that he claims the right to do these things as a partner in the business, and threatens and intends to continue such acts contrary to the will of defendant; and that plaintiff is insolvent. Defendant prayed an injunction to restrain the continuance of said conduct of plaintiff, and the court granted the writ. Afterwards plaintiff answered the cross complaint, denying some of its averments, and reasserting his status as a partner; but he did not deny that his alleged contract of partnership is contained in the instrument described in the pleadings of defendant, or that he attempts to participate in the management of the business, or that he is insolvent. He moved for a dissolution of the injunction. The motion was heard on the pleadings, and was denied; hence this appeal.

Several questions of procedure are raised by counsel on each side, but none of them are of sufficient moment to preclude or avoid a decision of the substantial subject of dispute disclosed by the record. As to this the main insistence of plaintiff is that, conceding himself to have no interest as a partner, yet the case-made shows that, at most, he is a mere trespasser in defendant's store, and that injunction does not lie to restrain him; citing Mechanics' Foundry v. Ryall, 75 Cal. 601, 17 Pac. 703. This case is clearly distinguishable from that. Upon the defendant's showing (which, for the purposes of this appeal, must be said to be quite imperfectly repelled by plaintiff's answer to the cross complaint), it appears that plaintiff is not only a trespasser upon the premises of defendant, but assumes a control over his business, intercepts moneys due to him, and holds himself out to the public as a partner having the right to do these things. Bodily ejection of plaintiff from the premises would not necessarily prevent the continuance of such injuries, nor would an action for damages afford adequate relief; for the reasons, among others, that it would be extremely difficult to ascertain in pecuniary terms the amount of damage, and that plaintiff is admittedly insolvent. No authority in point is brought to our notice, but the following illustrate in some measure the principles which should govern here: Kellogg v. King, 114 Cal. 378, 46 Pac. 166; Routh v. Webster, 10 Beav. 561; Iron Works Co. v. Payne, 50 Ohio St. 115, 33 N. E. 88; Bates, Partn. §§ 772, 990; T. Pars. Partn. (4th Ed.) § 216.

Plaintiff also contends that, in any event, he should have been allowed free access to the store, in order to protect his interest in the net profits of the business. On that point it is sufficient to say that the defendant averred positively in his pleadings that the business never yielded any net profit, and offered to submit his books and all his transactions to scrutiny in support of his assertion; and the plaintiff showed no reason why, if there were such profits, his presence in the store is necessary for the protection of his share thereof. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

I concur: GRAY, C.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. LOS ANGELES CITY WATER CO. et al. (two cases). (L. A. 655 and 656.) LOS ANGELES CITY WATER CO. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (L. A. 657.) CRYSTAL SPRINGS LAND & WATER CO. v. SAME. (L. A. 658.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. May 5, 1899.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—CONTRACT WITH WATERWORKS COMPANY—CONSTRUCTION—CONSENT TO MODIFICATION—WITHDRAWAL—WATERS OF RIVER—RIGHTS OF CITY—INJUNCTION.

1. Under a contract with a city, a waterworks company was not to take from the river from which it was allowed to get its supply "more than ten inches of water without the previous consent" of the city, and the contract did not provide under what particular pressure the 10 inches were to be taken. But it would have taken many times 10 inches under a 4-inch pressure to have supplied the demand for water when the contract was made, and much more to supply the subsequent growth of the city, which the contract also contemplated the company should supply from the same source. The company, without objection, drew from the river many times 10 inches under a 4-inch pressure for many years. Held, that the contract would not be construed to mean only 10 inches under a 4-inch pressure.

2. A city's consent for many years to a waterworks company's taking more water from a river, from which it was to get its supply, than it may have been entitled to under the contract cannot be withdrawn during the life of the contract after the company has expended large sums in reliance thereon.

3. Under a contract with a waterworks company a city gave to it full control of its waterworks plant for 30 years, with power to enlarge it, and extend its pipes, mains, etc., to answer all the needs of the inhabitants. It was to be allowed to collect water rents not to exceed specified rates, and was to supply the city with water free for municipal purposes, and pay $1,500 per year to the city besides. At the end of this time the city was given the right to take possession on payment of the value of the improvements made. Throughout the ordinance by means of which the agreement was made, it was referred to as a contract. The works taken by the company were of a very meager description, and were entirely superseded, and constituted no part of the plant established by the company at the end of the 30 years. Held, that the contract was not a lease, and that the city could not take possession of the plant at the end of the 30 years without at the same time paying or tendering the value thereof.

4. A city has only the right to the use of such an amount of the water of a river within its limits as is necessary to supply the wants of its citizens and of the municipality. It does not have a riparian owner's right to have the water of the stream flow as it is accustomed to flow, without any regard to its use, and hence is not entitled to damages for its diversion, except where it is in a position to use it.

5. A city entitled to possess and own a waterworks plant supplying its inhabitants with water on paying or tendering to the waterworks company the value thereof at the end of a certain period cannot interfere with contracts between rate payers and the company, and appropriate to itself the benefit thereof, when its right to buy the plant accrues.

6. A city without the power to take possession of a waterworks plant rightfully may be enjoined from doing so forcibly.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by the Los Angeles City Water Company against the city of Los Angeles and others, by the Crystal Springs Land & Water Company against the same defendants, and by the city of Los Angeles against the plaintiffs in the former two actions. In the first two named actions there were orders enjoining and restraining defendants from taking possession of certain waterworks property, and they appeal. In the last-named action the court made an order appointing a receiver to receive the water rates and income from the waterworks property before referred to, but refusing to appoint him to take possession of the property, and both parties appeal. By agreement of parties the appeals are argued and submitted at the same time. Orders in the first two named actions are affirmed, and in the last-named action the order appointing the receiver is reversed, and the refusal to appoint is affirmed.

W. E. Dunn and Lee & Scott, for city of Los Angeles. J. S. Chapman and White & Monroe, for water companies and S. G. Murphy.

McFARLAND, J. These four appeals are taken by the various parties from certain orders made in three certain actions pending in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles. One of the three actions was entitled "Los Angeles City Water Company, Plaintiff, vs. The City of Los Angeles and the Persons who Constituted the Mayor and Common Council of said City," and in that case the appeal is by the defendants in said action from an order of the court below enjoining and restraining the defendants from taking possession of certain waterworks property hereinafter mentioned; and this is the appeal numbered L. A. 657. Another of said actions is entitled "Crystal Springs Land and Water Company, Plaintiff, vs. City of Los Angeles et al., Defendants," and the appeal in that case is by the defendants from a similar order enjoining and restraining the defendants from taking possession of certain waterworks described in the complaint therein. This is the appeal numbered L. A. 658. The other of the three actions is entitled "The City of Los Angeles, Plaintiff, vs. The Los Angeles City Water Company and The Crystal Springs Land & Water Company," above mentioned. In this action the plaintiff sought to have a receiver appointed to take possession of the waterworks property above mentioned, and to restrain the defendants therein from collecting water rates, or receiving any income from said property. The court made an order appointing a receiver to receive the water rates and income from said property, but refused to appoint a receiver to take possession of the property. The defendants therein appealed from the order appointing the receiver, and this is the appeal numbered L. A. 655. The city of Los Angeles appealed from that part of the order which denied a receiver for the purpose of taking possession of the property, and this is the appeal numbered L. A. 656. The three cases were not consolidated in the court below, but they were heard, and the orders appealed from were made, at the same time. By agreement between the parties the appeals were all brought here in the same transcript, and were argued all together, and submitted at the same time.

The litigation in all the cases arose out of a certain written contract made on the 22d day of July, 1868, and the determination of the rights of the various parties depends upon that contract, and upon facts occurring subsequently to its execution. The municipal name of the city of Los Angeles was at that time "The Mayor and Common Council of the City of Los Angeles," and by that name the city was the party of the first part to the contract, and John S. Griffin, Prudent Bradbury, and Solomon Lazard were the nominal parties of the second part; but as the municipality afterwards took the name of the city of Los Angeles, and as Griffin and others, shortly after the execution of the contract, assigned all their rights therein to the Los Angeles City Water Company, which assignment was anticipated by both parties at the date of the contract, we will, for convenience, speak of one of the parties as the city of Los Angeles and of the other as the Los Angeles City Water Company. Facts occurring after the execution of the contract are shown in the record by various affidavits and other evidence.

At the time of the execution of the contract the city owned a water plant of a very meager character. It consisted mainly of a water wheel and a few miles of wooden pipe. By the contract the city covenanted and agreed "to deliver and concede" to the parties of the second part, their heirs, assigns, etc., the exclusive use, control, possession, and management of the waterworks, together "with the right to sell and distribute water for domestic purposes, and to receive the rents and profits thereof for their own use and benefit, except as hereinafter provided, hereby giving and granting the parties of the second part * * * the right to lay pipes in any and all the streets of said city, and to dig and make all necessary excavations for that purpose, and the right of way through, upon, and over land or streets belonging to the said city of Los Angeles, with the additional right to take water from the Los Angeles river at a point above or near the present dam; provided always, that the said parties of the second part * * * shall at no time take from the said river for the use of said waterworks more than ten inches of water without the previous consent of the mayor and common council of said city." This grant was made upon the consideration that the parties of the second part should pay to the city $1,500 per annum "until the conclusion of the term of this contract"; that they should surrender to the city certain claims which they held against the city for damages; and upon the further consideration that they should make certain improvements "about, in, and upon said waterworks, at their own proper costs and expenses," to wit, that they should lay down 12 miles of iron pipes of sufficient capacity to supply the inhabitants of the city with water for domestic purposes, that they should erect one hydrant, as a protection against fire, at each corner of each cross street where "the water pipes are now, or may hereafter be laid by virtue of this contract"; that they should erect an ornamental fountain upon the public plaza at a certain cost; and that they should "within two years from the approval of this contract and ordinance construct at their own expense such ditches, flumes, or erect such machinery in connection with said waterworks as will secure to the inhabitants of said city a constant supply of water for domestic purposes, and shall construct reservoirs of sufficient capacity for that purpose." The parties of the second part agree "that they will make the improvements hereinbefore mentioned and set forth in the following manner, to wit: That they will replace all the wooden pipes now belonging to the said waterworks within one year from the signing and approving of this contract and ordinance, and that they will extend said iron pipes as fast as the citizens desiring to be supplied with water for domestic purposes will agree to take sufficient water to pay ten per cent. per annum interest upon the cost of extending such pipes through the streets now supplied with water. That they will, within one year from the date hereof, place a hydrant, to be used as a protection against fire, at one corner of one street at each of the cross streets where the pipes are now laid down, and will erect hydrants at other street corners, according to the terms of this contract, as fast as the pipes are extended through the streets of said city. That they will erect or cause to be erected an ornamental fountain upon the public plaza, of such design as the mayor and common council shall direct, within one year from the date hereof. That they will furnish water for the public schools and city hospitals, jails, free of charge, when the same are near the pipes, the city furnishing the necessary conduits for that purpose. That they will make all the improvements herein mentioned and set forth, and keep the same in repair, at their own cost and expense, for the said period of thirty years, and return the said waterworks to the said party of the first part at the expiration of the said period of thirty years in good order and condition, reasonable wear and the damage of the elements excepted, upon the payment to them of the value of the improvements made after the approval of this contract, to be ascertained as hereinbefore provided, * * * and will pay all state and county taxes assessed upon said waterworks during the said period of thirty years." Another provision is to the effect that the parties of the first part "shall have and do reserve the right to regulate the water rates charged by the said parties of the second part, or their assigns: provided, that they shall not so reduce such water rates or so fix the price thereof to be less than those now charged by the said parties of the second part for water." There is also an agreement by the parties of the second part that a certain lease theretofore executed by the city to one Sansevine shall be surrendered up and canceled. There is also a provision that the rights conceded to the parties of the second part shall not embrace certain waterworks of the city used for the distribution of water for the purpose of irrigation, except as to the 10 inches of water before mentioned; and the parties of the second part covenant that they will not dispose of any water for the purposes of irrigation, "but shall only take from said river the water necessary for domestic purposes as above specified." The parties of the first part covenant "that at the expiration of the period of thirty years from the execution of this instrument they will pay to the said parties of the second part * * * the value of the improvements made in, about, and upon the said waterworks in pursuance of this contract; the same to be ascertained by arbitration, in case the parties cannot agree upon the value thereof, the said party of the first part and the parties of the second part * * * to choose one man each, and the two men thus chosen to select a third man, and the judgment of the three men thus selected shall be final in the premises. And the said party of the first part hereby covenants and agrees to make no other lease, sale, contract, grant, or franchise to any person or persons, corporation or company, for the sale or delivery of water to the inhabitants of said city for domestic purposes during the continuance of this contract, always without prejudice to any rights already granted." The foregoing are, we think, all the parts of said contract necessary to be now stated. Other parts of the contract may be hereafter noticed; and other facts disclosed by the record which are material in the case will be presently stated.

At the date of the execution of the contract the city of Los Angeles contained only from 5,000 to 6,000 inhabitants, and its boundaries were confined to four square leagues of land. At the termination of the 30 years, in 1898, its population was over 100,000, and its boundaries had been extended in several directions so as to include from 10 to 15 additional square miles. As fast as this increase in area and population took place, the water company, at vast expense, extended its pipe lines, reservoir system, and other necessary parts of a water plant so as to supply the growing wants of the city and its people. It extended its lines outside of the territory over which the city had municipal jurisdiction at the date of the contract, and acquired from others reservoirs and water property which were on the new territory, and constructed upon land which the city did not own, and through streets which had no existence in 1868. Throughout all the territory, old and new, it furnished free water for hydrants, fire apparatus, school purposes, etc., as the increasing population and settlement demanded. It is quite clear from the record that the company substantially complied with all its covenants in the contract.

The 30 years mentioned in the contract ended on the 22d day of July, 1898. When that date was near at hand, the city had made no arrangements to pay for the improvements, and had made no tender of the value thereof. On the other hand, it claimed the right to take possession of all the waterworks property without any previous payment of the value thereof, and threatened to take such possession immediately at the termination of the 30 years. It claimed to be in the position of a lessor, with the right of possession at the end of the term. There had been no fixing of the amount of the value of the property by arbitration. The city had no money in its treasury with which to pay for the value of the property. There was a great difference of opinion between the two parties as to such value. The city, however, admitted that the value was as much as $1,000,000, and it is quite apparent that under the law it had no means to raise that amount of money except by the issuance of bonds, which would have to be sanctioned by a vote of the electors of the city, and thus the prospect of its ability to pay was distant and contingent upon the consent of the electors. Under these circumstances the Los Angeles City Water Company, a few days before the expiration of the 30 years, brought the action hereinbefore alluded to, to restrain the city from taking possession of the property out of which the appeal No. 657 arose. The Crystal Springs Land & Water Company, it is proper to say here, is a corporation which owns, or claims to own, a certain water plant which it had leased to the Los Angeles City Water Company, the pipes, plants, etc., of the former company connecting with the works of the latter; and there is a contention between the parties as to whether or not the property, or at least a part of it, claimed by the Crystal Springs Company, belongs to the Los Angeles Water Company, and is part of the property which the city should have under the said contract. As the city also threatened to take possession of part of the property claimed by the Crystal Springs Company, the latter also brought an action against the city to prevent that threatened action of the city, at the same time the action just above referred to was brought by the Los Angeles City Water Company, and, so far as these present appeals are concerned, no adjudication as to the relationship between these two water companies is necessary. The court granted the injunction in the said suit of the Crystal Springs Company against the city. Shortly after the commencement of the two last-mentioned cases, the city commenced the action hereinbefore mentioned for the appointment of a receiver to take possession of the property of the said two water companies, and to manage and control the same. An order was made in said action appointing a receiver to collect and receive the rents, issues, and profits of said property, "including water rates" derived from the sale of water by the Los Angeles Water Company to the people of the city; as well those which had accrued since the filing of the complaint as those which should accrue thereafter. By said order the defendants were ordered to pay to the receiver all moneys in their possession derived from the water rates since the filing of the complaint, including those which had been deposited in the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Los Angeles under a stipulation between the parties to the effect that the money should be deposited in said bank temporarily during the hearing of the motion for a receiver. The appeal by the water companies from this order is the most important one now before the court.

Before considering the main questions in the case, it is proper here to notice a preliminary point made by the city, and somewhat insisted on, to wit, that the only quantity of the water of the Los Angeles river to which the water company is entitled under the contract is 10 inches under a 4-inch pressure. This convention cannot be maintained. The words of the contract on this subject are simply that the company shall not take from the river "more than ten inches of water without the previous consent" of the city. There is nothing in the contract about "four-inch pressure," nor is there any intimation as to what the parties meant by "ten inches" of water. But, looking at the context and the subject-matter of the contract, it is quite evident that the parties did not mean only 10 inches under a 4-inch pressure. If that had been the meaning, there would have been no sense in the other important covenants. At the time of the contract it would have taken many times 10 inches under a 4-inch pressure to furnish water for domestic purposes to even the few thousand people who were then inhabitants of the city, and much more than that amount was necessary to supply free water under the contract; and a solemn covenant to supply a growing city with sufficient water for domestic and municipal purposes for 30 years from a flow of 10 inches under a 4-inch pressure would have been absurd. The company, immediately after the date of the contract, commenced to use an amount of water greatly in excess of 10 inches under a 4-inch pressure. Soon after the execution of the contract the company was using 300 inches under a 4-inch pressure, and from that to the present time they have been using, with the knowledge and consent of the city, from 300 to 700 inches so measured. Therefore, whatever (if anything) was meant by the simple words "ten inches," the contract was immediately, and has been continuously, construed by the action of the parties as meaning more than 10 inches measured under a 4-inch pressure. There is no pretense that the city ever objected to the use of this water by the water company until 1896, when an ordinance was passed by the city government undertaking to withdraw the city's consent to the taking of more than 10 inches from the river. It is difficult to imagine how this ordinance was passed seriously, for if the water company had been prevented from taking from the river at that time more than 10 inches of water under a 4-inch pressure, there certainly would have been a water famine in the city, for the city had no works of its own, and no means whatever for supplying water for either domestic or municipal purposes. But the city, having allowed the water company for nearly 30 years to divert the quantity of water above mentioned, and to expend vast sums of money upon the faith of a continuance of the right to take said water, could not withdraw its consent within the period of the contract. This same contention was made by the city in the case of Los Angeles City Water Co. v. City of Los Angeles (U. S. Cir. Ct. S. D. Cal.) 88 Fed. 745; but the court held otherwise. In that case Wellborn, the learned judge holding the court, said: "If it be conceded, as claimed by defendants (which, however, I do not decide), that the provision of the contract limiting the quantity of water to be taken from the river without previous consent of the city is sufficiently certain for enforcement, or, more specially, that said quantity is ten inches measured under a four-inch pressure, still the consent of the city to the taking of a greater quantity, once given, cannot be withdrawn during the life of the contract, for the reason that large expenditures have been made by complainants in reliance upon such consent." The court cites, as authorities to the point, Rhodes v. Otis, 33 Ala. 600; Woodbury v. Parshley, 7 N. H. 237; Lacy v. Arnett, 33 Pa. St. 169; Russell v. Hubbard, 59 Ill. 339; Beall v. Mill Co., 45 Ga. 33; Veghte v. Power Co., 19 N. J. Eq. 153; Railroad Co. v. Battle, 66 N. C. 546; Flickinger v. Shaw, 87 Cal. 126, 25 Pac. 268; Grimshaw v. Belcher, 88 Cal. 217, 26 Pac. 84; Smith v. Green, 109 Cal. 228, 41 Pac. 1022,—all of which sustain the point.

The main question in these cases is this: Had the city the right to take possession of the waterworks at the end of the 30 years without paying for the same or tendering payment? If this question should be answered in the negative,—and we think it should,—then it seems to clearly follow that all the orders of the court below appealed from on these appeals must be affirmed, except the one appointing the receiver, and this latter order must be reversed. The city undertakes to contend that the contract is a lease,—a lease pure and simple; and as the contract, according to the city's contention, must be thrown into the category of a "lease," it contends for one of the well-known features of a lease of land, to wit, that at the expiration of the term the lessor has an immediate right of re-entry and possession. This position is not tenable. The written instrument in question cannot be categorized into any smaller class than that of a "contract." It is a contract with many and various covenants. It was not called a lease (however suggestive that might have been) by the parties who made it. The city entered into the contract by means of an ordinance which was entitled "An ordinance contracting for the care, maintenance, and improvements of the city water-works." The first section says that "the contract" hereinafter set forth, etc. The second section describes it as "this agreement." It was afterwards said "that at the expiration of the period of thirty years from the execution of this instrument they will pay," etc. In another part of the instrument it is called "this contract and ordinance." In another place it speaks of "the terms of this contract." In another place it speaks of "the approval of this contract." The only place where there is any reference whatever to the contract as a lease is the agreement that the party of the first part will "make no other lease, sale, contract, grant, or franchise to any person or persons"; and this language can as well be construed as designating the instrument a "sale, contract, grant, or franchise" as designating it a "lease." In the opinion of the court below it is well said as follows: "I do not perceive any theory which justifies the contention that the agreement is a lease as to the pipe lines, flumes, and other 'improvements' constructed by the water company. Manifestly, the city could not lease what it never had, and the present distributing system did not exist at the time the agreement of 1868 was executed. In fact, the system then existing has been entirely superseded, and constitutes no part of the present plant. Neither can it be said with any show of reason that the distributing pipes and reservoirs constructed by the water company constitute improvements on the leased property, and revert therewith, and as part thereof, upon the termination of the lease." The instrument in question could as well be called a "contract to purchase," with all the incidents of such a contract following, as a "lease." It is, in fact, a contract by which the city agreed to give immediate possession to the water company of a small line of wooden pipes which the city then owned, and to allow it to build new waterworks throughout the city as necessity demanded, with covenants on the part of the water company that it would change what little the city had then in the way of waterworks into better ones, and would create new works as fast as the demands of the city required; that the water company should have the right to do this, and to collect water rates for a period of 30 years in consideration of the covenants entered into by the water company, and that upon the expiration of 30 years the city would pay the company for all the works which it should have created, and that the water company, upon payment therefor, should then deliver possession of all the waterworks, as they should exist at the end of the period, to the city. The rights of the parties do not rest upon legal implications. They are determined by covenants expressly stated in the contract. These are that the city should pay for the works to be created by the water company, and that the company should deliver possession thereof to the city "upon the payment" to it of the value of such property. There is no agreement, express or implied, that the company should yield up possession before payment. Even in the case of a strict lease of land, where the lessee is to erect improvements to be paid for by the lessor at the expiration of the term, the lessor is entitled to possession at the end of the term without payment—leaving the tenant to his action to recover the value—only where there is no express agreement in the instrument which changes the result that flows by implication from the mere nature of a lease. In such a case, if the clear meaning of the contract is that the lessor is to have possession only upon payment, then he has no right to possession prior to payment. Such a case is presented in Swift v. Sheehy, 88 Fed. 924. There the court say: "There is in this contract, distinguishing it from the cases principally relied upon by the defendant's counsel, an express provision that the lessor can only become the owner of and entitled to the possession of the buildings and improvements upon the payment to the lessees of the value thereof. * * * At common law, under a contract of lease by which the lessee was permitted to make improvements upon the land during the existence of his lease, without further express reservation as to the termination of the term, the improvements went with the land back to the lessor. The contract in question does not only require the lessor, at the termination of the lease, to pay the lessees the value of the improvements, but it, in effect, entitles the lessees to retain the ownership and possession until the lessor shall pay them therefor."

But the case of National Waterworks Co. v. Kansas City (decided by Judge Brewer) 10 C. C. A. 653, 62 Fed. 853, more nearly approaches the case at bar than any to which our attention has been called. In that case the contract between Kansas City and the waterworks was very similar to the one in the case at bar. There the contract ran for 20 years. The water company was to create waterworks, which the city was to have at the expiration of 20 years upon payment of the value; and a trial court had held that at the end of the 20 years the city was entitled to take possession of the waterworks without payment. But the circuit court of appeals reversed the case, and Judge Brewer, in delivering the opinion of the court, among other things, said: "We dissent in toto from the claim of the city that at the lapse of the twenty years the title to this property, with the right of possession, passed absolutely to it, without any payment or tender of payment, leaving only to the company the right to secure compensation by agreement or litigation, as best it could. * * * Now, the familiar and ordinary law of business transactions is that he who parts with title receives at the time payment. In other words, payment of price and transfer of property are contemporaneous and concurrent acts. When it is affirmed that a contract made by a municipality contemplates that he whose money builds and constructs, and therefore establishes title to, property, shall surrender his title and possession without payment, or even the amount thereof determined, the language compelling such a construction must be clear and imperative. There is no such language in either the act or the ordinance. While it is true that the act provides that no grant so made shall confer the right to operate the waterworks for any period beyond twenty years, yet such provision is no more imperative than the one that at the expiration of the twenty years the city shall purchase and pay therefor. * * * In so far, therefore, as the decree of the circuit court attempts to transfer the title and the possession to the city before payment, we are constrained to hold that it was erroneous." Our conclusion therefore is, both upon principle and authority, that the city at the expiration of the 30 years had no right to the possession of the waterworks without payment, or tender of payment, of their value.

The court below, when appointing a receiver to collect the water rates and enjoining the water company from collecting such rates, seems to have laid stress upon the consideration that the city was the owner of the water in the Los Angeles river which is used through the waterworks of the water company. It seems to have been determined, however, that the city has only the right to the use of such an amount of the water of the river as is necessary to supply the wants of its citizens and of the municipality. It has not the right of a riparian owner to have the water of the stream flow as it is accustomed to flow, without any regard to its use. It is entitled to the use of the water only when it is in a position to use it, and could not recover damages for its diversion except when it was in a position to use it; and it is apparent that it is not in such position, for it is not in possession of any system of waterworks through which such use could be exercised. It is doubtful if the city, having encouraged the water company in making such large expenditures of money to perfect its system, could enjoin the company from continuing to use the water until the city had entirely ended the contract by paying for the company's works. But, whether or not it could enjoin the company from using the water, there is no principle upon which it could interfere with the contract between the water company and the rate payers, and appropriate to itself the benefit of that contract; and having no right to the possession of the waterworks, or in the contract between the water company and the rate payers, we see no principle upon which, through the appointment of a receiver, it can prevent the water company from enjoying the fruits of its contract with the rate payers.

With respect to the equitable remedy of the water company to enjoin the city from taking possession of the waterworks, we do not see how the city can complain. Not having the power to take possession of the property rightfully, it is just and equitable for the water company to enjoin it from using its municipal power to take such possession forcibly. In that event, considering the present inability of the city to pay, and the fact that there is no method by which the water company could compel payment within any reasonable time, if at all, the water company would have no remedy that would be in any sense adequate; and we think, therefore, that the remedy by injunction was an entirely proper one. And, in accordance with the views above expressed, there is no just ground for the appointment of a receiver to take away from the water company its current revenues, which are necessary to meet its current obligations, when the city would in no event be entitled to that revenue before final settlement and payment by the city of the value of the works. This fact makes it unnecessary to consider the point made by the water company that a receivership in fact destroys the business and rights of a corporation, contrary to the statute. It is to be observed that the rights of the city, under any view of the proper basis for a final settlement, will be adequately preserved. It is not necessary to here determine what the basis of that final settlement should be; but if it should be finally held that the city should pay the value of the property at the end of the 30 years, with legal interest thereon until the time of payment, and that the water company should account for the intermediate profits, still, upon the estimate of the value of the property made by the city itself, it would be amply protected, even though the settlement be not made, as it should be made, within a reasonably short period.

In accordance with the foregoing views, the orders appealed from in L. A. 657 and L. A. 658 are, and each of them is, hereby affirmed. In L. A. 655 the order appointing a receiver and enjoining the water companies from collecting the water rates, and from appropriating the water rates already collected, is reversed; and in L. A. 656 the order refusing to appoint a receiver to take actual possession and to manage and control the property, appealed from by the city, is affirmed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. LOS ANGELES CITY WATER CO. et al. (L. A. 655, 656, 657, and 658.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 5, 1899.)

CERTIORARI—REVIEW OF ORDERS AFTER APPEAL AND STAY OF PROCEEDINGS.

Where, after appeal from an order appointing a receiver, and the filing of a stay bond, a further order is made in the proceeding by the inferior court, the appellant is entitled to have such order vacated on certiorari in the appellate court.

In bank. Action by the city of Los Angeles against the Los Angeles City Water Company. Judgment for defendant. After appeal by plaintiff, the Los Angeles City Water Company and others brought certiorari to review an order made by the superior court, and in an action between the same parties, from which an appeal was taken, the Los Angeles City Water Company and others petitioned for an injunction. Order for the application in certiorari annulled, and restraining order granted in accordance with the prayer of petitioners.

White & Monroe, for petitioners.

PER CURIAM. The above case, L. A. 662, is a petition in certiorari to review a certain order made by the superior court in a certain action by the city of Los Angeles against the petitioner, the Los Angeles City Water Company, after the petitioner had appealed to this court from an order of said superior court appointing a receiver, etc., and had given an undertaking to stay proceedings in the amount fixed by the judge of said court. The other matter above entitled, arising out of the appeals No. 655 et seq., is a petition for a certain restraining order. There has this day been filed an opinion in the said appeals L. A. 655, 656, 657, and 658 (57 Pac. 210), determining the merits of these several cases in favor of the petitioner, and this determination lessens the importance of the two petitions here under review, and makes it unnecessary to state the facts here in detail, as they are substantially given in the opinion above referred to. It is sufficient to say that petitioner is entitled to have the order involved in the certiorari proceeding vacated, and to have the restraining order asked for in the other proceeding. In the said proceeding in certiorari, L. A. 662, the order sought to be reviewed is annulled, and in the other matter—City of Los Angeles v. Los Angeles City Water Co. (L. A. 655, 656, 657, and 658)—it is ordered that a restraining order be issued in accordance with the prayer of the petitioners.

STREET RAILROADS — NEGLIGENCE — SPRINKLING CARTS—TRIAL—QUESTIONS FOR JURY — COMPROMISE AND SETTLEMENT — EVIDENCE — RATIFICATION.

1. Plaintiff was rightfully driving a street sprinkler on a street-car track. According to his custom, on turning into the street on which the tracks were, he followed rapidly behind a passing car, sprinkling the street as he went, and turned around several times to see that no accident might happen. A car coming behind plaintiff sounded the only warning bell 700 feet away, and then came on with accelerated speed; not attempting to slack the car until within two or three car lengths of the cart, and even then not using the most effective appliance for stopping the car. The cart and its load weighed five tons, and made considerable noise when sprinkling. Held, that the street-car company was negligent, so as to be liable for the injuries to plaintiff.

2. A person severely injured by an accident compromised the claim next day, and made his mark as signature to the receipt. He testified that his mind was a blank as to the occurrences from the time of the injury until several days after the alleged settlement, when he was taken to a sanitarium. Two witnesses testified that he spoke of the settlement after coming to the sanitarium, and there was nothing to show that at that time any one had informed him of the settlement. Held, that the question whether he had knowingly settled the claim was for the jury.

3. Evidence of a person who had been injured, that he knew nothing of what occurred the next day, when he made an alleged settlement of his claim, is equivalent to a statement that he was "entirely without understanding" at such time.

4. The retention of money paid in settlement of a claim for personal injuries is not a ratification of the settlement, where retained without knowledge of how it was obtained.

5. Where the jury were instructed that they might deduct from the amount of damages for personal injuries any money given to plaintiff by defendant by way of an alleged settlement, defendant cannot complain that it was injured by such payment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by Frank Abrahams, an incompetent person, by Henry Stieler, guardian of his person and estate, against the Los Angeles Traction Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. H. Lamme and E. E. Milliken, for appellant. Brooks & Trask and S. S. Lawson, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action for personal injury. Trial by jury, and verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $3,000. Defendant appeals from the judgment entered upon the verdict, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. Defendant presents but two contentions for consideration: (1) That plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence; and (2) that plaintiff accepted the sum of $100 in full satisfaction of the claim, at a time when he was not entirely without understanding.

1. Plaintiff was employed by one Cross to drive a sprinkling wagon, in whose employ he had been for three years, in the city of Los Angeles. Pico and Georgia Bell streets run at right angles to each other; the latter, north and south. Double street-car tracks pass over Georgia Bell street at the points in question. On the morning of November 20, 1895, plaintiff filled his tank, and drove to Pico street, as was his custom, and thence along Pico street to its junction with Georgia Bell street, which latter he was to sprinkle. As he entered Georgia Bell street, a car passed going south, and he turned and followed this car along the track towards Sixteenth street. He testified: "On entering the street I turned around, in order to see whether I could see a car or hear a bell. I saw no car, nor did I hear a bell. And then I followed the car at a rapid pace in order to sprinkle, and during the sprinkling I turned around several times, in order to see that no accident might happen, for I had always sprinkled in that manner without any accident." Again he testified: "I entered Georgia Bell street. I kept the right wheels of my sprinkling cart upon the west side of the right-hand track or rail of the street-car track. We always so entered; drove and sprinkled continually in that way." At a distance of about 600 or 700 feet from Pico street he met a car coming north on the other track, to his left. He testified: "I drew my mules a little distance from the track, so I might not sprinkle the car as it passed me." About this same time a car coming behind him struck his cart with great force, and threw him forward under the mules' feet. Appellant relies upon the case of Everett v. Railway Co., 115 Cal. 105, 43 Pac. 207, and 46 Pac. 880. In that case the court said: "In walking or riding along a line of railway, where cars or trains are passing or likely to pass at short intervals, one, while in a position to be endangered by such vehicles, must pay attention to his surroundings, and employ his natural faculties, and exert due diligence, to avoid such danger, and he must listen and look to ascertain whether danger is threatened by his situation; and a failure so to do constitutes negligence per se." Again: "With greater reason does this rule apply to one who is traveling laterally along the line of a railroad, and knows that engines will soon follow. * * * It is negligence for a person to walk upon the track of a railroad, whether laid upon a street or upon an open field, and he who deliberately does so will be presumed to have assumed the risk of the peril he may encounter." Quoting these paragraphs, appellant contends that they apply here, and are conclusive against plaintiff's right to recover. The two cases are widely divergent in their facts. Everett was riding a bicycle, which, with little strength exerted by the rider, could almost instantly be turned aside sufficiently to escape an approaching car. The motorman sounded the gong, and used every means to warn the rider of the car's approach, and persons on a passing car called out a warning to him. The speed of the car was reduced, the reverse lever was used, and every available means, by warning and by the appliances of the car, was used to avoid the accident, to all of which Everett gave no heed. Abrahams was on the track rightfully to water the street, and where he had been accustomed to go, and with the knowledge of the man operating the street cars. As he turned into Georgia Bell street, he looked north, and saw no car approaching. He followed rapidly behind a passing car, sprinkling the street as he went, and "turned around several times in order to see that no accident might happen." His vehicle and its load, the evidence showed, weighed about five tons. The noise made by his wagon and the falling water readily accounts for his not hearing the only warning bell, sounded 700 feet away from him. The approaching motorman came on with accelerated speed, and did not attempt to slacken it until within two or three car lengths—one witness said ten feet—of the wagon. He gave no alarm at that time, nor immediately before, and failed to use the most effective appliance at hand, but used one which he testified was defective, and incapable of stopping the car quickly. It must be apparent that the two cases do not admit of the same rules of law. In approaching at high speed so unwieldy a vehicle as a modern sprinkling cart, a motorman of an electric car cannot reasonably assume that the track will be cleared as quickly as by a bicycle. In our cities, where heavily freighted wagons and vehicles of every description frequently take the track of the street cars, common observation teaches, what must be presumed to be well known to motormen, that a warning 700 feet away to the driver of a sprinkling cart, by sounding the car gong, may not be heard by the driver of the wagon; and the motorman would not be justified in quickening his speed to the highest point, and advancing without further warning, on the assumption that the signal would be heard and obeyed in time to clear the car. It was said in the Everett Case: "Persons cannot be recklessly and wantonly run down on a railroad track, however negligent themselves, where the circumstances are such as to convey to the mind of a reasonable man a question whether they will be able to get out of the way." The court thought the evidence did not tend in that case to make such a case. We think the evidence in the case before us did tend to make just such a case.

2. But it is contended that plaintiff made a settlement of his claim, and at the time of making it he was not entirely without understanding. After the accident, plaintiff was put in the car and taken to the power house. It was about 7:30 o'clock in the morning. Dr. Bullard was called, and, soon after, Dr. Dickson, the company's physician, came, and had plaintiff removed to his house about an hour later. Dr. Dickson testified that plaintiff "was suffering considerably from the shock of the accident. * * * Then, with the assistance of Dr. Bullard, who gave the anesthesia, I made a thorough examination of the arm, and saw that it was in such a condition that it would be necessary to give it rest for twenty-four or forty-eight hours, and bandaged it, and put on temporary splints. Dr. Bullard gave the ether at that time." Plaintiff was given anesthetics at the power house to alleviate his sufferings. Dr. Dickson's testimony is to the effect that he attended him during the day and saw him at midnight of the 20th, and that part of the time the patient was dozing, and part of the time awake; that he "talked intelligently towards evening," spoke of depending upon his arms for a livelihood, and thought the company ought to pay him something; and that he seemed rational. Dr. Dickson also testified that he reported the case to Mr. Hook, the manager of the company, that same evening, and informed him that plaintiff claimed damages. Mr. Hook went early the next morning to Dr. Dickson's house, prepared with the printed form of settlement of claims of this character, and at once approached plaintiff on the subject of compromising or settling for the damage. Mr. Hook testified that plaintiff appeared to understand what he was about, and for some time hung out for $200, but finally agreed to take $100 in full satisfaction of all claims against the company. This voucher or receipt is in evidence, and purports to be signed by plaintiff by mark or cross, and is witnessed by Mary E. Spear. She testified that she saw plaintiff make his mark at the request of Mr. Hook, but both Dickson and Hook say she was not present when he touched the pen, but was called in to sign as a witness. She heard no conversation between Hook and plaintiff as to the settlement. After the paper was signed, Hook drew the check of the company, dated November 21st, on the bank in that city, and gave it to plaintiff, and took away with him the voucher or receipt signed by plaintiff. There is evidence that plaintiff could not write the English language, except to write his name, or understand or speak it but indifferently. He gave his testimony through an interpreter. Of his mental condition while at Dr. Dickson's, the only evidence is given by Hook and Dickson. Neither the nurse, Mary Spear, nor Dr. Bullard was asked as to his mental condition. The evidence upon this point, up to the time of signing the receipt, rests upon the testimony of Hook and Dickson, which stands against plaintiff's that his mind is and was a blank as to what occurred from the time he was picked up and taken to the power house until he was taken to the sanitarium; and, as to the check for $100, he testified that he did not know why it was given to him; nor could he have known if he had no memory of what took place at Dr. Dickson's. There is no evidence that any one informed him that he had made a settlement, but both Dr. Dickson and Mrs. Simpson testify that he spoke of it himself soon after coming to the sanitarium, and said that the company had not given him enough; that he ought to have had $200 instead of $100. The most that can be said of this evidence is that it created a conflict. We cannot say that plaintiff's testimony was so inherently improbable, in view of his known condition at the time of which he speaks, and of the surrounding circumstances, as to justify the court in taking this question of fact away from the jury. But it is strenuously urged that the evidence conclusively shows that plaintiff was not, when he made the settlement, "entirely without understanding, within the meaning of the statutes of this state"; citing section 39, Civ. Code, relating to the right of rescission where a person of unsound mind, but not entirely without understanding, has entered into a contract. Plaintiff's guardian made affidavit, after the answer was filed, denying that Abrahams ever made, signed, or executed the receipt pleaded. He also stated that, if the mark of Abrahams was made to the receipt, it was procured and placed there without his knowledge or consent, and when he did not know or understand the nature or character or legal effect of the instrument to which his mark was so affixed; that, if made, it was done when he was under the influence of narcotics, and was not mentally competent to know the nature or legal effect of the said receipt or release. The trial was conducted on both sides as though this issue was raised by the pleadings, and without objection to any of the evidence. The court gave instructions to the jury especially directed to the issue whether plaintiff at the time was entirely without understanding. It is now too late to object that the issue was not presented. It is conceded that plaintiff was not adjudged incompetent until July 15, 1896, and the court instructed the jury that this was evidence of incompetency only on that date, and not before. It seems, therefore, that the question of plaintiff's mental condition, and whether he was or was not entirely without understanding, properly went to the jury. Defendant relies upon the evidence of Hook, Dickson, and Mrs. Simpson, as conclusively showing that plaintiff knew what he was doing when he signed the receipt, and that plaintiff's testimony that he knew nothing that occurred at that time is not evidence that he was not entirely without understanding; i. e., that his mind was unsound, but not wholly lacking discernment or power to reason or understand what was transpiring about him. If, however, we are to accept the plaintiff's testimony, as the jury certainly did, it seems plain enough that he was "entirely without understanding" concerning the matter as to which he is sought to be held responsible; for he says he was wholly unconscious, and knew nothing of it. "Understanding" is defined to mean "the act of one who understands or comprehends; comprehension; apprehension and appreciation; discernment." Cent. Dict. If he did not know what he was doing, he did not understand what he was doing; and, if he was in such condition as not to know anything that was transpiring, he was entirely without understanding. Defendant contends that, even if he was incompetent to make the contract of release, he afterwards ratified, and is therefore bound by, it. We do not think the evidence shows, without conflict, that he ratified the agreement of release. He testified that he did not know why he was given the $100. He found himself with it, and that was all he knew. It is true that defendant's witnesses testified to facts which tended to show that he must have known how he came by the money. But he denied the admissions testified to by Dickson and Mrs. Simpson; and it nowhere appears that the facts about the settlement, as claimed by defendant, were communicated to him after he came to himself. Keeping the money in ignorance of how he came by it was not a ratification of an agreement he never entered into, and of which he had no knowledge. The jury were instructed that, if they found that the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages, they might "deduct from the amount of such damages any money given to Abrahams by the defendant." The defendant could not, therefore, complain that it was injured by this payment. Sheanon v. Insurance Co., 83 Wis. 507, 53 N. W., at pages 884, 885. We think the case was fairly submitted to the jury by the instructions given, and that the judgment and order should be affirmed, and it is so advised.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

WITTFIELD et al. v. FORSTER et al.
(L. A. 546.)

TRUST CONVEYANCE—VALIDITY.

1. By the terms of a deed of trust, the grantor conveyed all his property, both real and personal, to the grantee in trust for a certain lodge, to have and to hold unto said trustee, his successors and assigns, forever. Held, that the trust was void, since it did not come within any of the four purposes enumerated by Civ. Code, § 857, for which, under the provisions of said section, express trusts may be created, and did not indicate with reasonable certainty the subject and purpose of the trust, as required by section 2221.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 866, providing where an express trust is created as to realty every estate not embraced therein is left to the author of the trust, and section 871, providing that, when the purpose of an express trust ceases, the estate of the trustee also ceases, where the trusts declared in an instrument are void, either the trustee takes no estate, or there is a resulting trust to the grantor or his heirs.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county.

Action by Heinrich Wittfield and others against George Forster and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Withington & Carter, for appellants. McDonald & McDonald, D. C. Collier, Jr., and N. H. Conklin, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This action is brought by the executor and heirs at law of Gustav Wittfield against the defendants, George Forster and San Diego Lodge No. 35, Free and Accepted Masons, an unincorporated association. There are two counts in the complaint. The first count is in the ordinary form of an action to quiet title to certain lands, and the second count avers the execution by the deceased, Gustav Wittfield, of an instrument in writing, executed by him a few days before his death, purporting to convey all his property, both real and personal, to the said George Forster in trust for the said San Diego Lodge, and the prayer is that said deed be decreed to be void, and to have created no trust, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to the possession of the land embraced by said instrument, and that defendants be decreed to account for the personal property referred to in said instrument. The court rendered judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiffs appeal from the judgment.

The case turns upon the question whether or not the instrument above referred to creates a valid trust. The following is a copy of said instrument: "Gustavus Wittfield to George Forster, trustee: I, Gustavus Wittfield, of San Diego, California, for and in consideration of one dollar, to me in hand paid, do hereby grant, sell, and convey to George Forster, of San Diego, Calif., as trustee in trust for San Diego Lodge No. 35, Free and Accepted Masons, of the state of California, all the property I now own, both real and personal, and of whatever kind and nature or description, and wherever situated. To have and to hold unto said trustee, his successors and assigns, forever. Witness my hand, this 8th day of September, 1894. Gustavus Wittfield." This instrument is manifestly not a conveyance to Forster for his own beneficial use. Its terms clearly show an intention to create a trust, and, if the trust is not sufficiently definite to be carried into effect, or is for any reason illegal or invalid, the instrument either conveys no title or leaves a resulting trust in favor of the grantor or his heirs, where, as in this case, he dies intestate. The law on this subject is very fully stated in the case of Nichols v. Allen, 130 Mass. 212, and cases there cited. No matter what the terms of an instrument creating a trust may be, the "trustee takes an estate adequate to the execution of the trust, no more and no less." Morffew v. Railroad Co., 107 Cal. 587, 40 Pac. 810. Section 1032 of Pom. Eq. Jur. is as follows: "First form: Trust resulting to the donor. This type includes the three following subdivisions: (1) Where property is conveyed by will or deed upon some particular trusts or particular objects, and these purposes fail in whole or in part, or the particular trusts are so uncertain and indefinite that they cannot be carried into effect, or they lapse, or they are illegal. In all these cases a trust, either with reference to the whole property or to the residuum, results in favor of the grantor or his heirs, residuary devisees, or legatees, or personal representatives of the testator. The following are illustrations: Where property is given by will or deed, stated to be on trust, but no trust is declared; or upon trusts to be thereafter declared, but no such declaration is made; or is given upon some trust which has wholly failed and become inoperative; or real property is given upon a trust which is too uncertain, indefinite, and vague in its declarations to be carried into effect; or if the property is given upon a trust which is illegal, and therefore void; or upon a trust which fails by lapse, and the property is not otherwise disposed of." These propositions declared in the text are supported by the authorities referred to. Section 866 of our Civil Code provides that, "where an express trust is created in relation to real property, every estate not embraced in a trust, and not otherwise disposed of, is left to the author of the trust or his successors." Section 871 provides: "When the purpose for which an express trust was created ceases, the estate of the trustee also ceases." And section 2279 provides: "A trust is extinguished by the entire fulfillment of its object, or by such object becoming impossible or unlawful." Under these authorities, where the trusts declared in an instrument are illegal, or for any reason void, either the trustee takes no estate, or there is a resulting trust to the grantor or his heirs; and in the case at bar it is immaterial which of these results follows.

It is contended by appellants that the trust sought to be created in this case is void (1) because the attempted trust is not one of those named in section 857 of the Civil Code; (2) because the instrument does not indicate with any reasonable certainty the purpose of the trust; and (3) because the beneficiaries are not indicated with any reasonable certainty, and that therefore the trust, not being for charitable purposes, is void. We think that the first and second contentions of the appellants must be sustained; and therefore it is not necessary to consider their third contention.

1. Section 847 of the Civil Code provides that "uses and trusts in relation to real property are those only which are specified in this title"; and section 857 in the same title provides that express trusts may be created for four different purposes mentioned in the four subdivisions of the section. It is not necessary to state those four subdivisions here. It is sufficient to say that the attempted trust involved in the case at bar does not come within either of them, and is therefore void.

2. Moreover, section 852 of the Civil Code provides that a trust in relation to real property must be created by a written instrument; and section 2221 provides that the instrument must indicate "with reasonable certainty the subject, purpose and beneficiary of the trust." In Pom. Eq. Jur. par. 1009, the author says: "The declaration of trust, whether written or oral, must be reasonably certain in its material terms; and this requisite of certainty includes the subject-matter of property embraced within the trust, the beneficiaries or persons in whose behalf it is created, the nature and quantity of interest which they are to have, and the manner in which the trust is to be performed. If the language is so vague, general, or equivocal that any of these necessary elements of the trust is left in real uncertainty, then the trust must fail." If we apply the statutory declaration above quoted, and the principle found in the above language of Pomeroy, we see that the language employed in the instrument is entirely too vague and uncertain to constitute a valid trust. The duration of the estate attempted to be granted to the trustee, the nature and quantity of interest which the beneficiaries are to have, and the manner in which the trust is to be performed, are all left undeclared and without any reasonable certainty; and, of course, there is no statement of any of the purposes for which, under section 857, an express trust may be declared. And this uncertainty also makes the attempted trust as to the personal property void.

More than three years after the death of Gustavus Wittfield, and more than that time after the execution of said instrument, and long after the commencement of this action, the respondent George Forster executed and filed for record a written instrument, by which he undertook to declare and define the trusts which he claims were intended to be declared by said Wittfield. But the rights of appellants attached at the death of Gustavus Wittfield, and their status with respect to the property could not be changed or affected by any subsequent act of Forster. The latter could not, by declaring a trust in property which he did not own, defeat the title of the true owners. For the reasons above given, the judgment in favor of respondents was erroneous. The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded.

COWDERY v. McCHESNEY. (Sac. 580.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 5, 1899.)

PLEADING—AMENDMENTS—WITNESSES—OPINIONS —VALUE—BOOK ACCOUNTS—BEST EVIDENCE—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENTS—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. A complaint to recover for labor furnished under an agreement to pay what it was reasonably worth, but which failed to state the reasonable value of the services, may be amended at the trial so as to state such value.

2. A witness stated that he had been employed as a ranch superintendent in the same character of work as that done by plaintiff at the K. ranch, particularizing the character, places, and times of such work; that he had seen plaintiff working on the K. ranch, and that he (witness) was familiar with that ranch; that he knew plaintiff was superintendent of the K. ranch, and looked after the stock and farming of the place; that he knew the fair and reasonable value of such services as were rendered by plaintiff on the K. ranch during the years in dispute; that he knew about what was being paid in the vicinity for such services during said years. Held, that the witness was qualified to testify as to the value of plaintiff's services.

3. The fact that one of the parties has kept a book account of their transactions, does not affect the rule that the oral evidence of persons having personal knowledge of the transactions is the best evidence of the items unless they were made in pursuance or the result of a written contract between the parties.

4. A party may testify whether anything has been paid to him "since" the death of the other party to the contract.

5. In an action on account, errors at the trial will not be deemed harmless because of a want of a showing of nonpayment of the account by defendant's testator, where there is no explanation under oath, on defendant's part, as to why certain books kept by plaintiff for the deceased, and last seen in defendant's possession, which might show nonpayment, were not produced in compliance with the order of court made on plaintiff's request.

6. In an action on an account, where the court had erroneously excluded all of plaintiff's proof to establish the account, and a nonsuit had been granted, it cannot be claimed, on appeal, that, irrespective of such errors, the nonsuit was proper, because no evidence of nonpayment of the claim was introduced.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Action by W. A. Cowdery against Clark McChesney, as executor of the will of George M. Kasson. From a judgment of nonsuit, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Jas. A. Louttit and Louttit & Middlecoff, for appellant. John A. Percy, Budd & Thompson, and Nicol & Orr, for respondent.

GRAY, C. This is an appeal from a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The action was brought to recover a balance due on a mutual, open, and current account. A claim embodying an itemized statement of this account had been presented to defendant as executor of the last will of deceased, and by him rejected. At the conclusion of plaintiff's efforts to lay before a jury evidence in support of his claim, a motion for a nonsuit was granted by the court. A portion of the account involved in the suit consisted in a claim for several years' labor by plaintiff for the deceased in his lifetime. In the complaint it was alleged that the deceased, at the time the plaintiff commenced working for him, agreed to pay him what his services were reasonably worth, but the complaint contained no allegation as to the value of the services. On the trial plaintiff endeavored to prove the value of these services, but his questions to that end were objected to on the ground, among others, that they were germane to no issue in the case. This objection was sustained, whereupon the plaintiff moved the court for leave to amend the complaint so as to state therein the value of the said services. The motion to amend was denied, and counsel for plaintiff again propounded questions to establish the value of these services, but was balked by the further objections of the defendant and the ruling of the court sustaining the same, and the plaintiff never did succeed in getting any evidence of the value of such services before the jury. We think the action of the court was erroneous. It was an error not to permit the complaint to be amended so as to state the value of the services, and this error was prejudicial to plaintiff, because the court subsequently sustained objections to evidence sought to be introduced as to the value of those services, on the ground, as it was stated, "there is not the slightest issue, either by the complaint or answer, on that matter." Respondent contends, however, that the witness R. A. Meyers, called to establish the value of the services, was not qualified to speak on the subject, and the objections to his testifying were, therefore, properly sustained. The witness stated, in substance, that he had been employed in the same character of work as that done by plaintiff at the Kasson ranch, and stated in detail the character, places, and times of the work that he had done of a similar nature to that which Cowdery had performed for Kasson; that he had seen Cowdery working on the Kasson ranch, and was familiar with that ranch. He also stated as a fact within his own knowledge that Cowdery was superintendent of the Kasson ranch, and looking after the stock and after the farming of the place, and that he knew what would be a fair and reasonable value of such services as were rendered by Cowdery to Kasson upon the Kasson ranch during the years 1894 and 1895; that he had been engaged in work of the same character in this (San Joaquin) county and Butte, and knew of others engaged in work of that character, and knew about what was being paid in 1894 and 1895 in San Joaquin county and counties adjoining. Upon this evidence the witness Meyers was clearly qualified to testify as to the value of the services of a ranch superintendent, and answer the questions asked him as to the value of Cowdery's services, and it was error for the court to sustain the objections to these questions on the ground of a supposed want of foundation for the same; and the same thing may be said of the court's ruling as to questions propounded to the witness Atwood.

Mrs. Cowdery was called as a witness by plaintiff, and, after testifying to the character of the work performed on the Kasson ranch by the plaintiff, Cowdery, the following proceedings were had: "Q. Mrs. Cowdery, during the year 1889 was there any transaction between Mr. Kasson and Mr. Cowdery of a business nature, by which Mr. Kasson transferred any property to Mr. Cowdery, or sold him anything? Mr. Budd: We object upon the ground that it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial and not germane to any issue raised by the pleadings. Mr. Middlecoff: I am going now into the proposition of a mutual, open, and current account. Mr. Budd: We make the further objection that it is not the best evidence. The account itself is the best evidence. The Court: If that is your objection, I will sustain your objection. Mr. Middlecoff: We except. Q. I will ask you, Mrs. Cowdery, whether or not in the year 1889 Mr. Cowdery bought any eggs or butter from Mr. Kasson. Mr. Budd: We make the same objection, if the court please. The Court: Gentlemen, now I will make a ruling. I will allow you to prove items of an account, but you must first prove the existence of an account. I order that as the order of the trial. I will order that first the existence of the account must be proved. Then I will let you into the items of it. Mr. Middlecoff: Was there any account between Mr. Kasson and Mr. Cowdery for anything sold by Mr. Kasson to Mr. Cowdery during the year 1889? Mr. Nicol: We object on the ground that it calls for an opinion and conclusion of this witness. (The court sustained the objection, to which ruling of the court plaintiff excepted.) Q. What, if anything, did Mr. Kasson sell Mr. Cowdery in the year 1889? Mr. Nicol: We object upon the ground that it has been asked, objected to, and been ruled upon. The court: I have ruled on that once, and I now sustain the objection on the ground that it is in violation of the order of trial that the court has prescribed. Mr. Middlecoff: We take an exception. Q. Did you see any books of account at the ranch during the year 1889? Mr. Nicol: We object on the ground that it calls for the opinion of the witness as to a matter of fact. (The court sustained the objection, to which ruling of the court plaintiff excepted.) Q. I will ask you whether, in the year 1889, Mr. Kasson directed you to deliver any butter or eggs to Mr. Cowdery. Mr. Nicol: We object upon the ground that it is immaterial. The court: The objection is sustained upon the ground that it is violating the order that the court has prescribed for the trial. Mr. Middlecoff: We except. I don't know as I understand the order of the court. The court: I have said that the order of the trial would be that before you go into proving the items of an account you must first prove that there was an account. Q. I will ask you if any account book was kept at the Kasson ranch during the year 1889, in which there was any record or anything written down concerning any transaction, or purporting to concern any transaction, or regarded transaction, between Mr. Kasson and Mr. Cowdery. Mr. Budd: We object,—First, on the ground that it is incompetent; second, on the ground that it calls for a conclusion of the witness as to what certain matter concerned or involved. (The court sustained the objection, to which ruling of the court plaintiff excepted.)" In excluding evidence of the items of the account, a copy of which was in plaintiff's claim against the estate of Kasson, and also set out in the complaint in this action, and in ordering that the account must be proved before the plaintiff would be permitted to go into the items of it, the court erred. The only way an account can be proved ordinarily is by establishing by evidence the several items of the same, and the oral evidence of persons having personal knowledge of the transactions is the best evidence of the items unless there is something to indicate that such items accrued in pursuance of, or are the result of, a written contract between the parties. The fact that one or both of the parties have kept a book account of their transactions does not affect the rule of evidence, and the oral testimony of eye and ear witnesses to the transactions in which the various items of an account accrued is still primary, and not secondary, evidence of such items. The books themselves are secondary or supplementary evidence. The "order of trial," as it was called by the court, seems impracticable, if not impossible, to comply with.

Of William Cowdery, called as a witness in his own behalf, the following question was asked, and the following proceedings had: "Q. Has anything been paid to you since his death on account of any services rendered by you to him during his lifetime, if you rendered any such services? Mr. Nicol: We object on the ground that this witness is not competent to testify in answer thereto under section 1800 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the question is leading. The Court: The objection is sustained upon the ground that the question necessarily carries with it the fact of an account existing prior to his death. Mr. Middlecoff: I note an exception. Q. If any balance upon any account was due to you upon the death of George M. Kasson, does that balance still remain unpaid? Mr. Nicol: We make the same objection. (The court sustained the objection, to which ruling of the court plaintiff excepted.)" The inquiry contained in these questions did not relate to anything that occurred before the death of deceased, and does not fall under the inhibition of section 1800, Code Civ. Proc. The ruling of the court was therefore erroneous.

Respondent contends that if plaintiff failed to make out a case by not proving nonpayment of his claim, the judgment of nonsuit must stand, no matter whether errors were committed by the court below in other particulars, so long as these errors did not affect the admission of evidence going to the proof of nonpayment. We have already seen that one error of the court consisted in excluding evidence of nonpayment subsequent to the decease of Kasson. There seems, however, to be no evidence of nonpayment during the lifetime of Kasson. As to that period the book accounts or memoranda kept by the deceased, or under his directions, in his lifetime, might well be looked to for evidence of this negative fact. It appears that there were some books kept by plaintiff for Kasson, one termed a "petit book" and the other a "ranch book." The last seen of these books, according to the sworn testimony, they were in the possession of McChesney, the defendant; and, though vigorous efforts were made to secure their production on the trial, it seems that it was impossible to find them. It may be that these books would disclose evidence of the nonpayment of plaintiff's claim; possibly they would not. At all events, this court should not say to the plaintiff on this appeal, "We will presume that the errors of the court were without prejudice to you because you produced no evidence of nonpayment," so long as there is no explanation under oath on the part of the defendant as to why the books were not produced in compliance with the order of the court. If we were to do that, it would seem that we might be permitting the defendant to take advantage of his own wrong. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 1880, Code Civ. Proc., a foundation for the introduction of the account books might have been laid through the testimony of the plaintiff himself. Roche v. Ware, 71 Cal. 375, 12 Pac. 284. Another sufficient answer to the position of respondent is that it would have been a vain thing for plaintiff to prove the nonpayment of his claim until he had first established the existence of such claim by competent proof. He had offered what he deemed to be competent proof to that end,—presumably all the proof he had,—and it had been excluded by the court. It was time, then, for him to bring his case to a cheerful conclusion. Any effort to prove the nonpayment of a claim that he had failed to establish would have been an unwarranted trespass upon the time and good nature of the trial judge. The law does not require a vain thing. For the errors herein specified, we advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be reversed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

Ex parte TRUMAN, City and County Treasurer. (Cr. 539.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 11, 1899.)

CONTEMPT—PARTIES TO ORIGINAL PROCEEDING—ORDER UPON COUNTY TREASURER TO PAY MONEY.

Contempt proceedings will not lie against a county treasurer for his refusal to obey an order of court for the payment of a money demand, where he was not a party to the proceeding in which the order was made; the treasurer being entitled in such case to make such defense as he may deem meritorious.

In bank.

Application for a writ of habeas corpus by I. J. Truman, city and county treasurer, for his release from the custody of the sheriff of the county of San Francisco. Writ granted.

John H. Dickinson and J. J. Truman, Jr., for petitioner. Geo. D. Collins, for respondent. J. C. Campbell, amicus curiæ.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus by I. J. Truman, treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco. The superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and Hon. Carroll Cook, judge thereof, had made its order directing the treasurer to pay certain moneys to the stenographic reporter of the judge's court. The order was based upon the provisions of section 274 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it stood before the unconstitutional amendment of 1885, which declares: "In criminal cases when the testimony has been taken down or transcribed upon the order of the court, the fees of the reporter shall be certified by the court and paid out by the treasury of the county or city and county in which the case is tried upon the order of the court." Upon the treasurer's refusal to comply with the order and pay the moneys as directed therein, he was cited before the presiding judge of the court in contempt proceedings, and, after hearing, was for his refusal adjudged to be in contempt, and ordered to be imprisoned by the sheriff until he complied with the order of court. Upon being taken into custody by the sheriff, he sued out this writ of habeas corpus. By this proceeding there is sought to be determined the validity of that portion of section 274 of the Code of Civil Procedure above quoted. But that question is not justly presented for determination upon this hearing. It is the duty of the treasurer not only to refuse to pay any and all demands which he believes to be illegal, but also to refuse to pay a legal demand unless it shall have been presented to him for payment after compliance with all the forms and requirements of the law touching the presentment of such a demand upon the treasury. If the demand in question was a legal and collectible demand, the stenographic reporter had his remedy by proceedings in mandate; and, upon the other hand, the treasurer, called regularly before the court in that proceeding, could make such defenses to the enforcement of the claim as he deemed meritorious. But he was not a party to the proceedings which resulted in the order of the court directing the payment, and contempt proceedings, therefore, could not lie against him for his refusal to comply with the order. Ex parte Widber, 31 Cal. 367, 27 Pac. 733. Let the prisoner be discharged.

PEOPLE v. McMAHON. (Cr. 483.)

CRIMINAL LAW — APPEAL — TRIAL — REMARKS OF DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

1. Affidavit of defendant as to irregularities occurring during trial, printed in the transcript, but not appearing in the bill of exceptions, in no way authenticated, and marked as having been read on motion for new trial, cannot be considered on appeal.

2. In a prosecution for robbery alleged to have been committed by defendant after leaving the saloon of H., it is not error for the district attorney in his closing remarks to refer to H. as "Old Harris, the whisky seller," and to state that "this man [referring to defendant] ought to be in the penitentiary."

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Dan McMahon was convicted of robbery, and appeals. Affirmed.

W. J. Murphy and Brooks & Trask, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

COOPER, C. The defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery, alleged to have been committed on the 24th day of February, 1898, by the felonious stealing, taking, and carrying away from the person of one Heisler certain silver coins of the value of $18. He appeals from the judgment, from the order of the lower court denying motion for a new trial, and from the order denying a motion in arrest of judgment.

The principal point made by defendant's counsel is that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the verdict. Heisler testified: That on the evening of February 24th he met the defendant in the saloon of one Harris, after dark, and that witness, defendant, and one Patterson went into the back room of the saloon, and were drinking, remaining there about half an hour. That the three then left Harris' saloon, and defendant said they would go to another place. They walked just one block, and turned to the right, when defendant or Patterson grabbed witness by the throat, and one or both of them struck him a violent blow over the eye, which knocked him down, and rendered him for a time insensible. That when he recovered he found that all his money had been taken from his pocket, the amount being about $18. He then returned to the saloon of Harris. The witness Swope testified that he saw defendant and Patterson, on the night of February 24th, at the saloon of Harris; that he also saw Heisler there, and the three afterwards left together; that afterwards Heisler came back, and showed witness an injury on his face. The witness Steele testified that he saw Heisler on February 25th, and his eyes were swollen and bruised. It is not necessary to further discuss the testimony. If the testimony of these witnesses was believed by the jury, it was amply sufficient to sustain the verdict. The verdict is conclusive evidence that the jury believed it. Under the well-known rule, we cannot disturb the verdict of the jury when there is sufficient evidence to support it.

It is claimed that "the conduct of the district attorney was certainly outrageous during the trial." There is nothing in the record tending to show any misconduct on the part of the district attorney. There is printed in the transcript an affidavit of defendant, in which certain language claimed to have been used by the district attorney is quoted. This affidavit is not in the bill of exceptions, and is in no way authenticated. It is not even marked as having been read on motion for new trial. It therefore forms no part of the record, and cannot be considered. Sup. Ct. Rule 29; People v. Price, 17 Cal. 311; People v. Mahoney, 77 Cal. 529, 20 Pac. 73. But, even if authenticated, the remarks are not such as to have in any way prejudiced the defendant. The affidavit states that, after speaking of Harris, who kept the saloon, as "Old Harris, the whisky seller," the district attorney said, "This man [referring to defendant] ought to be in the penitentiary." This is merely an opinion expressed by the district attorney during the argument, and was not a statement of any fact, or a suggestion of something as being true which had not been proven. The district attorney must be allowed some latitude in commenting on the case, and his conduct in a case or statements must be such as in a material matter to have prejudiced the defendant before such conduct or statements would be ground for setting aside a verdict. This disposes of all the alleged errors complained of in defendant's brief, and we do not discover any others. The judgment and orders should be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and orders are affirmed.

O'BRIEN v. O'BRIEN. (S. F. 1,070.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 17, 1899.)

DIVORCE—DECREE—ALIMONY—AMENDMENT—FINDINGS OF FACT—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SETTLEMENT—NOTICE—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

1. Where, at the time noticed for the settlement of a bill of exceptions, counsel for both parties were present, and appellant presented the bill and the proposed amendments, and by consent the hearing was postponed several times before objection was made that appellant, in his notice, omitted to state that he would present the proposed amendments as well as the bill, such objection is waived.

2. Where the question of alimony is raised by the pleadings in a divorce case, the failure to find on that issue is a judicial error, and not a clerical misprision; and hence the judgment cannot be amended by adding an order reserving the question of alimony for further consideration.

3. The amendment of a judgment for divorce by adding an order reserving the question of alimony for further consideration is not harmless error.

4. Where a court has lost jurisdiction by entering a final decree in divorce, the subsequent appearance of defendant to contest a motion for alimony does not give the court jurisdiction to amend the decree by adding an order reserving the question of alimony for further consideration.

5. In a divorce case the court filed a "Memorandum of Decision," which, as a finding of fact, was insufficient to sustain a judgment, but which ordered that the question of alimony be reserved for further consideration. Afterwards the court signed and filed findings and a decree, which made no mention of alimony. Held, that the memorandum of decision could not be considered as a finding, so as to make the failure of the decree to reserve the question of alimony, in accordance therewith, a mere clerical misprision, authorizing an amendment.

6. A memorandum of decision in a divorce case which fails to show the jurisdictional fact of residence, or the facts constituting the grounds for divorce, and which does not contain a separate statement of facts and conclusions of law, and does not direct judgment, is insufficient, as a finding of fact, to sustain a judgment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action for divorce by Julia Scott O'Brien against Michael O'Brien. From an order amending a decree for plaintiff by adding an order reserving the question of alimony for further consideration, respondent appeals. Reversed.

Beatty & Beatty, for appellant. Henley & Costello and R. R. Bigelow, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Proceedings to amend a decree of divorce by motion. The trial of the action was concluded on July 8, 1895, and on that day the then trial judge, Hon. D. J. Murphy, signed, and there was filed by the clerk, a paper entitled "Memorandum of Decision." It is a brief statement of three paragraphs, prefaced as follows: "In this case, after fully considering the evidence, I am led to the following conclusions, and find the facts to be." Paragraph 1 is a statement that the evidence is not sufficient to support the claim that the parties intermarried in 1890, or were husband and wife prior to July 21, 1893; paragraph 2 is a finding that the marriage was solemnized on July 21, 1893; paragraph 3, "that said defendant has been guilty of such acts of cruelty towards plaintiff as entitled her to a divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, and the court so orders. The question of alimony and counsel fees is reserved for further consideration." Findings were not waived. On the same day a minute order was entered as follows: "This case having been heretofore submitted to the court for consideration and decision, and taken under advisement, and now the court being fully informed, and having fully considered the same, it is hereby ordered that the marriage heretofore and now existing between the defendant and plaintiff be, and the same is hereby, dissolved, and a decree of divorce granted to the plaintiff, on the ground of the extreme cruelty of the defendant towards the plaintiff. It is further ordered that the question of counsel fees and alimony be reserved for further consideration and decision. See memorandum of decision on file herein." Nothing further appears until July 25, 1895, when the record shows full findings and decision, in the opening paragraph of which it is stated as follows: "And the court, having heard and duly considered the evidence, and having examined the pleadings, and having given full and mature consideration of the law and facts, now renders and makes this its decision in the case, and finds the following facts." Then follows a statement of the facts of the marriage, residence of the parties, an outline of the married life of the parties, and the specific acts of cruelty proven, from which facts the court finds its conclusions of law, that the plaintiff is entitled to a decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony, "and it is hereby ordered that judgment be entered accordingly. Dated July 25, A. D. 1895. D. J. Murphy, Judge. [Indorsed] Filed in open court July 25, 1895. C. F. Curry, Clerk, by C. C. Morris, Deputy Clerk." The decree follows, of the same date, and is signed by the judge, and was entered in the judgment book on that day. On July 29, 1895, the attorneys for plaintiff served notice on defendant's counsel of the rendition and entering of the decision of July 25th in favor of plaintiff. This notice was filed on July 30th. No mention was made of counsel fees or alimony in the findings or decree of July 25th. On October 1, 1895, counsel for plaintiff served notice on defendant's counsel that a motion would be made on October 4, 1895, for an order awarding plaintiff counsel fees and alimony, to be heard on all the papers and records in the case, and upon testimony to be offered. The motion was heard by Judge A. A. Sanderson, and on October 29, 1895, he signed an order granting alimony and counsel fees. Subsequently defendant, by his counsel, moved the court to modify its order and reduce the amount of alimony, which was refused by an order entered December 14, 1895. Nothing further appears until on February 18, 1897, when the court made an order amending the decree of July 25, 1895, nunc pro tunc, by inserting at the end thereof the following, "It is ordered that the question of alimony and counsel fees be reserved for further consideration," on the ground that the omission of this reservation "was the result of clerical misprision and error, and that the amendment thereof would be in furtherance of justice." The appeal is from this order.

1. Plaintiff objected to the settlement of the bill of exceptions, and renews the objection here, on the ground that defendant, in his notice, omitted to state that he would present to the court the amendments offered by plaintiff thereto, as well as the proposed bill of exceptions prepared by defendant; citing section 650, Code Civ. Proc. At the time noticed, counsel for both parties were present; and defendant presented the bill and the proposed amendments to the court, and asked that the bill be settled and allowed. By consent the hearing was postponed several times, and was finally proceeded with April 30, 1897, and then for the first time the objection now urged was made. The court had jurisdiction of the bill and the amendments, and the order of continuance necessarily included both. By appearing and consenting without objection to these several continuances, plaintiff waived any right she may have had to challenge the sufficiency of the notice through which she appeared. Hicks v. Masten, 101 Cal. 651, 36 Pac. 130.

2. The principal question is whether the court had the power to amend the judgment. It was said in Egan v. Egan, 90 Cal. 21, 27 Pac. 24: "Courts have the power at all times to allow amendments to judgments for the purpose of having the judgment, as entered, express that which was rendered, so that the record will contain the actual decision of the court. Where the clerk fails to enter judgment as it is pronounced, the court has always the power to correct the matter and order the proper entry to be made. Clerical misprisions can be corrected at any time by an order of the court, but judicial errors can be remedied only through a motion for a new trial or an appeal." See, also, Bank v. Dusy, 110 Cal. 69, 42 Pac. 476, and Byrne v. Hoag, 116 Cal. 1, 47 Pac. 775. We think, from the evidence upon which the order here in question was made, it clearly appears that the decree entered July 25th, as signed by the judge, was his last direction to the clerk, and was the decision in the case, and there was no mistake or misprision of the clerk. If error was committed in rendering the judgment, it was a judicial error, which could be remedied only by appeal or motion for a new trial. Bank v. Dusy, supra. Looking to the findings of facts and conclusions of law, we find them full and complete as a foundation for the decree. They are signed by the judge, as is also the decree. The complaint set forth the financial situation of defendant, and asked "that defendant be compelled by an order of this court to make permanent provision for the support of this plaintiff, and to pay to this plaintiff alimony and counsel fees as may be meet and just in the premises." The question of alimony was therefore an issue in the case. The court made no finding of fact upon this issue, and the decree is silent upon the subject. This was error, as every material issue must be met by the findings. Plaintiff could have had the omission corrected before the judgment was entered, by additional findings (Condee v. Barton, 62 Cal. 1; Hayes v. Wetherbee, 60 Cal. 396), or there remained the remedy of appeal or motion for new trial after the entry of judgment (Egan v. Egan, supra). The contention of respondent is that the "memorandum of decision" is "legally and technically sufficient to constitute findings, and does constitute findings"; that the findings of July 25th do not purport to supersede the first set, and there is no conflict between them, and they should be construed together to support the judgment (citing Smith v. Taylor, 82 Cal. 533, 544, 23 Pac. 217); that, construing the two together, it clearly appears that the intention of the judge was to reserve the question of alimony and counsel fees for further consideration, and hence the omission to insert in the decree any provision as to alimony and counsel fees was the mistake of the clerk,—a clerical misprision, which the court could correct at any time on motion. Respondent makes the point that, if the court lost jurisdiction, it was restored by the consent of defendant in appearing and contesting plaintiff's motion for permanent alimony; citing Thomp. Corp. 7558; Works, Jur. 225; Rued v. Cooper, 109 Cal. 682, 689, 34 Pac. 98; Brown v. Crow, 3 Hardin, 443. And finally respondent contends that, having regained jurisdiction by consent, the order of the court amending the judgment nunc pro tunc, if erroneous, was not prejudicial to defendant, and therefore will not be reversed. It cannot be said that this order was without possible injury to defendant; for, if the judgment should stand as amended, it would carry with it the power to make still further orders as to alimony. But we do not think the court regained jurisdiction. When the court entered its final decree of July 25th, it had no further jurisdiction over the parties or the subject-matter. Howell v. Howell, 104 Cal. 45, 37 Pac. 770. The appearance of defendant in the subsequent matter of the motion for permanent alimony did not have the effect to reopen the judgment, or authorize its amendment by motion. In Kamp v. Kamp, 59 N. Y. 212, where an application was made for alimony after a final judgment which made no provision as to alimony, and the defendant appeared and contested the application, it was said: "The jurisdiction of the court over the subject-matter of the action and over the parties terminated with the entry of final judgment, except to enforce the judgment and carry out its provisions. The court then lost jurisdiction over the person of the defendant for every purpose." The authorities cited by respondent do not sustain her contention. The case of Rued v. Cooper, supra, for example, decides nothing more on the point than that consent may give jurisdiction over the person. The court said: "If the court can be said to have lost jurisdiction at all, it could only be as to the assignee; but as to him it may be restored by consent, the court not having lost jurisdiction of the subject-matter." The findings of fact of July 25th were signed by the judge, and, that there could be no mistake as to his intention as to what the decree should contain, he signed that also. Why he omitted all mention of alimony, and said nothing in the course of the findings or decree indicating his intention as first expressed in the "memorandum of decision" and "minute order," is left wholly to conjecture. In such a situation, it seems to us the soundest and safest rule is that the last expression of the intention of the judge—it being an expression fully supported by the findings—must be conclusive. It would be subversive of that sanctity and stability everywhere given to final judgments to hold otherwise. We cannot presume, as counsel for plaintiff claims we should, that the judgment was entered pursuant to the findings of July 8th, and that, therefore, it was the omission of the clerk not to include in the decree the reservation as to alimony. To do this would be to subordinate the final and deliberate act of the court to a presumption. Nor was the action pending by virtue of section 1049, Code Civ. Proc., until the time for appeal had passed, in the sense claimed, to wit, that until after the time for appeal had elapsed the court could set aside, amend, or annul the decree. If it were true, as plaintiff contends, that the findings of July 25th do not sustain the judgment, and that the memorandum of July 8th is sufficient for that purpose, we could see force in the contention that the decree should be made to rest upon the so-called first findings. But we do not think the memorandum, treated as findings, sufficient to support the judgment. It fails to show the jurisdictional facts of residence. It sets forth no ultimate facts from which the legal conclusion of cruelty may be drawn. There is no separate statement of facts and conclusions of law, and neither the "memorandum" nor the "minute order" directs judgment to be entered. Looking at these entries of July 8th, it seems to be the more rational view that the judge regarded them as wholly insufficient, and hence the final and formal findings of facts, conclusions of law, and decree. We are unable by any reasonable interpretation of this final action of the court to conclude otherwise than that it decided to ignore the question of alimony altogether, which, while it was error, was judicial in its character. Nor can we wholly disregard the fact that the judge signed all these papers. It is true, his signature did not make the act any more or less binding, but upon the question of his intention the fact has some significance. It is said in Byrne v. Hoag, 116 Cal. 1, 47 Pac. 775: "The decree, as entered in 1893, was signed by the judge, and, under any view, it was his last direction to the clerk, and was the decision in the case. It has been held that it is not necessary for the judge to sign a judgment, * * * but, where the judge does sign the decree, his signature, as was said in Re Cook's Estate, 77 Cal. 227, 19 Pac. 434, is intended 'to give the clerk a surer means of correctly entering what has been adjudged.'" It results from the foregoing that the order should be reversed, and it is so advised.

We concur: BRITT, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is reversed.

HITE v. HITE. (S. F. 1,489.)¹
(Supreme Court of California. May 13, 1899.)

DIVORCE—ALIMONY.

In an action for divorce, brought by a wife, where the marriage is denied, to entitle her to alimony and suit money she must prove it by a preponderance of the evidence; a mere prima facie showing is not sufficient.

McFarland and Garoutte, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. For opinion in department, see 55 Pac. 900.

TEMPLE, J. This is an appeal from an order allowing alimony and suit money in an action for a divorce. Plaintiff contents herself in her complaint, so far as her cause of action is concerned, with the averment of her marriage to defendant, and a charge of adultery against him. Defendant denies the marriage, and avers that the person with whom he is charged to have committed adultery is his lawful wife. He also charges that plaintiff, since her alleged marriage to him, has had illicit relations with other men. The order or judgment appealed from was made after notice and a hearing upon which many affidavits were read, as were also depositions of the parties. In addition to the showing as to her lack of means and the faculties of the defendant, the plaintiff states that she will require 30 or 40 witnesses, many of them to prove that the parties have cohabited together as husband and wife, and are generally reputed to be such, and that the defendant has frequently so represented. In her deposition she states that the contract consisted simply in this: that the defendant said to her, "You are my wife;" that no witnesses were present; and that she had refused longer to live with defendant unless he married her. These facts are specifically denied by the defendant. He admits the cohabitation, and that he has supported the plaintiff, but he avers that she is an Indian woman, who had, prior to his relations with her, been kept by many other men, by one of whom (Gibbs) she had a son, Thomas H. Gibbs, who makes an affidavit on her behalf in this case. Defendant also states that since she commenced living with him she has several times left him, living with other men; and that she sometimes went with the Indians to their fandangoes, and returned when she chose. He denies that either ever supposed the relations to be matrimonial, or that he ever called her wife, or represented her to be such. He says that he never even spoke to her upon the subject, but he admits that he supported her and her son. Thomas H. Gibbs, the illegitimate son of the plaintiff, corroborates the statements of his mother, and says he "was always told and led to believe by said John R. Hite that plaintiff was the wife of said John R. Hite." Plaintiff also read the affidavit of one James D. Westfall, who deposed that on one occasion defendant introduced plaintiff as his wife, and also that the parties were generally reputed to be husband and wife. This constitutes the evidence of plaintiff upon the issue of marriage. The defendant, in addition to his specific denial, read the depositions of 10 other persons, all of whom depose that they were intimate acquaintances of both parties, and well acquainted in the neighborhood where they lived. They unite in saying that neither party ever claimed to be married to the other, and they were not, at any time, reputed to be husband and wife. Some of them corroborate other statements made by defendant as to illicit relations of plaintiff with others. In addition, the reputation of Gibbs, plaintiff's son and main witness, was attacked.

Appellant contends that the showing was insufficient to justify the action of the court in granting alimony. The testimony of plaintiff in regard to the contract of marriage was in itself quite unsatisfactory, especially when taken in connection with the charge in defendant's affidavits, which she does not deny, that she had, before her cohabitation with defendant, and even since, had improper relations with other men. Under such circumstances it is difficult to believe that an Indian woman would object to further relations except upon condition of marriage. The positive denial of the defendant is certainly sufficient to overcome this testimony under such circumstances. The matter must then depend upon the evidence of common repute, and no one would contend that the plaintiff did show a common, uniform, and undivided repute of marriage. But I think it evident that the court did not determine the question of marriage at the hearing. The judge doubtless adopted the views of plaintiff's counsel upon the subject, and concluded that it was only necessary to hold that plaintiff had, by her affidavits, made out such a case as would throw the burden of proof upon the husband. To justify alimony, marriage must be admitted or proven. Upon this subject there is no difference in the authorities. Plaintiff's counsel contends that it is proven, within the meaning of this rule, when the wife, upon her showing, makes a prima facie case, regardless of the denials or proof produced by the husband. He says it is a novel proposition that on the hearing for temporary alimony plaintiff must produce a preponderance of evidence. He claims this would be equivalent to saying: "Prove your case by a preponderance of evidence, and then you shall have an allowance to enable you to make such proof." He also says: "In this case the plaintiff made a prima facie case, and, if the defendant had produced a hundred witnesses in an attempt to overcome her affidavits, the result would be the same. Indeed, it would be only stronger reason for allowing her means sufficient to procure the evidence which she and her counsel, who had talked with the witnesses, say she can produce, if given the means to do so." And this, I think, is really the question in the case: Was it sufficient, to entitle the plaintiff to alimony and suit money, for her to make by her own showing a prima facie case? I believe there is no authority for that position. If the marriage were admitted, then, upon a showing of the wife's necessities and the faculties of the husband, the allowance is almost a matter of course. It is otherwise when the marriage is denied. Then, before alimony can be allowed, the marriage must be proved; and a prima facie showing made by the wife when there is a counter showing is not sufficient. The judge should be satisfied from the entire proof made of the fact of marriage. Unless upon that question the husband has had his day in court, and a hearing, if alimony is allowed, his property is taken without due process of law. This precise question has not been considered, or even suggested, in any case to which my attention has been called, except in McKenna v. McKenna, 70 Ill. App. 340. It was there said that in such case—when the marriage is denied—the order cannot properly be made “until a hearing has been had, and the court upon it finds that the relation of wife and husband exists.” The hardships which might result from either doctrine is there very tersely stated. The learned judge quotes from Schonwald v. Schonwald, 62 N. C. 219, to the effect that it is better when a woman makes oath of the fact of marriage to make an allowance, although the oath may turn out to be false, than that a wife may be in danger of starvation “if a brutal husband makes oath denying the marriage, which may turn out to be false”; to which the Illinois judge replies that “the more accurate statement would be that it is better to compel any man to pay temporary alimony and expenses of suit to any woman who may see fit to make oath that he is her husband, however strongly he may deny the allegation, rather than to allow her to be in want of money which he has.” Whatever hardships may result, the court cannot lawfully take by final decree money from A. and give it to B., whatever may be the necessities of B., when A. disputes the facts upon which his liability is made to depend, without a trial and a determination of the issues made. The hardship to B. cannot modify the imperative rule of law and the absolute constitutional guaranty. It is not such a trial, and there can be no such finding, when a man is merely called into court to see whether one claiming to be his wife has in her pleadings and affidavits made a prima facie case. He must be heard, and be allowed to submit evidence, which must be considered in determining as to the fact of marriage. But that opportunity need not be on the trial of the case itself. The application for alimony, though it cannot be considered a separate suit, is a proceeding for a separate judgment, which, when granted, has nothing to do with the final judgment in the case, and will not be affected by it. It is a final judgment, from which an appeal may be taken. Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, 16 Pac. 345.

To satisfy the requirement of due process of law it is not always necessary that such a trial should be afforded as is had in ordinary suits in courts of justice. The hearing allowed must be such as is practicable and reasonable in the particular case. Cooley, Const. Lim. 434. See, also, Ex parte Ah

Fook, 49 Cal. 406; Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 404, 14 Pac. 71. Cooley says the opportunity to be heard must be such as “the settled maxims of law permit and sanction, and under such safeguards for the protection of individual rights as these maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one in question belongs.” It has been the practice to determine, as to the allowance of temporary alimony, upon motion with notice and upon affidavits. The defendant is thereby afforded an opportunity to be heard. Many cases are cited by respondent's counsel which he contends hold that all that is required on the part of the wife to justify an allowance of alimony is that she, by her showing, shall make such a case as upon a trial of the issue would cast the burden upon the husband. It is not necessary to review all the cases, but the case of Brinkley v. Brinkley, 50 N. Y. 184, is much relied upon, and concerning it a few remarks may be made. That case has some likeness to this. A contract marriage was alleged, with subsequent cohabitation. The wife alleged that defendant on many specified occasions introduced her as his wife, that they were received as husband and wife by reputable acquaintances, and such was their common reputation. The husband denied the marriage, and that he had by word or act at any time or place given the least foundation for the supposition or charge that plaintiff was his wife. He denied that their cohabitation was matrimonial, but averred that plaintiff was of unchaste character and person, and her relation with defendant was libidinous, and unsanctioned by law. In other words, he admitted the cohabitation, but claimed that it was meretricious from the beginning. Judge Folger did not say that this was not a denial of a fact essential to constitute marriage, but the contrary. Cohabitation, and holding out to the world that the persons so cohabiting are married, and general reputation, though all admitted, do not of themselves constitute marriage. But they authorize the presumption of the other fact, to wit, that the cohabitation was with matrimonial intent. This last fact was denied by Brinkley. The court did consider the affidavits of defendant, but concluded that they did not overcome the case made by the plaintiff. The judge did say that the question was not whether the evidence would be sufficient to justify a final decree, but whether “the proofs of the parties give reason to apprehend that upon a trial of the issues between them there is the fair probability that the plaintiff will maintain her allegations”; that is, does the evidence submitted by both show that probably plaintiff will prevail? I do not understand how this could be unless there was upon that hearing a preponderance of evidence in favor of marriage, although, inasmuch as the trial was not as complete nor the evidence of as high a grade as upon the trial of the issues in the case, it would not justify a final decree, or a finding which would be an estoppel. Judge Folger evidently thought that when Brinkley admitted that they had cohabited as husband and wife in the face of the world, and had associated with intimate acquaintances who were reputable people, as though the relation was honorable, it raised a presumption of marriage, not overcome by the general denials of the defendant and his claim that the relation was meretricious. Innocence and morality are to be presumed, rather than the opposite. This is put very strongly by Judge Folger. He says the defendant admits facts and circumstances presumptive of marriage, but says of them "that, though apparently proper and rightful, they were but the cover for a meretricious and libidinous connection, begun and continued in impurity," and that the issue was whether the cohabitation was honorable and matrimonial, or "the unsanctioned foregathering of a lecher and a wanton." This view was taken of that case in Collins v. Collins, 71 N. Y. 269. There the wife made, beyond doubt, a prima facie case, but the husband averred that the de facto marriage, which he admitted, was void, and the court held that it was error to allow temporary alimony until that question was settled. The principal difference between this case now in hand and the Brinkley Case is that this defendant denies that he ever represented the plaintiff to be his wife, or that they were reputed to be such. In the Brinkley Case these facts were admitted. We are not called upon here to say that it is necessary, in order to justify the allowance of temporary alimony, that a marriage de jure must be shown. The rule upon this subject is discussed by Mr. Bishop in his work on Marriage, Divorce, and Separation (section 922 et seq.). All the evidence here tending to show marriage at all tends to prove a marriage de jure, and such was also the fact in the Brinkley Case, although counsel seem to have understood that case differently. I think the superior court did not intend to hold, upon all the evidence before it,—that of defendant as well as that submitted by plaintiff,—that there was a preponderance in favor of the fact of marriage; and, if it must be held that it did so adjudge, there was a plain abuse of discretion. Judgment and order reversed.

We concur: VAN DYKE, J.; HENSHAW, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment of reversal. It is only a wife who can claim alimony (Civ. Code, § 137), and, when the fact of marriage is in issue and unproved, there is no one in that position. To allow a woman alimony for the purpose of enabling her to prove that she is a wife seems to me to involve a glaring absurdity, and to allow it every time she makes a prima facie case of marriage by her pleading or affidavit would result in something more serious than an absurdity. If a husband sues for a divorce, alleging a marriage, of course there can be no question of the right to alimony, if he is able to pay and the wife is in need. If he sues to annul a marriage upon the ground that it was void ab initio by reason of fraud, precontract, insanity, etc., the granting of alimony pendente lite would be proper, because a formal marriage is alleged, and will remain a lawful and established marriage in the absence of affirmative proof by him of the existence of some fact or facts which will invalidate it. In such a case I concede the propriety and justice of allowing the wife (for until the fraud or other invalidating circumstances are established she is the wife) money to make her defense. But when a woman sues for a divorce, and is met at the very threshold of the proceeding by a denial that she ever was a wife, the case is entirely different. She must establish the marriage before she can claim alimony or suit money, and she must establish it at a trial, and by satisfactory evidence. Even if this conclusion involved the inconveniences and hardships which counsel have depicted in their arguments, it would be none the less inevitable; but, in my opinion, such instances of hardship will rarely, if ever, arise. In a case of this aspect the plaintiff is not limited to a bare allegation of marriage in general terms. She may allege the specific facts from which the inference of marriage arises, with all the circumstances of time and place, and the defendant, in order to put the fact of marriage in issue, will be compelled not only to deny marriage in general terms, but also to make specific denials of the facts which prima facie constitute marriage. To make such denials, he must expose himself to the danger of being convicted of perjury if the facts alleged are true. If it be said that this is not sufficient security to plaintiff, I answer that it is at least equal to any security the defendant or the court can have that the plaintiff's claim is not wholly fictitious. In this case the defendant makes a complete denial of the facts alleged by plaintiff as constituting a marriage; and until that issue is tried and determined by final judgment the plaintiff has no claim upon him as his wife. Undoubtedly there are numerous cases in this country which can be cited in opposition to this view, but the sounder reason and the more trustworthy authorities sustain it. In my opinion, it is sustained by the reasoning of Judge Folger in the case of Brinkley v. Brinkley, cited by Justice Temple, and still more fully sustained by the decisions to which Judge Folger refers. Of course, it has been assumed in what has been here said that there is no serious contention on the part of the respondent that the superior court has tried and finally determined the issue of marriage in her favor. There is, in fact, no such claim. The whole argument in support of the order appealed from is that it required only a prima facie showing by ex parte affidavits to sustain it, and that the issue of marriage is still to be tried.

HARRISON, J. (concurring). Further consideration upon the rehearing of the question involved herein has led me to the conclusion that the court erred in making the order appealed from. The question involved in the appeal is to be determined by the statutes of this state, irrespective of the decisions thereon by the ecclesiastical and chancery courts of other jurisdictions, however serviceable the opinions of those courts may be in arriving at a proper construction of the statutes. "The Code establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates" (Civ. Code, § 4), and section 137 of the same Code provides: "While an action for divorce is pending the court may in its discretion require the husband to pay as alimony any money necessary to enable the wife to support herself or her children, or to prosecute or defend the action." As such order can be made only in behalf of the wife, it is essential that the applicant for the order make it appear to the court that she is the wife of the respondent. In an action for divorce by the husband it would appear from his complaint that the defendant is his wife, and no further showing of this fact would be required; but in an action by the wife, if the defendant denies that the plaintiff is his wife, she must establish the relation between them to the satisfaction of the court before she can be entitled to the order. The existence of this relation would be the main issue in the action, and would need to be affirmatively established before any decree of divorce could be rendered; but I do not think that the mere denial by the defendant that the plaintiff is his wife ousts the court of power to make an order requiring him to provide her with means to prosecute the action, or for her support during its pendency. An application for alimony can be made only "while an action for divorce is pending," and to this extent it is dependent upon the issues involved in such action; but the granting or refusal thereof is not dependent upon the final determination of the issues in the action, or available in the determination of those issues. It is a collateral proceeding or episode within the action, authorized for a particular purpose, but dependent for its maintenance upon the existence of the action. It is to be heard and determined upon a record of its own, and the decision thereon may be made, and may be the subject of an appeal, before the determination of the issues in the action. The evidence offered in its support may or may not be the same as that which will be offered upon the trial of the issues presented by the pleadings. Being authorized for a special purpose, the decision thereon is limited to that purpose, and can be no more available for the determination of the issues in the action than is the preliminary determination upon an order for the publication of a summons that a cause of action is stated in the complaint, or than an order for family allowance to one claiming to be the widow of the decedent is available at the distribution of the estate. If, upon the application, the fact of marriage is denied by the defendant, it is to be determined, like any other question of fact, upon the evidence offered in its support, and should be denied unless the evidence thus offered would be sufficient to justify the court in granting a divorce, if the action were submitted upon that evidence at the final hearing.

Upon the hearing herein the defendant denied that there had ever been any intermarriage between him and the plaintiff, and there was no direct evidence of such marriage. I do not think that the deposition of the plaintiff was entitled to any consideration by the court for the establishment of this fact. The evidence contained therein consisted merely of her assent to statements of fact made by her counsel, and it sufficiently appeared, both by her own statement and by the character of her responses to the questions put to her, that she could neither speak nor understand the English language. The plaintiff sought to establish the marriage between them by evidence of repute, and for that purpose offered the affidavits of two persons to the effect that she was reputed to be his wife. In response thereto the defendant read the affidavits of several persons to the effect that the parties were never reputed to be married in the community in which they lived. Repute of marriage is but hearsay, and the fact of marriage is not established by reputation unless it appears that the reputation is uniform. Hearsay ceases to be entitled to any weight as evidence unless it is uniform, and it is only by reason of its uniformity that it will, in any instance, authorize the presumption of a fact. The court is not at liberty to determine the fact upon a preponderance of the hearsay, but, if it is divided, it must be rejected entirely. "Where reputation is relied on, that reputation, to raise the presumption of marriage, must be founded on general, not divided or singular, opinion; and, where reputation in such case is divided, it amounts to no evidence at all." Barnum v. Barnum, 42 Md. 297. Cohabitation of a man and woman gives rise to reputation of their marriage, because the presumption from one's conduct is in favor of innocence, and their cohabitation is presumed to be consistent with good morals, and therefore matrimonial; but, if their cohabitation is shown to have been illicit in its origin, the presumption of innocence is overcome, and the continuous cohabitation will be presumed to be illicit. If, during its continuance, their cohabitation is changed from an illicit to a matrimonial character, the burden of showing this fact is upon the one who would avail himself of the effect of the change. It clearly appears herein that the intercourse of the plaintiff with the defendant was illicit at its commencement, and so continued for many years, and there was no evidence except that of the plaintiff of any change in its character; but, as above stated, her evidence was not entitled to any consideration. Moreover, presumptions are resorted to for the establishment of facts only in the absence of direct evidence upon the facts sought to be established; and it is a rule in the consideration of evidence that when it is within the power of a party to produce direct evidence of the fact, and instead of doing so he produces evidence of an inferior character, it will be presumed that the direct evidence would be adverse to his claim.

The contention on the part of the respondent that when the fact of marriage is put in issue it is only necessary for the wife to make a prima facie showing in order to entitle her to alimony for the prosecution of the suit, as well as the contention by the appellant that if he is compelled to pay alimony to the plaintiff prior to the determination of the action, and while it may be finally determined that she is not his wife, he will be deprived of his property without due process of law, is fully considered in the opinion of Mr. Justice TEMPLE, and I concur in his views thereon. If the fact of marriage is denied by him, he is as much entitled to a hearing, and an opportunity to controvert the showing made by the plaintiff upon her application for alimony, as at the final hearing of the action; and in either case the issue thus presented is to be determined by the court upon a preponderance of the evidence thereon. If, upon her application, he is given such a hearing as is appropriate to the character of the controversy, or, as is usual in such cases, with the opportunity to controvert her claim as fully as he may desire, he receives all the protection to which he is entitled by law.

In view of the principles which should have governed the court in considering the evidence offered at the hearing of the plaintiff's application, I am of the opinion that there was no evidence before it tending to show a marriage between the parties, and that her application should have been denied.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent, and think that, for the reasons given in the opinion in department, the order appealed from was there properly affirmed, and should be adhered to. It seems to be admitted that in a divorce suit, although the marriage be denied, still an allowance for alimony to the wife may be rightfully made before the determination of the issue of marriage at the final hearing of the case. But that would be of little advantage to the plaintiff if at the preliminary hearing "the marriage must be proved" in the sense in which that proposition is meant in the opinion of the majority of the court. In the case at bar the issue of marriage or no marriage is the main issue in the case, and according to the majority opinion she cannot be allowed any aid for the purpose of procuring evidence on that issue unless, without such aid, she had already proved it. Although she may have no means at all, she must still rely entirely upon herself in obtaining evidence and procuring counsel in support of her side of that issue. Whether or not she has made sufficient proof at the preliminary hearing to warrant the court in allowing her aid in preparing herself for the final adjudication of that issue is a question in the first instance for the exercise of the discretion of the trial court, and in passing upon the conclusion of the trial court upon that point this court is estopped, in my opinion, from disturbing that conclusion if there be a fair and material conflict of evidence upon the issue. In the case at bar there is no doubt that the respondent produced evidence tending strongly to establish the fact that there was a marriage. It is true that appellant also produced evidence on the other side of that issue, but I do not think that, under the well-established rule touching conflicting evidence, we are warranted in disturbing the conclusion of the court below. Respondent was clearly entitled, in my opinion, upon the showing made by her, to have aid from the appellant in procuring evidence to be used upon the final determination of that issue.

Appellant seems greatly impressed with the danger of some well-to-do husband being compelled to contribute to the prosecution of a suit brought by some woman who falsely swears that she is his wife; but no fear seems to be entertained that a husband may prevent an injured wife from obtaining means to prosecute a just suit by simply averring that he is not her legal husband.

Appellant seeks to emphasize the fact that the plaintiff is an Indian, but it is entirely immaterial what race she belongs to. Appellant selected and enjoyed her as his chosen companion through the youth and prime of her womanhood. When he discarded her it was evidently not because she was an Indian, but because she was then an old Indian.

GAROUTTE, J. (dissenting). It is held in the majority opinion in this case that when alimony and suit money pendente lite is prayed for in an action for divorce, the marriage being denied, then upon the preliminary hearing the fact of marriage must be established by a preponderance of evidence, or the application should be denied. Upon the final hearing it is only necessary to establish the marriage by a preponderance of evidence. Hence, if the conclusion of the court be sound, the result is that in every case where the marriage becomes an issue of fact there can be no such thing as alimony and suit money; for, if the woman is able to establish the marriage by a preponderance of evidence without the money to assist her, she has no need of the money, and her application should be denied for that reason. If she can establish the fact of marriage upon the preliminary hearing by a preponderance of evidence, without money, she can as readily establish that fact upon the final hearing without money. If she be able to establish the fact of marriage by a preponderance of evidence without money, then she need not go to the trouble of establishing that fact until the final hearing. It is thus made plain that the entire reason of the rule—the principle upon which the rule rests—is all gone when it is held that the fact of marriage upon the preliminary hearing must be established by a preponderance of evidence. It may be admitted that the conclusion declared by Justice TEMPLE is supported by persuasive reasons, yet we find no court in this country sustaining the proposition, unless the decision in McKenna v. McKenna, 70 Ill. App. 340, is that case. In the leading case of Brinkley v. Brinkley, 50 N. Y. 184, Chief Justice Folger labored hard, but with somewhat indifferent success, to lay down the rule which should guide nisi prius courts in their determination as to when temporary alimony and suit money should be allowed the wife in cases where the marriage is denied. The New York court in that case, speaking by the mouth of the chief justice, says: "It may be said, too, that for the purposes of an application for temporary alimony there will not need that the fact of marriage be so conclusively established as for the purpose of permanent alimony, or any other ultimate purpose of the action." In the same opinion it is also said: "Yet if the matters contained in other papers or shown by legitimate proofs before the court make out, in the judgment of the court, a fair presumption of a fact of marriage, it has the power to grant alimony pending the action, and expenses of the action." It is again said in the same case: "The question now before us, however, is not whether, upon the proofs as shown by the parties, a final judgment should be rendered that there has been an actual valid marriage between the parties, and whether a limited divorce should be adjudged with a permanent separate maintenance for the plaintiff, to be provided by the defendant. The question now is, do the proofs of the parties give reason to apprehend that upon a trial of the issues between them there is a fair probability that the plaintiff will maintain her allegations?" In Collins v. Collins, 71 N. Y. 274, the same court that decided the Brinkley Case declares the Brinkley decision to be "that it was not necessary that the marriage be established as conclusively as would be required for the ultimate purposes of the action, but that the plaintiff must make out a reasonably plain case of the existence of the marriage relation, and she would then be furnished with the means of temporary support, and of conducting the suit until the truth or falsity of her allegations could be ascertained." In the Collins Case the rule is thus declared: "The plaintiff is bound to present a case to the court showing that she has a fair prospect of success in the action, and that she controverts and intends to litigate the matter set up by the defendant, and has reasonable grounds for so doing." In Vincent v. Vincent, 16 Daly, 534, 17 N. Y. Supp. 497, the court said: "But, as in other preliminary contestations, the fact is not to be established with the clearness and conclusiveness exacted of proof as the basis of a final adjudication upon the rights of the litigant parties; but it suffices if on an application for alimony the putative wife makes out a reasonably plain case of the existence of the marriage relation,"—citing Brinkley v. Brinkley. In Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 45, 16 Pac. 364, it is said: "In a suit for divorce, when the marriage is denied by the defendant's answer, three things must be made to appear on application for temporary alimony,—the marriage, by satisfactory evidence showing, at least prima facie, a marriage in fact." I cite the foregoing authorities to show that the rule of law declared by the majority opinion as to the quantum of evidence necessary to be produced by the wife at the preliminary hearing to support the fact of marriage is opposed to the great weight of authority. Yet I am free to say the true solution of the question presents difficulties of no small proportions,—difficulties that I am not willing to meet unless necessity demands it, and here I find no such necessity; for, even conceding the rule of law to be as stated by the learned writer of the majority opinion, namely, the marriage must be established by a preponderance of evidence, then, under such rule, this order should be affirmed.

The reasons for the affirmance of this order are these: Upon the trial of any issue of fact in a civil action it is not for this court to say, upon appeal, that the evidence preponderates in favor of the plaintiff, or that the evidence preponderates in favor of the defendant. This court has nothing to do with the preponderance of evidence. It has so decided times innumerable. It is even a rule universally invoked by this court against the defendant in criminal cases. Under all authority in this state it is for the trial court to say which way the evidence preponderates; and, when that court has so declared, the matter of preponderance of evidence is forever foreclosed from investigation by this court. Treating this proceeding for alimony and suit money with all the dignity of a civil action, conceding that it is to be tried and decided exactly by the same rules of law as any civil action, then the only question here is, does this record present a substantial conflict in the evidence as to the fact of marriage? And this question is not to be determined by the great number of witnesses upon the one side and the limited number upon the other, for it is often the case that the weaker side in number and in money is the stronger in right. Hence the fact that the plaintiff is an Indian woman, and her son an illegitimate son, furnishes no reason why this court may cast aside their evidence. Either as matter of law or matter of fact it cannot be said that an Indian woman or an illegitimate son is not to be believed under oath.

Let us pause a moment to look at the evidence. A great portion of it is without substantial conflict, as follows: Hite lived with this woman for 25 years. During that time he furnished her with all the necessities of life. He gave her a house in which to live. He was the father of her child. His sister visited her at this house, and slept with her. His nephews visited her at this house, and addressed her as "Aunt Lucy." He sent her illegitimate son to school, and paid the expenses of his schooling. He treated this son as his own son, and he was always considered and reputed in the neighborhood to be the stepson of defendant, Hite. In addition to this uncontradicted evidence, we have the testimony of Thomas Gibbs, the illegitimate son, to the effect that the plaintiff is known far and near throughout the southern part of California as the wife of John R. Hite; that defendant has introduced plaintiff as his wife, and held her out to the world as his wife continuously; that defendant's relatives and friends have associated freely with plaintiff, and visited plaintiff as the wife of defendant. We also have the testimony of one Westfall, to the effect that plaintiff and defendant were known in that neighborhood and adjoining counties as husband and wife; that the plaintiff was everywhere called "Mrs. Hite" and "Lucy Hite, wife of John R. Hite"; and that plaintiff and defendant held themselves out to the world, and were always treated, as husband and wife. From this condensed statement of the showing made by the plaintiff I feel entirely satisfied in saying that she is entitled to alimony and suit money, in order that she may be able to meet the defendant squarely at the trial of the case upon the issue of marriage or no marriage.

I fail to comprehend how it may be said from the record that the trial judge decided this case upon a wrong theory. There is not a word in the record to indicate it. Upon the contrary, the fact that the hearing was had after notice to the other side, and that upon such hearing defendant introduced a great mass of evidence to support his claim of no marriage, indicates convincingly to my mind that the trial judge heard and decided the case upon the right theory, and that his conclusion was based upon all the evidence placed before him by both parties to the litigation. I think the order should be affirmed.

FRENNA v. SUNNYSIDE LAND CO. et al.
(S. F. 1,362.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 18, 1899.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS —LIEN OF ASSESSMENT—ENGINEER'S CERTIFICATE—RECORD.

1. St. 1889, p. 167, § 9,—an amendment to the street-improvement act,—provides that the certificate of the engineer, inter alia, shall be recorded, and, when so recorded, the amounts assessed shall be a lien on the lands assessed. A certificate, signed by the city engineer, stated that a record in his office of a certain certificate showed certain things, but did not state that he had measured the work, or that it had been measured by any one, and the original certificate was signed by an employé who was not a deputy. Held, that the certificate was insufficient to create a lien.

2. Proof that the facts stated in a defective certificate of the city engineer, required (St. 1889, p. 167) to be recorded as a condition to the assessment becoming a lien, are true, does not cure the defect, in that it was not signed by the engineer or his deputy.

3. Section 11 of the street-improvement act, as passed in 1885, providing that no assessment shall be held invalid, "except on appeal to the city council," for any error, informality, or other defect in any of the proceedings prior to the "assessment," or in the "assessment itself," does not apply to section 9, as amended in 1889, in so far as it concerns the sufficiency of the certificate of the city engineer, required to be recorded as a condition to the assessment becoming a lien.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by J. P. Frenna against the Sunnyside Land Company and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. D. Shadbourn, for appellant. Morrison, Foerster & Cope, for respondents.

GRAY, C. Actions for foreclosure of liens for street work. Defendants had judgment, and the plaintiff appeals. Plaintiff's right to recover in these suits depends upon the validity of the lien which the suits were brought to foreclose. This lien is attacked by respondents on several grounds, only one of which it will be necessary to notice in this opinion. Section 9 of the street-improvement act, as amended in 1889, provides: "Said warrant, assessment and diagram, together with the certificate of the city engineer, shall be recorded in the office of said superintendent of streets. When so recorded the several amounts assessed shall be a lien upon the lands, lots or portions of lots assessed respectively for the period of two years from the date of said recording, unless sooner discharged." It would seem from this that there can be no lien without a certificate of the city engineer being recorded. St. 1889, p. 167. The certificate here referred to is presumably the one mentioned in section 34 of the act (St. 1891, p. 206), which relates to surveys and estimates of work to be done under the act, and when signed by the city engineer in his official character is to be treated as prima facie evidence of the truth of its contents (Gray v. Lucas, 115 Cal. 430, 47 Pac. 354). The plaintiff put in evidence a certificate, which he contends fills the requirement of the statute, and which is in words and figures as follows:

"No. 1,729. San Francisco, April 3, 1896.

"I certify that a record in this office of certificate No. 596, date June 15, 1894 for grading, wooden curbs, and macadam on Circular Ave., between San Jose Ave. and Flood Ave., shows that the work was examined, and found to be practically to the official line and grade, average crown of Mac. 6" above official grade. "Jas. McCoy,
"Cont.

C. S. Tilton,
City Engineer."

Certificate No. 596, referred to in the foregoing certificate, was in the handwriting of C. H. Holcomb, an employé, but not a deputy, of the city engineer; and the name of the then city engineer was signed to such certificate No. 596 by said Holcomb. It was also shown that the surveying and measuring required by the act to be done by the city engineer was in fact performed by one E. J. Morser, another employé, and not a deputy, of the city engineer.

Upon the authority of Ryan v. Altschul, 103 Cal. 174, 37 Pac. 339, and Rauer v. Lowe, 107 Cal. 229, 40 Pac. 337, I think the conclusions reached by the learned judge before whom the cases were tried are correct, and I can find no better reasons for those conclusions than are contained in the following language of the opinions rendered by the court at the trial and on motion for a new trial, to wit:

"The document which, in Rauer v. Lowe, was held to be defective, was not signed by the engineer or by his deputy. For that reason it was held to be defective. In the cases at bar the certificate was properly signed by the engineer, but fails to state that he had measured the work, or that the work had been measured by any one. He merely certifies what a record of certificate No. 596 in his office states. That certificate was not signed by the engineer in office at its date, but by an employé, who was not a deputy. It was just such a certificate as was held to be insufficient in Rauer v. Lowe. If the original certificate No. 596 was insufficient, it seems very clear that a certificate by the engineer that it states or shows certain things is equally so. It is at best but secondary evidence of the contents of the original certificate. The court, upon inspection of certificate No. 596, is quite as competent to determine what it shows as the engineer was, who certified to what it shows. The defective certificate is not cured by proof that the facts stated therein are true. It is necessary to the creation of a lien that a proper certificate of the engineer be recorded with the assessment and diagram. In Rauer v. Lowe, 107 Cal. 233, 40 Pac. 338, the court say: 'These certificates, so made and signed, are invalid, and insufficient as the basis of a lien upon property chargeable with the expense of the work, and therefore the evidence does not sustain the finding that the assessment is a lien upon the defendant's lot.' Plaintiff's counsel contend that, even assuming the engineer's certificate to be insufficient, yet by section 11 of the street law the objection can only be taken by an appeal to the board of supervisors. The portion of that section which is relied on reads as follows: 'And no assessment shall be held invalid except upon appeal to the city council, as provided in this section, for any error, informality or other defect in any of the proceedings prior to the assessment, or in the assessment itself, where notice of the intention of the city council to order the work to be done, for which the assessment is made, has been actually published in any designated newspaper of said city for the length of time prescribed by law, before the passage of the resolution ordering the work to be done.' When section 11 was passed in 1885, it was not necessary to record the engineer's certificate. The amendment of section 9 requiring such recording was not passed until 1889. In passing section 11 the legislature could not have had in mind the certificate as being one of the proceedings which could only be attacked by appeal to the board of supervisors. The objection that the engineer's certificate was not recorded is not an objection to the assessment. The assessment is a different thing from the certificate. 'Said warrant, assessment and diagram, together with the certificate of the city engineer, shall be recorded, etc. When so recorded the several amounts assessed shall be a lien, etc.' I still think that the certificate in this case is insufficient. It would seem to be a very foolish requirement of the statute that a certificate must be recorded if it is unnecessary for it to state anything. In Gray v. Lucas, 115 Cal. 430, 47 Pac. 354, Mr. Justice Harrison states that the certificate required is that referred to in section 34 of the street law. Assuming that the assessment itself was not invalid, but that the certificate of the engineer, required by law, was not recorded, plaintiff did not acquire any lien."

For these reasons I advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

COHEN et al. v. CITY OF ALAMEDA et al.
(S. F. 1,017.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1899.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STATUTES—OPENING STREETS—RESOLUTION—DESCRIPTION—SUFFICIENCY—SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS—ACTIONS TO SET ASIDE—VALIDITY—DESIGNATION OF OWNER—APPEAL—RECORD—AFFIDAVITS.

1. St. 1889, p. 70, authorizing the laying out and extension of streets within municipalities, and the payment of the cost thereof by special assessments on lands benefited thereby, is constitutional.

2. In a resolution of a city council of intention to open a street a description clearly defining the boundaries of the land deemed necessary to be taken for such street is sufficient, though excepting therefrom all land held by the city and state as open ways.

3. A resolution of intention to open a street in a city described the boundaries of the land to be taken, excepting therefrom lands held as open ways. Property owners sued to set aside the assessment, claiming the description was insufficient because of the exception. Held, that the admission of evidence to show that all the land within the lines of the proposed street was held in private ownership, though unnecessary, was not injurious to plaintiffs.

4. Where land owned by one railway company within a district benefited by the opening of a street is assessed to another company, and the assessment is paid, the assessment is not objectionable as not made on all the property within the district; St. 1889, p. 70, § 12, providing that error in designating the owner of any land shall not invalidate the assessment.

5. An affidavit, printed in the transcript on appeal, that appellant was induced to withhold certain testimony because of a remark of the court whose subsequent ruling contrary thereto was a legal surprise, cannot be considered where it is not contained in any bill of exceptions, and is merely certified by the clerk as having been used on the motion for a new trial.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county.

Action by Emilie G. Cohen and others against the city of Alameda and others to restrain the sale of plaintiffs' lots for payment of special assessments. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Alfred H. Cohen, for appellants. Geo. T. Wright, J. W. Goodwin, and Reed & Nusbaumer, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The city of Alameda instituted proceedings April 23, 1894, under the provisions of the act of March 6, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 70), for opening and extending Lincoln avenue from its western terminus, as then laid out, to the eastern line of Versailles avenue, by passing a resolution of its intention to do so, describing the land deemed necessary to be taken therefor, and also specifying the exterior bounds of the district to be affected and benefited by said improvement. After passing the order for the improvement, commissioners to assess benefits and damages accruing therefrom were appointed, who afterwards made and filed a report of their assessment, accompanying the same with a plat of the assessment district, showing the lands to be taken for the improvement, and also the lands assessed therefor. The entire cost of the improvement was assessed upon 112 separate parcels of land within the assessment district. This report and assessment was afterwards approved and confirmed by the city council, and a certified copy thereof delivered to the superintendent of streets, who caused to be published a public notice thereof, and calling for the payment of said assessments. The assessments not having all been paid within the time limited in said notice, the superintendent of streets advertised the same as delinquent, and published a notice that on a certain day he would sell the land assessed in satisfaction thereof. Nine of the lots so assessed are owned by the four plaintiffs herein, and they instituted the present action to enjoin the sale threatened by the superintendent, and to have the assessment declared void. Judgment was rendered in the superior court in favor of the defendants, from which, and also from an order denying a new trial, the plaintiffs have appealed.

1. The constitutionality of the act of March 6, 1889, was fully considered by this court and upheld in Davies v. City of Los Angeles, 86 Cal. 37, 24 Pac. 771. Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 19 Sup. Ct. 187, cited by the appellants, arose under a statute radically differing from the above act. In that case the ordinance under which the improvement was made provided that the entire expense thereof should be assessed "by the front foot" upon the lands abutting upon the portion taken for the street. The land taken for the street, as well as all of the land assessed, was owned by the same person, and in accordance with the ordinance the entire cost of the improvement, including the value of the land taken, together with the cost and expense of the condemnation proceedings, were assessed against other portions of the tract of land through which the street was opened belonging to the same owner as that taken for the street and abutting upon the street, as opened, at an arbitrary rate per front foot, without regard to the benefits accruing to the lands assessed. In the present case the commissioners appointed to make the assessment reported that their assessment upon the lands within the district had been made by them in proportion to the benefit to be derived from the improvement, and this report and assessment was afterwards confirmed by the city council, without any objection thereto so far as appears from the record herein. The plaintiffs herein do not complain of the correctness of the amount awarded for the land to be taken, nor do they claim that the cost of the improvement has not been equitably apportioned upon the lands assessed therefor, or that their lands have not been benefited to the extent of the assessment thereon.

2. It is contended by the appellants that the description in the resolution of intention of the land to be taken for the improvement is insufficient as a basis for the subsequent proceedings, and that by reason thereof the city never acquired any jurisdiction to authorize the opening of the street and the assessment therefor. The objection to the description is that, after defining by specific boundaries the particular strip of land deemed necessary to be taken for extending and opening the street, there are added thereto the words, "excepting therefrom all land now held by said city or the people of said state, as open ways"; and it is urged that the lands to be taken must be capable of ascertainment from the description in the resolution itself, and that by reason of this exception the description is not complete, and can be ascertained only by evidence outside of the resolution. We are of the opinion, however, that the sufficiency of the description is not impaired by this exception. The boundaries of the space over which Lincoln avenue is to be opened and extended as a public street between the designated termini are clearly defined, and whatever land is held in private ownership within these boundaries is to be taken for that purpose. The main object of requiring a description of the land to be taken is to define the location of the improvement, and to give information to the owners of the land which is to be taken, as well as to those within the district to be assessed therefor, of the intended improvement. By this notice the owners of the land to be taken can determine whether to assent or object to the same, and the owners of the lands to be assessed therefor have the opportunity to object also to the extent of the district to be assessed therefor. The city council determines, in the first instance, whether the public interest demands the opening of the street, in view of the demand for such thoroughfare at that place, and without any regard to the ownership of the land within the proposed lines of the street. If, as a matter of fact, a portion of the land within these boundaries has already been appropriated to public use, or is held by the city or state "as open ways," the land deemed necessary to be taken is sufficiently described by designating in the resolution the outer lines of the proposed improvement, without any mention of such open ways, or by excepting the same without describing the exceptions. In either case the parties to be affected by the proposed improvement are fully notified of every fact necessary for the protection of their interests. As any land within the limits of the proposed street already appropriated to public use would not be "taken" for the improvement, whether included or excepted from the description, the failure to include or except it does not impair the sufficiency of the resolution. The exception of such portion of the designated strip as is already held by the city or state "as open ways" is as complete as if the land to be taken had been described as that portion within the designated boundaries which is not already occupied as an open street. Street improvements which are assessed upon adjacent property are governed by the same principles as control the present case, and under the statute authorizing such improvements it has been held that the sufficiency of the description was not impaired by excepting from the street to be improved "that portion required by law to be kept in order by the railroad company having its tracks thereon" (Whiting v. Townsend, 57 Cal. 515), or that a street be paved with basalt blocks "where not already so paved" (Williams v. Bergin, 116 Cal. 56, 47 Pac. 877). Under these authorities it must be held that the description herein was sufficient. The amendment to the complaint, and the evidence offered in support thereof, for the purpose of showing that all of the property within the lines of the proposed street was held in private ownership, though unnecessary, was harmless, and wrought no injury to the appellants.

3. The objection by the appellants that the assessment was not made upon all the property within the district benefited by the improvement is based upon the fact that certain property within the district was owned by the Alameda, Oakland & Piedmont Electric Railway Company, and that no assessment was made to that corporation. It was shown, however, that this property was assessed to the Alameda & Oakland Electric Railway Company, and that the assessment therefor had been paid. All the property within the district was therefore assessed, and section 12 of the act provides that "error in the designation of the owner or owners of any land or improvements, or of the particulars of their interest, shall not affect the validity of the assessment, or of the condemnation of the property to be taken."

4. In the transcript on appeal there is printed an affidavit to the effect that by certain remarks of the court at the trial of the cause the appellants were induced to withhold certain testimony, and that the subsequent ruling of the court contrary to its statement constituted a legal surprise. This affidavit is not contained in any bill of exceptions, or in any wise authenticated as having been used at the hearing of the motion for a new trial, except by a certificate of the clerk, and therefore cannot be considered. Melde v. Reynolds, 120 Cal. 234, 52 Pac. 491. It may be added, in addition thereto, that the appellants did not produce at the hearing of their motion for a new trial any affidavit of the evidence that they would have introduced, or make it appear that a different finding would have been made. See, also, Fisk v. Casey, 119 Cal. 643, 51 Pac. 1077. The judgment and order are affirmed.

MAXSON et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF MADERA COUNTY. (L. A. 382.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—APPEAL—SUPERIOR COURT—POWER TO REMAND.

Code Civ. Proc. § 980, provides that, on appeal on questions of law from a justice, the superior court may review all orders affecting the judgment appealed from, and may set aside or confirm or modify all other proceedings subsequent to and dependent on such judgment, and may order a new trial; and section 187 provides that, when jurisdiction is conferred on a court, all the means necessary to carry it into effect are also given. Held, that on an appeal from a judgment of a justice's court, on a question of law alone, to the superior court, it can review the rulings of the justice, and remand the cause with direction to proceed according to its decision.

In bank. Affirmed.

For opinion in department, see 54 Pac. 520.

McFARLAND, J. Petition for writ of certiorari. One Roberts brought an action against the petitioners herein, Maxson and Harris, in the justice's court. The petitioners, as defendants in said action, demurred to the complaint. The demurrer was overruled, and judgment entered for plaintiff, and the petitioners appealed from the judgment of the superior court "on questions of law alone." Upon the hearing of the appeal the superior court ordered "that the judgment of the lower court be, and the same is hereby, reversed, with directions to the said lower court to sustain the demurrer of the defendants to the complaint of the plaintiff, with leave to the said plaintiff to amend his complaint if so advised." In the present proceeding in this court the petitioners seek to have said order reviewed, and to have annulled all that portion of the order after the word "reversed," upon the ground that the superior court had no jurisdiction to make any of the latter part of said order.

The provisions of the Code touching procedure on appeals from the justice's court to the superior court in civil cases, where the appeal is taken "on questions of law" alone, are very brief and meager, and it is not surprising that decisions as to the power of the superior court on such appeals are not entirely harmonious. Where the appeal is taken "on questions of fact," or "on questions of both law and fact," the procedure seems to be plain. In that case no statement is required, "but the action must be tried anew in the superior court" (Code Civ. Proc. § 976), and the justice is required to transfer to the superior court certified copies of "his docket, the pleadings, all notices, motions and other papers filed in the cause, the notice of appeal, and the undertaking filed" (section 977). On such appeal, therefore, the entire cause is transferred to the superior court, and thereafter the latter court has exclusive jurisdiction, and its judgment is final. There is, no doubt, some reason for the suggestion that the legislature intended this to be the result in all appeals, and that on an appeal on questions of law alone the cause should be considered as in the superior court for all purposes, and, if the trial of issues of fact should be found necessary, it should be had in the superior court. The legislature might have so provided, and as the superior court is also a trial court, and as, on an appeal after a trial of the issues of fact in the justice's court, the case must in the end be finally tried in the superior court, it probably would have been a wise course, and would have prevented much delay and expense, if the superior court had been given entire and final jurisdiction of the case, no matter how it had been brought into that tribunal. But the language of the Code and former decisions of this court preclude us from holding that such procedure has been provided. The decisions of this court to the point that an appeal transfers the whole cause finally to the superior court will be found, with perhaps one or two exceptions, to have been made in cases where the appeal was upon questions of "both law and fact." Such was the fact in the main case cited, of Bullard v. McArdle, 98 Cal. 355, 33 Pac. 193, where the court say: "When the effect of an appeal is to transfer the entire record to an appellate court, and to cause the action to be retried in that court as if originally brought therein, as is the case where appeals are taken from a justice's court upon questions of law and fact, the judgment appealed from is completely annulled, and is not further available for any purpose." Such was also the fact in Rossi v. Superior Court, 114 Cal. 371, 46 Pac. 177.

When an appeal is taken on questions of law alone, the appeal goes to the superior court, upon "a statement of the case" (section 975), except, perhaps, that a statement is not necessary where the justice's docket or con-ies of papers required to be sent up by him, show upon their face the errors complained of. Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Superior Court Kern Co., 59 Cal. 471. And section 980 provides as follows: "Upon an appeal heard upon a statement of the case [which, of course, means an appeal upon questions of law alone] the superior court may review all orders affecting the judgment appealed from, and may set aside, or affirm, or modify any or all of the proceedings subsequent to and dependent upon such judgment, and may, if necessary or proper, order a new trial. When the action is tried anew upon appeal, the trial must be conducted in all respects as other trials in the superior court." This provision might have been for "a trial" when the same was deemed necessary, but it is for a "new trial," and that when the action is tried "anew" it must be in the superior court; and this court has held many times that, a new trial being a re-examination of an issue of fact, there can be no new trial of the cause in the superior court on appeal, unless there has been a trial of issues of fact in the justice's court. Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Superior Court Kern Co., supra; People v. El Dorado County Court, 10 Cal. 19; Funkenstein v. Elgutter, 11 Cal. 328; Rickey v. Superior Court, 59 Cal. 661; Myrick v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 98, 8 Pac. 648. Moreover, upon an appeal on questions of law alone the justice is not required to send to the appellate court anything more than "a certified copy of his docket, the statement as admitted or as settled, the notice of appeal, and the undertaking filed." There is no provision for sending to the appellate court the pleadings or other papers in the case, without which the superior court would not have before it matters essential to a general trial and determination of the case. We think it clear, therefore, that upon an appeal on questions of law alone, like the one here under review, the superior court can merely pass upon the questions brought before it on the appeal, and has no jurisdiction to try and determine the whole cause as if it had been transferred to that court upon an appeal upon questions of both law and fact.

It is not the law, however, as claimed by petitioners, that after a judgment of reversal in the superior court, in a case like the one here involved, the case is no longer pending in the justice's court, the judgment of reversal is a dismissal of the action, and that there can be no further proceeding in it in either court. Under such a view, if a plaintiff should appeal from a judgment against him founded upon an erroneous view of the law,—as where a demurrer to the complaint was erroneously sustained in the justice's court,—the only effect of his appeal, although the superior court should hold his complaint to be good, would be a dismissal of his action. Such a defeat of justice is not to be tolerated unless there is no permissible construction of the law by which it can be avoided; and we think that a proper construction of the Code and the constitution leads to the conclusion that in this case the superior court had jurisdiction to correct the errors of the justice's court, and to direct further proceedings in the latter court.

There are three decisions of this court somewhat in point. In Myrick v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 98, 8 Pac. 648, the action of the superior court on an appeal from a justice's court was reviewed on certiorari. In the justice's court a motion of defendant to dismiss the action had been granted, and judgment in his favor rendered for costs, and the plaintiff had appealed. The superior court tried the whole case, and gave judgment for plaintiff. This court, in bank, annulled the judgment upon the ground that there could be no trial of issues of fact in the superior court, because there had been none in the justice's court, and in its opinion said: "The superior court should have reversed that judgment, and sent the case back for trial on the issues tendered by the pleadings." This, of course, was a clear declaration of the power of the superior court to remand a cause; but there is some ground for the contention that it should not be received as direct authority on the point, because the language quoted was not necessary to the decision. In Larue v. Gaskins, 5 Cal. 508, the justice's court had erroneously transferred a forcible entry case to the district court, and the latter court had tried the case, and rendered judgment against defendant; and this court reversed the judgment, "with instructions to remit the case to the justice," and held that the illegal transfer did not defeat plaintiff's rights "by operating a discontinuance." But, although the case seems to be in point, the report of it is so meager that it cannot be very surely relied on as an authority. In Brown v. Superior Court, 72 Cal. 14, 13 Pac. 70, the demurrer of the defendant in a criminal prosecution in the justice's court to the complaint was sustained, and the people appealed. Afterwards the defendant appeared in the superior court, and confessed error, and asked that the cause be remanded to the justice's court, to be there tried upon a plea of not guilty which had been therein made. The court refused to remand, and ordered the defendant to plead in that court, and was about to proceed to try the case. This court issued a final writ of prohibition, and said: "In the case at bar the respondent should have remanded the action to the court below, with instructions to overrule the demurrer, but it has no jurisdiction to itself try the cause as it proposes to do." But this was a criminal case, and in the Penal Code the procedure on such an appeal is, no doubt, as shown in the opinion in that case, more fully stated than in the Code of Civil Procedure. However, some of the remarks of the court in that case as to the relations between the justice's court and the superior court in matters of appeal are applicable here.

If, however, the authorities above cited cannot be considered as definitely determining the point, still we think that, upon principle, the statements of the law therein made are correct. The main objection to the jurisdiction of the superior court to remand a cause to the justice's court is founded upon the suggestion that the Code does not provide machinery adequate to that purpose. But where, in the same judicial system, there is the relation of a subordinate and appellate court, the latter, in all cases where it has appellate jurisdiction, necessarily has the power to make such orders and render such judgments as are requisite to enforce its appellate power. The authority which confers its appellate jurisdiction might limit it as to the mode of exercising that jurisdiction, but where there is no such limitation it may use ordinary and necessary methods to enforce compliance with its mandates. The constitution provides that superior courts shall have appellate jurisdiction "in such cases arising in justices' and other inferior courts in their respective counties as may be prescribed by law," and there is no doubt that the case involved here is one of the cases over which jurisdiction was given to the superior court by the legislature. Section 980, Code Civ. Proc., says that upon an appeal on questions of law alone "the superior court may review all orders affecting the judgment appealed from, and may set aside, or confirm, or modify any and all other proceedings subsequent to and dependent upon such judgment, and may, if necessary or proper, order a new trial." This language confers upon the superior court plenary appellate jurisdiction, and there are no other provisions which limit it in the exercise of that jurisdiction. In Elliott, App. Proc. par. 20, the author says: "It is not to be understood that an express statutory provision is required to confer upon an appellate tribunal authority to exercise auxiliary authority in aid of its appellate power, although such auxiliary authority may be in its nature original, for all courts in the rank of appellate courts proper have such general powers as are necessary to enable them to effectually exercise the jurisdiction conferred upon them." And in paragraph 21 the author says: "The general authority to review and revise necessarily includes the right to enforce the writ and administer justice. In the exercise of its authority an appellate tribunal may so mold its judgments as to secure the proper relief to the parties entitled to it. The fact that a question may be presented in a particular mode does not always restrict the appellate court to a particular course, for it may, upon an inspection of the whole record, pronounce such judgment as will secure justice to the parties." And in paragraph 22 he says: "The grant of appellate jurisdiction, whether made by the constitution or by statute, necessarily vests in the tribunal designated all powers of an incidental nature that are required to make the grant of jurisdiction effective. Upon this principle it is held that in every appellate tribunal resides the power to coerce obedience to its orders, writs, and mandates." In Bank v. Knoup, 6 Ohio St. 342, Bartley, C. J., says: "Appellate jurisdiction is the cognizance which a superior court takes of a case removed to it by appeal or writ of error from the decision of an inferior tribunal. The power of the appellate court necessarily includes the power, not only to reverse a judgment, but also to control and direct the subsequent action of the subordinate court." The foregoing quotations are fully supported by the general authorities, and for the purposes of this case the principle is sufficiently declared in section 187, Code Civ. Proc. We are therefore of the opinion that under the Code a superior court, on an appeal such as the one here under review, has jurisdiction to review the rulings of a justice's court, and to remand a cause with directions to the lower court to proceed in accordance with the decision of the appellate court. A certified copy of the judgment of the superior court affords sufficient machinery for the transmission of the judgment of the higher court to the lower court, and it is not necessary to consider whether or not the superior court could frame a more direct process, or transmit its directions in any other form. It is suggested that great delay might be occasioned, if, after a trial on issues of fact in the justice's court, an appeal might be taken on questions of law alone, which would simply present to the superior court alleged errors of the justice's court in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence, and other alleged errors occurring during the trial. It has been determined, however, in a number of cases, that an appellant cannot always control the character of the appeal by the mere form of his notice of appeal, and perhaps the superior court might have power to say that, after a trial of issues of fact in the justice's court, an appeal should not be allowed upon mere questions of law; but, if such delays and embarrassments are imminent, the remedy is with the legislature. The order sought to be reviewed in this proceeding is affirmed, and the proceeding is dismissed.

In re LORENZ'S ESTATE. (Sac. 496.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1899.)

CONSENT JUDGMENT—CONCLUSIVENESS—APPEAL—TRUSTS—WAIVER OF INVALIDITY.

1. A judgment entered by consent will not be reversed, if the trial court had jurisdiction.

2. A cestui que trust consenting to a judgment modifying the trust is bound thereby, where the trust as modified is valid, though as originally created it was invalid because making the performance of the trust discretionary with the trustee, as prohibited by Civ. Code, § 857.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Trinity county.

In the matter of the estate of Henry Lorenz deceased, Christina Smith and others appeal from an order of final distribution. Affirmed.

Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for appellants. James W. Bartlett, for respondent F. J. Lorenz. H. R. Given, for respondents W. D. Lorenz and others.

BRITT, C. Appeal by three married daughters of Henry Lorenz from the order or decree of the court below making final distribution of the estate of their deceased father. The decedent left a will, by the terms whereof he gave to his surviving wife an estate for her life in all the property, real and personal, of which he had power of testamentary disposition, with remainder over to his 10 children in shares and upon conditions stated in the will. The provision for appellants, so far as material to be stated here, was as follows: An undivided one-tenth of the remainder upon termination of the life estate was given to F. J. Lorenz, eldest son of the testator, "to hold in trust [such is the language of the will] for my daughter Christina Smith, such trust to continue during the life of her husband." The like disposition was made in favor of each of the other appellants by name. In case of the death or disability of said F. J. Lorenz, then John N. Lorenz, another son of the testator, was appointed trustee in his stead. The trustee was authorized to sell and convey such portions of the trust property as in his judgment the interests of the beneficiaries of the trust might require. He was also empowered to pay out of the profits of the trust property, or interest derived therefrom, such sums of money to said beneficiaries "as he deems necessary, advisable, and proper," and to expend such amounts out of the principal of the trust as the proper court might adjudge necessary to be expended for their support or the support of their children. Said F. J. Lorenz was named executor of the will, and upon probate thereof he received letters testamentary, and has administered the estate. Pending the administration, viz. on November 25, 1895, said Christina Smith and the other married daughters of the testator, and said F. J. Lorenz and John N. Lorenz, executed a written instrument, which is recited in the decree appealed from, whereby they mutually agreed that it should be provided in the decree of distribution of the estate, when thereafter rendered, that the trustee for the said married women "shall pay the profits or interest on the trust fund of each of the said parties [naming the appellants] to them semiannually, instead of paying the same to them as deemed necessary, advisable, and proper by the said trustee." And accordingly the decree in question was framed by the court so as to assign the shares of appellants in trust pursuant to the terms of the will, except that it commands the trustee to pay the profits or interest of the trust property to the beneficiaries as agreed in said instrument of November 25, 1895, and deprives him of any discretion in that behalf.

Appellants contend that a valid trust in real property can be created only for some of the purposes mentioned in section 857, Civ. Code; that the trusts described in that section are all such as the trustee is imperatively required to perform in favor of the beneficiary; that by the provisions of the will here performance of the trusts which the testator attempted to create is left wholly discretionary with the trustee, and hence they are invalid. It is scarcely allowable, on the facts appearing, to decide whether either the statute or the will should receive the construction claimed by appellants. By the contract of November 25, 1895, appellants stipulated in effect that the decree of distribution should require the trustee to pay absolutely to them at stated intervals the income of the trust estate, and the decree was entered conformably to the stipulation. Had such a direction been inserted in the will, there can be no question but that it would have supplied the imperative element supposed by appellants to be lacking from the trust, and would have brought the devise within the terms of subdivision 3 of said section 857, Civ. Code, permitting the creation of a trust 'to receive the rents and profits of real property, and pay them to or apply them to the use of any person,' etc. In consenting to the said provisions of the decree, the appellants consented to the establishment of the trust in F. J. Lorenz; for, obviously, he could pay to them no profits or income of the trust property, unless he holds the property and can collect the income. The trustee must have an estate adequate to the execution of his duties. Morfew v. Railroad Co., 107 Cal. 587, 40 Pac. 810. It follows that to reverse the decree would be the reversal of a judgment entered by consent of parties. This will not be done. The decree was such as the court had jurisdiction to render, and if it contains error, as departing from the provisions of the will, it was yet error induced by appellants, and they cannot complain of it. Coryell v. Cain, 16 Cal. 572; Spinetti v. Brignardello, 53 Cal. 281; Erlanger v. Railroad Co., 109 Cal. 395, 42 Pac. 31.

Appellants advance as a reason why their agreement should not estop them that the court cannot establish an invalid trust even with the consent of the beneficiaries. It is sufficient reply to say that the trust expressed in the decree is not invalid. This is shown above. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DE CARLO. (Cr. 415.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 23, 1899.)

PERJURY—INFORMATION—JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—ELECTION—RIGHT TO QUESTION IN COLLATERAL ACTION—JURISDICTION.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 936, providing that an information for perjury must allege that the court or person before whom the alleged false oath was taken had authority to administer it, but that it need not set forth his commission or authority, it is unnecessary to state the facts giving him jurisdiction.

2. An information for perjury averred that the oath was taken in open court, before a justice of the peace, in a criminal case pending before him, on a complaint charging defendant with petit larceny, and that the justice was lawfully entitled to administer oaths in such matters and proceedings. Held, that since complaints for petit larceny are within the jurisdiction of a justice, the averment as to the authority of the justice to administer the oath in the proceeding in question was sufficient, under Pen. Code, § 966.

3. An information for perjury averring that the false testimony alleged was material to the issues tendered in the cause in which it was alleged to have been given sufficiently alleges its materiality, without specifying any particular issue on which it was material, or how it was so.

4. It will be presumed from the issuance of a certificate of election as justice of the peace that the holder complied with all the steps required by law for its issuance, and is entitled to hold the office and discharge its duties.

5. The validity of the election of a justice of the peace or his right to hold office cannot be questioned in a prosecution for perjury alleged to have been committed on a trial before him.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county.

Walter De Carlo was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Strong and C. T. Jones, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

HARRISON, J. The appellant was convicted of perjury, and after the verdict moved for a new trial, which was denied, and then moved in arrest of judgment, upon the ground that the facts stated in the information do not constitute a public offense. This motion having been denied, judgment was pronounced against him, from which he has appealed.

The information against the defendant is as follows: "Walter De Carlo is accused by the district attorney of Yolo county, by this information, of the crime of perjury, committed as follows, to wit: That the said Walter De Carlo, on or about the 15th day of July, 1897, at Woodland, in the county of Yolo, state of California, then and there being, did, having taken an oath then and there by and before the Honorable A. C. Ruggles, a justice of the peace in and for Woodland township, Yolo county, state of California, duly elected, qualified, and acting, and being entitled under the laws of the state of California to administer oaths in such matters and proceedings, that he would then and there testify truly before said justice of the peace, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously, and contrary to such oath, state as true [setting forth the testimony given by him]; but the said statement so made as aforesaid by said defendant was then and there false and untrue, and was at the time of the making thereof by said defendant known by said defendant to be so false and untrue. And said oath was so taken, and said false statement was taken and made in open court and during the pendency and as a part of the evidence in a criminal case then and there pending before said Judge Ruggles, entitled 'The People of the State of California versus Walter De Carlo,' upon a criminal complaint charging the said Walter De Carlo with petit larceny, and said false statement and oath was then and there material to the issues tendered in said cause,—contrary to the form," etc.

It is claimed by the appellant that this information is defective in that, as it is not averred in what county the larceny was committed for which the defendant was tried, it does not appear from the information that the justice's court had jurisdiction to try him for the offense, and, further, that it does not show that the alleged false testimony was material to the issues before the court.

Section 966 of the Penal Code is as follows: "In an indictment or information for perjury or subornation of perjury it is sufficient to set forth the substance of the controversy or matter in respect to which the offense was committed, and before whom the oath alleged to be false was taken, and that the court or the person before whom it was taken had authority to administer it, with proper allegations of the falsity of the matter on which the perjury is assigned; but the indictment or information need not set forth the pleadings, record or proceedings with which the oath is connected, nor the commission or authority of the court or person before whom the perjury was committed." This section is substantially the same as chapter 11 of the statutes of 23 George II., and is found upon the statute books of nearly every state in the Union, and under these statutes it is invariably held that it is not necessary to set forth in the indictment the facts giving jurisdiction to the court in which the false testimony was given. In People v. Phelps, 5 Wend. 16, it is said: "By the English decisions since the statute it is only necessary to state the substance of the offense, the name of the court, a simple averment of the court's authority to administer the oath, and proper averments of the falsity of the defendant's assertions. It was not necessary to set forth the facts which gave jurisdiction to the recorder to administer the oath. * * * Jurisdiction is sufficiently shown by the averment that the recorder had lawful and competent power and authority to administer the oath. The truth of such averment must appear on the trial." Mr. Bishop, in his New Criminal Procedure, says (section 904) that the averments in an indictment for perjury are of two classes,—those which disclose a foundation for the offense, which in pleading is called the inducement, and which includes the name as well as the jurisdiction of the court or person where the offense was committed, and those which charge the offense itself, the former of which may be stated in general terms, while the latter must be direct and specific. This statement corresponds with the language of the above section of the Penal Code wherein it is declared that "it is sufficient to set forth that the person before whom it [the oath] was taken had authority to administer it; * * * but the information need not set forth the authority of the court or person before whom the perjury was committed." In other words, the general statement of the jurisdiction is sufficient without setting forth the facts by virtue of which it exists.

In Com. v. Knight, 12 Mass. 274, the defendant was convicted of perjury in having sworn falsely in a justice's court upon the trial of an action for trespass upon certain land, and moved for an arrest of judgment upon the ground that it did not appear that the said justice of the peace had any jurisdiction of the cause on trial before him, since it was not stated in the indictment that the land upon which the trespass was committed was within his county. The court said: "Such an averment is not necessary nor usual." In State v. Newton, 1 Greene, 160, the indictment charged the defendant with having given false testimony on the trial of an issue before a justice's court, but did not in form allege that the justice's court had jurisdiction of the cause in which the oath was made, the only allegation being that the court had sufficient and competent authority to administer said oath; but it was held that the indictment sufficiently charged the offense. In State v. Peters, 42 Tex. 7, the court said: "That it is unnecessary to allege that the justice had jurisdiction by reason of the parties or the subject-matter of the suit being within the territory to which his jurisdiction extended is clear, and it has been often so held where the particularity of the former English precedents to which we have adverted is not required,"—citing several cases in support thereof. In Lavey v. Reg., 17 Q. B. 496, 5 Cox, Cr. Cas. 269, the defendant was indicted for perjury charged to have been committed at the trial of an action on contract before the county court; but the indictment did not aver that the action was one over which the county court had jurisdiction. It was held by the court in exchequer chamber that, as the indictment expressly averred that an action was pending in that court, presided over by the judge who administered the oath, and that such action was one of contract, a species of action of which that court might have cognizance, that the case came on to be tried before him, that the defendant was examined as a witness upon the hearing, and sworn by the judge, with an averment of competence of authority in the judge to administer the oath, it appeared that the oath was administered in the course of a judicial proceeding, and that by necessary implication it was a proceeding over which the judge who administered it had jurisdiction; for, says the court, "unless he had jurisdiction he could not have had power to administer the oath so as to be valid and binding, which is the true meaning of the phrase." In Reg. v. Dunning, L. R. 1 Cr. Cas. 290, the defendant was convicted of perjury upon an indictment which charged that the offense was committed on the trial at the quarter sessions of "a certain indictment for misdemeanor," but which did not state what the misdemeanor was, or that the quarter sessions had jurisdiction to try it. Upon motion in arrest of judgment the indictment was held sufficient, upon the ground that it appeared therefrom that in a judicial proceeding the defendant swore to the truth of certain facts set forth therein, which at the time of so swearing he knew to be false, and that the court had competent authority to administer the oath. See, also, Halleck v. State, 11 Ohio, 400; Rex v. Callanan, 6 Barn. & C. 102.

The information herein states that the oath was taken in open court, before a justice of the peace, in a criminal case then pending before him, upon a complaint charging the defendant with petit larceny, and that the justice of the peace was then and there entitled under the laws of this state to administer oaths in such matters and proceedings. Complaints for petit larceny are within the jurisdiction of the justice's court, and the averment that the justice before whom the oath was taken was entitled to administer oaths in such matters and proceedings was a sufficient averment of his authority to administer the oath in this proceeding. If, under the laws of this state, he was entitled to administer the oath to the defendant in the proceeding then pending before him, the proceeding was within his jurisdiction, since otherwise he would not have been entitled, under the laws of this state, to administer the oath. Whether he did have such authority was a fact to be established by the people at the trial. There is some language in People v. Howland (incorrectly reported as People v. Howard) 111 Cal. 655, 44 Pac. 342, which, taken by itself, may seem at variance with what is above said; but what was said in that case must be read in connection with the matter then before the court. In that case the defendant had moved at his arraignment to set aside the information upon the ground that he had not been legally committed by a magistrate, and the court was commenting upon the sufficiency of the complaint before the magistrate, and not upon the information upon which he was subsequently tried, and which it is stated in the opinion of the court was sufficient in form. To the extent that the opinion in that case is at variance with what is here said with reference to the sufficiency of an information it is mere dictum, and cannot be regarded as authority.

The objection that the information fails to show that the false testimony given by the defendant was material to any issue by the court is without merit. The averment that it was material to the "issues tendered in said cause" was a sufficient averment of its materiality, without specifying any particular issue upon which it was material. It was not necessary to show by averment in the information how the false testimony was material.

At the trial, the complaint before the justice of the peace was offered in evidence, and it appeared therefrom that the offense was claimed to have been committed in the county of Yolo. The election and the qualification of the justice, and his authority to hear the complaint before him, were sufficiently shown. The issuance to him of a certificate of election carried with it the presumption that he had complied with all the steps required by law for its issuance, and was entitled to hold the office and discharge its duties. The validity of his election or his right to hold the office could not be called in question by the defendant upon the trial herein. It was also fully shown at the trial that the evidence given by the defendant was material in determining the issue before the justice's court. The judgment is affirmed.

FAIR v. ANGUS et al. (S. F. 1,155, 1,156.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 23, 1899.)

APPEAL—SETTING ASIDE SUBMISSION.

Where a justice has not heard the argument, and it is deemed important that all the justices should participate in the decision, the submission of the appeal will be set aside, with leave to counsel to stipulate to resubmit the case on the briefs and printed arguments already on file.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Charles L. Fair against James S. Angus and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Submission set aside, and resubmission ordered.

G. W. McEnerney, for appellant Goodfellow. Van R. Paterson, for appellants Guardian and others. Lloyd & Wood, for appellants Theresa Oelrichs and Virginia Fair. Knight & Heggarty, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In the above-entitled appeals, one of the justices of this court not having heard the arguments, and therefore being disqualified to participate in the decisions thereof, and it being deemed important that all of the justices should so participate, it is ordered that the submission of said appeals be set aside, and that they be resubmitted to the full court. As the briefs on these appeals are very elaborate, and as several of the oral arguments made at the hearing have been printed and are on file, counsel for the several parties may stipulate, if they so desire, to immediately resubmit the cases on the briefs and printed arguments now on file; otherwise, they will be placed for argument on the next July calendar.

GRAY et al. v. RICHARDSON. (S. F. 941.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 23, 1899.)

MUNICIPALITIES—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENTS—CONTRACTS.

1. A contract provided that the contractor should construct certain concrete sidewalks in accordance with the specifications annexed to, and made a part of, the contract. When the contract was offered in evidence there were no specifications annexed, and it was not shown that any had ever been prepared; and one witness testified that, shortly after the contract was executed and filed in the office of superintendent of streets, he examined it, and no specifications were annexed. Held to sustain a finding that no valid contract was ever entered into.

2. The failure to annex the specifications rendered the contract invalid as the foundation of an assessment.

In bank. On rehearing. Affirmed.

For opinion in department, see 55 Pac. 603.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiffs applied to the superior court for a writ of mandate compelling the defendant, as superintendent of streets of the city of San Rafael, to issue to them an assessment for certain work done in the improvement of a street in said city under a contract alleged to have been entered into between them and the predecessor in office of the defendant. In his answer to their petition, the defendant, in addition to other defenses set forth by him, alleged that no valid contract for doing the work named in their petition had ever been entered into by the superintendent of streets of said city with the plaintiffs' assignor, or with any other person. Upon this issue the court found in favor of the defendant, and denied the plaintiffs' application for the writ. The plaintiffs moved for a new trial upon the ground that this finding was not sustained by the evidence. Their motion having been denied, they have appealed therefrom, and also from the judgment denying their application.

The contract for doing the work for which the plaintiffs sought an assessment was offered in evidence at the trial, and provided that the contractor (the assignor of the plaintiffs) should do and perform, under the direction of the superintendent of streets, and furnish materials therefor, all the work necessary to be done to construct concrete sidewalks upon a portion of Fifth street, in said city, "all in strict accordance with the specifications hereunto annexed, and made part of this contract." There were no specifications annexed to the contract, nor was it shown that any specifications had ever been prepared for signature or annexed thereto; and there was testimony that, shortly after the contract was executed and filed in the superintendent's office, it was examined by the witness, and that no specifications were then annexed thereto. This evidence was ample to sustain the finding of the court that no valid contract for doing the work for which the assessment was sought was ever made between the superintendent of streets and the plaintiffs' assignor, or any other person. The failure to annex the specifications to the contract rendered the contract invalid as the foundation of an assessment (Schwiesau v. Mahon, 110 Cal. 543, 42 Pac. 1065); and, if no valid contract had been made for doing the work, the defendant was justified in refusing to issue an assessment therefor, and the court correctly denied the application of the plaintiffs.

As this finding requires an affirmance of the judgment of the superior court, a discussion of the other propositions presented upon the appeal is unnecessary. The judgment and order are affirmed.

WINDSOR v. MINER et al. (S. F. 1,238.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1899.)
CONTRACTS—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—CONSIDERATION AND REASONABLENESS—PLEADING—PROOF.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 3391, refusing specific performance if defendant has not received adequate consideration for his contract, and if it is not just and reasonable, plaintiff must aver and prove the consideration and reasonableness of the contract.

2. Failure to do so is not cured by averment and proof as to improvements placed by plaintiff on the land in suit.

3. It is not cured by denial in the answer of adequate consideration.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county.

Suit by Richard N. Windsor against Virginia A. Miner and Elizabeth C. Windsor. There was a decree for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial defendants appeal. Reversed.

Remsen & Jones, for appellants. S. F. Geil, for respondent.

GRAY, C. The defendants appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The action was to enforce specific performance of an option to purchase, given in a lease from defendants to plaintiff, of a certain 85.45 acres of land.

The complaint alleges that on July 6, 1891, plaintiff owned a certain 390 acres of land in Monterey county; that defendants had a mortgage on said land to secure an indebtedness of plaintiff to them of $20,898.71; that on said date plaintiff executed to defendants a deed of said land; that the consideration of said deed was, among other things, the satisfaction of said mortgage and the debt secured thereby, together with the execution by defendants of a written lease of 85.45 acres, part of the said 390-acre tract, to plaintiff for the term of his natural life at an annual rental of $510, and an option to purchase the same or any part thereof; that defendants on July 8, 1891, made to plaintiff said lease, as agreed, with option to purchase; that on April 4, 1895, plaintiff tendered defendants $2,461, and demanded a deed to a certain 24.61 acres of land, being a portion of said 85.45-acre tract, but defendants refused to make the deed. The part of the lease referring to the option to purchase reads as follows: "And it is further mutually covenanted and agreed by and between the parties thereto that said party of the second part does now and shall at all times during the continuance of the said term hereby demised, to wit, during his lifetime, have the privilege and option of purchasing all or any portion of said 85.45-acre tract above described at and for the rate and sum of one hundred ($100) dollars per acre, and the said parties of the first part, in consideration of the covenants on the part of the said party of the second part herein contained, and for other valuable considerations, hereby agree to sell and convey unto the said party of the second part at any time during the continuance of this lease, and of said term hereby demised, upon the demand of said party of the second part, all or any portion of said 85.45-acre tract above described at and for the rate and sum of one hundred ($100) dollars per acre." The complaint also alleges that plaintiff has placed improvements on said 24.61-acre tract to the value of $1,500, and some other allegations necessary in an action for specific performance are contained in the complaint; but there is no allegation therein as to the value of the whole or any portion of the lands described; nor is there any statement in the complaint to show that the contract sought to be enforced is just and reasonable, and founded upon an adequate consideration; nor was there any evidence given on these subjects at the trial. At the close of plaintiff's case defendants moved for a nonsuit on the ground: "First. It is not shown that defendants, or either of them, received an adequate consideration for the option and privilege of purchase sued on. Second. It is not shown that the contract sued on is as to the defendants just and reasonable." The motion for a nonsuit was denied, and the court subsequently found "that defendants, and each of them, have received an adequate consideration for the option and privilege of purchase contained in the lease." There seems to be no evidence at all to support this finding, and, in the absence of such evidence, the motion for a nonsuit should have been granted. Section 3391 of the Civil Code contains the following language: "Specific performance cannot be enforced against a party to a contract in any of the following cases: 1. If he has not received an adequate consideration for the contract. 2. If it is not, as to him, just and reasonable."

Specific performance is an equitable remedy, and it is incumbent upon the plaintiff in an action of this character to show both in the averments of his pleading and in the evidence at the trial that he is entitled to the equitable relief which he seeks. In the absence of any averment or evidence as to the value of the land involved in the controversy, either as to the whole of it or as to any portion of it, with nothing stated upon which to base any estimate of the value or worth of the option and privilege to purchase, how is the court to determine whether defendants have received an adequate consideration, or whether the contract is as to them just and reasonable? It may be that the 24.61 acres, for which a deed is sought in this case, is worth twice as much as the balance of the 390 acres. If so, the contract sought to be enforced is not just and reasonable as to the defendants. It may be that this land is worth $500 an acre. If so, $100 per acre is not an adequate consideration for it. The following cases seem to support the conclusions reached in this case: Bruck v. Tucker, 42 Cal. 346; Nicholson v. Tarpey, 70 Cal. 608, 12 Pac. 778; Morrill v. Everson, 77 Cal. 114, 19 Pac. 190; Agard v. Valencia, 39 Cal. 296; Arguello v. Bours, 67 Cal. 451, 8 Pac. 49.

The allegations and evidence as to improvements being placed upon the land by plaintiff do not tend to obviate or cure the defects in plaintiff's case already pointed out. The allegation in the answer that there was no adequate consideration to support the option contract fails to supply the want of any affirmative allegation on that subject in the complaint, and certainly cannot be held to cure the entire absence of evidence as to a consideration. On the strength of the foregoing conclusions it would be an act of supererogation to notice the numerous other points and subdivisions of points contained in the briefs herein. I advise that the order denying the new trial be reversed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order denying the new trial is reversed.

NEWHALL v. SHERMAN et al. (S. F.

1,022.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1899.)

TRUST DEED — FORECLOSURE — LIMITATIONS — COMPLAINT — SUFFICIENCY — LOAN — MATURITY — PRESUMPTION — MORTGAGE DEBT — EFFECT OF BAR — TIME OF PAYMENT.

1. A suit to foreclose a deed intended as a mortgage, given to secure a loan presumed to be due immediately or on demand, and not evidenced by any written promise to pay, is barred in four years from the execution of the deed, by Code Civ. Proc. § 337, providing that an action on any contract, obligation, or liability founded on a written instrument shall be brought within four years.

2. Where it does not appear that any time was fixed for the payment of a loan, it will be presumed to be due immediately or on demand.

3. A complaint to foreclose a deed intended as a mortgage, which does not show that the debt was due and that action could have been maintained for its collection at the time of the execution of the deed, fails to show that it became due at any subsequent time, and does not state a cause of action.

4. Where the debt secured by a mortgage is barred, the mortgage is also barred.

5. By the defeasance to a deed it was recited that it was intended as a mortgage to secure a loan, and the grantee bound himself to reconvey at any time on the payment to him of the amount loaned, and a demand for a deed. Held not to fix a time, either certain or uncertain, for the payment of the debt.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county.

Suit by George A. Newhall against Sherman, Clay & Co. and another. Defendants Sherman, Clay & Co. demurred to the complaint, and from a judgment for said defendants the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. W. McGraw, for appellant. T. C. Judkins and Craig & Craig, for respondents.

GRAY, C. The appellant brought suit against A. T. Hatch and others on the 3d day of February, 1897, to foreclose a deed intended as a mortgage, and joined the respondents as defendants because, as stated in the complaint, "the said Sherman, Clay & Co. claim some interest or lien upon the lands and premises hereinbefore described, but that said claim is subsequent to and subordinate to the mortgage aforesaid." Respondents demurred on the grounds, among others, that the complaint failed to state a cause of action, and that the cause of action therein stated was barred by the provisions of section 337, Code Civ. Proc. This demurrer was sustained. Plaintiff declined to amend, and appealed from the judgment against him. The defeasance which was executed with the deed is set out in the complaint, and, after reciting the deed and the property conveyed thereby, said defeasance reads as follows: "And whereas said deed is absolute in form, yet in fact is intended as security for the payment of the sum of four thousand dollars loaned by said Newhall to said A. T. Hatch: Now, this defeasance witnesseth that the said George A. Newhall, for himself, and for his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, hereby binds himself and agrees to reconvey the hereinabove mentioned and described property unto the said A. T. Hatch, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, at any time, upon the payment to him of said sum of four thousand dollars, and his demand for a deed to said property. In witness whereof the said George A. Newhall has hereunto set his hand and seal this fourth day of November, A. D. 1892. [Signed] Geo. A. Newhall."

The complaint shows that the suit was begun more than four years after the execution of the deed and defeasance upon which the suit is based. There appears to be no promise in writing subscribed by the defendant as to the payment of the amount loaned; and, though his obligation to pay may be founded in parol, yet the suit for foreclosure is deemed to be founded upon the written instruments, consisting of the deed and defeasance, which constitute the mortgage, and the statute of limitations will not bar such suit until four years after the execution of these instruments. And for the purposes of the foreclosure suit the debt itself is not barred until the end of four years, because its payment is secured by the same written instruments. Wood v. Goodfellow, 43 Cal. 185; Union Water Co. v. Murphy's Flat Fluming Co., 22 Cal. 621. Respondent therefore relies upon the proper statute of limitations when he pleads section 337, Code Civ. Proc., in his demurrer. Whether plaintiff's cause of action is barred depends upon when the money loaned, for which the mortgage was given as security, was due and collectible. It not appearing from any of the written instruments upon which the suit is based, nor from any allegation of the complaint, that any time was given or fixed for the payment of the loan, "the presumption would therefore necessarily arise that it was due immediately or upon demand, and therefore was barred at the time this action was commenced." Espinosa v. Gregory, 40 Cal. 58; Holmes v. West, 17 Cal. 623; Civ. Code, § 1657; In re Galvin, 51 Cal. 215; Dorland v. Dorland, 66 Cal. 189, 5 Pac. 77. If the complaint does not show that the claim sought to be enforced was due, and that suit could have been maintained for its collection, at the time of the execution of the mortgage herein, then it certainly falls to show that it became due at any subsequent time, and is amenable to the first ground of demurrer stated. Doyle v. Insurance Co., 44 Cal. 264. We must therefore treat the complaint as showing that the money loaned was due immediately upon such loan, and it would then appear that the claim for such money was barred, by the statute pleaded, about three months before the commencement of this action. The debt secured by the mortgage being barred, it necessarily follows that the mortgage is also barred. Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 271, 17 Pac. 225; Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 482; McCarthy v. White, 21 Cal. 496; Heinlin v. Castro, 22 Cal. 100; Wormouth v. Hatch, 33 Cal. 121; Wells v. Harter, 56 Cal. 342; Civ. Code, § 2911.

The appellant is mistaken in his assumption that the defeasance fixes a future time, either certain or uncertain, for the payment of the indebtedness secured by the mortgage; and the authorities cited in his brief are therefore either irrelevant to the case made by the pleadings, or are in conflict with the decisions of this court cited in this opinion. For the foregoing reasons, I advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. v. WOOD et al.

(L. A. 445.)¹

RAILROAD GRANT—CONSTRUCTION—INDEMNITY LANDS—SELECTION—LIABILITY TO PRE-EMPTION.

1. Under Act Cong. July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 292), certain lands were granted to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company. By the act the odd sections within 40 miles of the road in certain territories, and where the road passed through any state, 10 alternative sections per mile were granted, making the primary limits within the territories 40 miles, and within the states 20 miles, on each side of the road; the grant being of lands to which the United States had full title. The act also provided that whenever, prior to the time the line of said road was designated by a plat, any sections of such grant should have been sold or otherwise disposed of, other lands might be selected, under direction of the secretary of the interior, not more than 10 miles beyond the limits of said alternate sections. Held, that the lands granted by the act are those as to which the grant is in present, and only lands within the primary limits are covered, and as to the indemnity lands the title, when they are selected, relates back, not to the date of the act, but to the date of selection.

2. A map of the general line of the railroad filed in 1867 did not fix the limits of the indemnity lands nor operate as a withdrawal of them.

3. Where, under the act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 292) indemnity lands were granted to supply deficiencies in the primary grant, and it is not alleged that all the sections within the indemnity grant are required to make up deficiencies within the primary limits, the allegation is insufficient to show that no formal selection of indemnity lands was necessary to confer title in the road.

4. Under the act of congress of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 292), making the primary grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, and also providing for an indemnity grant to cover deficiencies in the primary grant, the provisions of the act that the lands "hereby granted" shall not be liable to sale or entry or pre-emption, except by such company, apply only to the lands in the primary grant, and the provisions of section 6 extending pre-emption rights "to all other lands on the line of said road" include the indemnity lands the title to which, when selected, relates to the date of the selection.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Kern county.

Action by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against Frank A. Wood and others and against Frederick B. Jack and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Singer, Jr., and H. V. Reardon, for appellant. W. B. Wallace, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. These cases depend upon the same facts and are submitted together. They involve a contest as to certain lands lying within the indemnity limits of the grant to plaintiff by act of congress of July 27, 1866; the plaintiff claiming under said grant, and the defendants claiming under patents issued to them as settlers under the land laws of the United States. The defendants demurred to the complaints in both cases, the demurrers were sustained, and these appeals are taken by the plaintiff from the judgments thereupon entered against it. Said act of congress, upon which the plaintiff bases its claim to said lands, is entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the states of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific Coast." 14 Stat. 292. Said act incorporated the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, and by the third section granted certain lands to aid in its construction. It provided that where the road passed through the territories of the United States the odd sections within 40 miles of the road, and where it passed through any state 10 alternate sections per mile, designated by odd numbers, were granted, making the primary limits within the territories 40 miles, and within the states 20 miles, on each side of the road; the grant being of lands to which "the United States have full title, not reserved, sold, granted or otherwise appropriated, and free from pre-emption or other claims or rights, at the time the line of said road is designated by a plat thereof filed in the office of the commissioner of the general land office; and whenever prior to said time any of said sections or parts of sections shall have been granted, sold, reserved, occupied by homestead settlers, or pre-empted or otherwise disposed of, other lands shall be selected by said company in lieu thereof, under the direction of the secretary of the Interior, in alternate sections, and designated by odd numbers, not more than ten miles beyond the limit of said alternate sections, and not including the reserved numbers."

Section 6 of said act is as follows: "And be it further enacted: That the president of the United States shall cause the lands to be surveyed for forty miles in width on both sides of the entire line of said road after the general route shall be fixed, and as fast as may be required by the said railroad; and the odd sections of land hereby granted shall not be liable to sale or entry, or pre-emption, before or after they are surveyed, except by said company, as provided in this act; but the provisions of the act of September, 1841, granting pre-emption rights, and the acts amendatory thereof, and of the act entitled 'An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain,' approved May 20, 1862, shall be and the same are hereby extended to all other lands on the line of said road when surveyed, excepting those hereby granted to said company."

Section 18 of said act authorized the Southern Pacific Railroad Company (the appellant here) to connect with said Atlantic & Pacific Railroad at such point near the boundary line of the state of California as they shall deem most suitable for a railroad line to San Francisco, "and in consideration thereof, to aid in its construction, shall have similar grants of land, subject to all the conditions and limitations herein provided, and shall be required to construct its road on the like regulations, as to time and manner, with the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad herein provided for."

The complaint alleged the substance of said section 18, and referred to said entire act as printed in said statutes, and made it part thereof. It then alleged that before January 3, 1867, plaintiff "fixed the general route" of the entire line of railroad it was authorized to construct, and on that day filed a map thereof in the general land office; that the same was approved by the commissioner; that on March 22, 1867, said commissioner, pursuant to the order of the secretary of the Interior, withdrew all the odd-numbered sections of land lying within 30 miles of the line of said road, as shown upon said map, from sale or location, pre-emption or homestead entry; that the same have ever since remained so withdrawn; that on June 28, 1870, a joint resolution was passed by congress (16 Stat. 382), authorizing appellant to construct its road as near as may be on the route indicated by its map of 1867; that prior to November 8, 1889, and within the time allowed by law, it completed its entire road along the line designated by said map; that its road was accepted; and that on and prior to November 8, 1889, it filed with the secretary of the Interior a map of each of the sections of said road "as the same had been definitely located and constructed," and the same were accepted and approved by said secretary. The fifth paragraph of the complaint described certain lands, parts of odd sections within the 20-mile or place limits, which were lost to it, and the sixth paragraph described the lands now in controversy, which are situated within the indemnity limits described in said act, and alleged that they are opposite to and coterminous with the section of said road extending from Huron to Alcalde, "the map of definite location and construction of which was filed in the office of, and duly accepted and approved by, the secretary of the interior, on October 8, 1889." The complaint further alleges that at the time the act of July 27, 1866, was passed the lands here in controversy were vacant and unappropriated public land of the United States, not mineral, and not reserved, etc., and that they have ever since so remained, except only as they have been affected by said act of congress, the said withdrawals, and the acts of the parties to this suit; that said lands were surveyed and plat filed May 1, 1874; that "on October 19, 1891, the plaintiff filed its list No. 44 in said land office, selecting the lands described in the sixth paragraph hereof in lieu of the lands described in the fifth paragraph"; that it thereby became entitled to a patent from the United States to the lands in question; that at that time, and ever since, plaintiff has demanded the issuance of such patent, but the United States and every officer thereof have at all times refused to issue it; that, disregarding the rights of the plaintiff, a patent was issued to defendant Wood on October 30, 1888, conveying the legal title to him; that he took the legal title in trust for the plaintiff; and that a conveyance has been demanded, etc. The prayer is that plaintiff be adjudged to be the owner, and that defendants convey the title to it.

Defendants' demurrer stated three grounds: (1) That said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; (2) that plaintiff's cause of action is barred by the provisions of subdivision 4 of section 338 and sections 318 and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and (3) that plaintiff has been guilty of gross laches in delaying to bring suit after the issuance of the patent to Wood, and after filing its selection.

Appellant, in its brief, states its first point thus: "The facts stated in the second amended complaint show the legal title to be in the plaintiff." If that were true, there could be no reason why it should resort to equity to compel a conveyance. But in the complaint it is alleged that the defendants have the "legal title," and, upon the theory that plaintiff has a prior and better right, seeks to compel a conveyance. Whatever right the plaintiff asserts or may have is based upon said act of congress of 1866 and its own acts thereunder, while defendants' rights are based upon the pre-emption laws of the United States, and their compliance therewith; and, as defendants' patent was issued prior to the selection of the same lands by the plaintiff, they must have the better right, if said lands were subject to pre-emption; and that they were so subject, unless withdrawn from pre-emption by the act of 1866, or by executive action thereunder, is not questioned.

Section 6 of said act, above quoted, provides: "And the odd sections of land hereby granted shall not be liable to sale, or entry, or pre-emption, before or after they are surveyed, except by said company as provided in this act." But it is further provided that the pre-emption act of 1841, and the homestead act of 1862, and the acts amendatory thereof, "shall be and the same are hereby extended to all other lands on the line of said road when surveyed, excepting those hereby granted to said company." If it be true, as contended by the learned counsel for plaintiff, that the "odd sections of land hereby granted" include the odd sections within the indemnity limits, there could have been no reason for the provision that the homestead and pre-emption laws should extend "to all other lands on the line of said road," since the even-numbered sections were in no wise affected by the grant. But aside from this provision of the act, it is well settled that the words "hereby granted" do not include the odd sections within the indemnity limits, and therefore it cannot be true that upon selection the title relates back to the date of the act. As to lands within the place or primary limits, it is uniformly held that the words "be and is hereby granted" import a grant in presenti, and, when the lands are ascertained by fixing the line of the road in the manner prescribed in the act, the title of the grantee relates back to the date of the act, but does not attach to lands to which the United States did not have full title at that date, or were otherwise excepted from the operation of the grant, even though they should afterwards be freed from the claim or possession which excluded them under the terms of the grant. Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761. But, as to indemnity lands, it is sufficient if they are free from private claim at the time of their selection by the railroad company. Ryan v. Railroad Co., 99 U. S. 382. In Newhall v. Sanger an odd section within the place limits was covered by a Mexican grant which was sub judice at the date of the act, but shortly afterwards the Mexican grant was adjudged void, and it was held that the land did not pass under the grant to the railroad company. In Ryan v. Railroad Co. the land in question was within the indemnity limits of the grant to the railroad company, and was also covered by a Mexican grant which was afterwards declared void, and was selected by the company as indemnity land, and was afterwards settled upon by Ryan as a pre-emptor. It was held that, the railroad company's selection having been approved by the secretary of the interior, it was entitled to the land, and the distinction between that case and Newhall v. Sanger was pointed out, the court saying: "It was within the secondary or indemnity territory where that deficiency was to be supplied. The railroad company had not, and could not have, any claim to it until specially selected, as it was, for that purpose." These cases settle the proposition that the lands granted by the act are those as to which the grant is in præsenti, and refer only to the lands within the primary limits, and as to the indemnity lands that the title, when they are selected, does not relate back to the date of the act, but to the date of selection.

In Railroad Co. v. Herring, 110 U. S. 27, 3 Sup. Ct. 485, the above quotation from Ryan v. Railroad Co. was repeated with approval, and, in addition, the court said: "It is only when the line and route of the road is definitely fixed that any right of selection exists. This must necessarily be so, because until then the quantity of land lost cannot be known, and the number of sections to be selected can only then be ascertained." The court also said (page 38, 110 U. S., and page 493, 3 Sup. Ct.): "It is obvious, however, that the right to these odd sections, and the right to others in lieu of such odd sections as had previously been disposed of, depend upon very different circumstances, and it is not easy to see how rights can be vested in any particular section or sections of the latter class until it is ascertained how many of the original odd-numbered sections are thus lost, and until the grantee has exercised his right of selection. This latter, unlike the odd-numbered sections within the six-mile limit, are not ascertained and made specific by the protraction of the established line through the maps of the public land. They are not, and cannot be, made specific until the grantee's right of selection has been exercised." This authority disposes of appellant's contention that the map of the general route, filed in 1867, fixed the limits of the indemnity lands, or operated as a withdrawal of them.

In St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. v. Winona & St. P. R. Co., 112 U. S. 732, 5 Sup. Ct. 341, the court said: "It is true that in some cases the statute requires the land department to withdraw the land within these secondary limits from the market, and in others the officers do so voluntarily. This, however, is to give the company a reasonable time to ascertain their deficiencies and make their selections. It by no means implies a vested right in said company inconsistent with the right of the government to sell, or of any other company to select, which has the same right of selection within those limits." If therefore it be true, as above stated, that the withdrawal of indemnity lands does not imply a vested right to them in the railroad company, it must be that they are not, and cannot be, included in the term "hereby granted." But congress itself has placed a construction upon said act of July 27, 1866, or at least recognized the distinction observed by the courts between granted and indemnity lands. In the act passed July 5, 1886 (24 Stat. 123), entitled "An act to forfeit the lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company," etc. (referring to the act here in question), the lands declared forfeited are described thus: "Which are adjacent to and co-terminous with the uncompleted portions of the main line of said road, embraced within both the granted and indemnity limits, as contemplated to be constructed under and by the provisions of said act of July 27, 1866."

It is argued on behalf of appellant that the grant to it was one of quantity. But this will not bear investigation. It is clear that congress intended to grant all the odd-numbered sections within 20 miles of the road, except those that were excepted from the grant, and the privilege was given the company to select odd sections within an additional 10 miles in lieu of those that were lost to it within the primary limit. But congress did not intend either to grant 10 sections on each side of the road unconditionally, or to grant all the odd sections to which the United States had full title, and which were not reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated, and free from pre-emption or other claims or rights, within the additional 10 miles, since if that had been the intention all the unappropriated odd sections within 30 miles of the road would have been granted; and hence the act requires the grantee to select the lieu lands within the indemnity limits to the extent only that lands were lost within the primary limits. And therefore the act requires that the selection of indemnity or lieu lands shall be made by the grantee under the direction of the secretary of the interior, or, as expressed in some other acts granting lands in aid of railroads, subject to his approval. In either case the secretary acts judicially. He must determine whether the alleged loss within the primary limits has in fact taken place, and whether the land selected is subject to selection. That the secretary acts judicially, see Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. v. Price Co., 133 U. S. 496, 10 Sup. Ct. 341, and, for a fuller discussion as to his powers, see Knight v. Association, 142 U. S. 161, 176, 12 Sup. Ct. 258. The complaint, it is true, alleges that appellant's selection of the land in controversy was under the direction of the secretary of the interior; but it is further alleged that plaintiff has demanded that a patent issue to it for said lands, and that the United States and all its officers (which includes the secretary) have refused to issue it, and that on October 30, 1888, the United States conveyed the legal title to the defendant Wood by a patent then issued to him. The refusal to issue a patent to the plaintiff, though persistently demanded, and the further fact, distinctly alleged, that at a date some three years prior to plaintiff's selection the same land was patented to defendant Wood, is wholly inconsistent with the allegation that the selection was made under the direction of the secretary of the interior, and, in effect, is an allegation that the selection was not made under his direction, or approved by that officer. It is said, however, that at the date of the act (July 27, 1866) the United States had then full title, that it was not reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated, and was free from pre-emption or other claims or rights; but that was before the plaintiff filed its map of the general route of its road, and said allegation is not made as of any other date than that of the act; nor is the date of defendants' settlement on the land in question alleged. Non constat that it may have been before the alleged withdrawal of the land from sale by the order of the secretary made in March, 1867, or after its revocation on August 15, 1887. It is true it is further alleged that "said sections have ever since remained so withdrawn by virtue and force of said withdrawal"; but this allegation is a mere conclusion of law that, having been once withdrawn, it so remains "by virtue and force of said withdrawal," and is not the equivalent of an allegation that the withdrawal had not been revoked, while the allegation that a patent was issued to the defendant shows that, as to the land so conveyed, the withdrawal was revoked. The withdrawal, however, was in fact revoked on August 15, 1887, by executive order after a rule to show cause was served upon the Atlantic & Pacific Company and the Southern Pacific Company, and after each of said companies had filed answers thereto. For the proceedings and action of the secretary of the interior in relation thereto, see Atlantic & P. R. Co., 6 Land Dec. Dep. Int. 77-93. This is a public record, of which the court takes judicial notice, and such action, being within the power of the department of the interior, is conclusive, and might be properly considered even if the complaint had alleged that the withdrawal had not been revoked.

It is said by counsel for appellant that, "where all the undisposed of odd sections within the exterior limits of the grant are insufficient to make up the quantity granted, there need be no selection; and by definite location the grantee perfects the same title to the lands within the secondary or indemnity limits as to those in the primary limits,"—citing St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Northern P. R. Co., 139 U. S. 19, 11 Sup. Ct. 389.

As to the first part of this statement the case cited held that, as all the lands within the indemnity limits only made up in part for the deficiencies, there was no occasion for the exercise of the judgment of the secretary in selecting from them, for they were all appropriated. The controversy there was as to the respective rights of two different railroad corporations claiming under different grants the same indemnity lands, and not as to the right of either company to a specific parcel, as against a claimant under the homestead or pre-emption laws; and therefore it was only necessary to determine whether all the odd sections within the indemnity limits were required to indemnify the company having the prior right for its losses within the place limits, these lands having been withdrawn by the land department for the benefit of the Northern Pacific Company; and the language used by the court must be read in the light of these facts; and in a later case (U. S. v. Colton Marble & Lime Co., 146 U. S. 616, 13 Sup. Ct. 163) the above case (139 U. S. 19, 11 Sup. Ct. 389) was cited, and the court said: "The ordinary rule with respect to lands within the indemnity limits is that no title passes until selection. Where, as here, the deficiency within the granted limits is so great that all the indemnity lands will not make good the loss, it has been held, in a contest between two railroad companies, that no formal selection was necessary to give them to the one having the older grant, as against the other company." But, however that may be, in the case at bar it is not alleged that all the odd sections within the indemnity limits are required to make up appellant's deficiencies within the primary limits, or that there are no other lands available for that purpose than those in controversy.

As to the second branch of appellant's contention, viz. that by the map of definite location the grantee perfects the same title to the indemnity lands as to those within the primary limits, but one case is cited which sustains that contention. That is the case of Railroad Co. v. Barnes, 2 N. D. 310, 51 N. W. 386, a case which was expressly overruled in Grandin v. La Bar, 3 N. D. 446, 455, 57 N. W. 241, in an able opinion, to which we refer in support of our conclusions in this case. In that case (page 453, 3 N. D., and page 243, 57 N. W.) it was said: "But it required something more than the existence of the grant, and the location and construction of the road in accordance with the terms of the grant, to vest the title to such additional lands in the company. It required a legal selection; and until such selection was made, and the legality of the selection in some manner established, the company could claim no right or interest whatever in any specific tract within the indemnity belt,"—citing Ryan v. Railroad Co., 99 U. S. 382; Grinnell v. Railroad Co., 103 U. S. 739; Railroad Co. v. Herring, 110 U. S. 27, 3 Sup. Ct. 485; Kansas P. R. Co. v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 112 U. S. 414, 5 Sup. Ct. 208; Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. v. Price Co., 133 U. S. 496, 10 Sup. Ct. 341, and other cases.

In a supplemental brief appellant cites the case of Railroad Co. v. Groeck, decided by the circuit court of appeals, Ninth circuit, and reported in 31 C. C. A. 334, and 87 Fed. 970. That case arose under the same grant which is the basis of appellant's claim in this case, and in most of its features is entirely similar, and it is urged that as the case before us involves federal questions the decision of the circuit court of appeals should be followed by this court; but I think that the opinion in that case is not sustained by the decisions of the supreme court of the United States upon vital questions involved in it, even if it were not distinguishable from the case before us in certain of its features. For example, it is there said: "A careful consideration of other decisions of the supreme court determining the nature of the right which the grantee of such a grant acquires to lands within the indemnity limits, prior to the time when definite location and selection of lieu lands is made, leads us to the conclusion that, in the case of a grant such as that now under consideration, by the operation of the terms of the grant itself the indemnity lands are withdrawn from settlement from the moment when a map of the general route of the road is made and filed. It may be deduced from those decisions that the grant to the appellant conferred upon the grantee, within the indemnity limits, more than a mere right to initiate a title by selection, and that the lands in the indemnity limits are as truly granted lands, within the terms of the act, as are the lands within the place limits. The difference is in the preliminary steps which are requisite to attach the title to the particular tracts which are granted,"—citing St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. v. Winona & St. P. R. Co., 112 U. S. 720, 5 Sup. Ct. 334, and St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Northern Pac. Co., 139 U. S. 1, 11 Sup. Ct. 389. (The italics are ours.) The latter case has been already noticed, and the facts which make it broadly distinguishable from the Groeck Case and the one at bar need not be repeated. In St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. the controversy arose under a grant to the territory of Minnesota for the benefit of several roads, both parties claiming under the same grant; and it was held that title to the lands within the primary limits relates, after the road is located according to law, to the date of the grant, while as to indemnity lands neither priority of grant, nor priority of location or of construction, gives priority of right, but this is determined by priority of selection, where the selection is made according to law. In the opinion (page 732, 112 U. S., and page 341, 5 Sup. Ct.) the court said: "The plaintiff in error insists that the map of its line of road was filed in 1859. The court of original jurisdiction finds that, up to the time of the trial in October, 1878, a period of nearly twenty years, no selection of these lands had ever been made by that company, or any one for it. Was there a vested right in this company, during all this time, to have not only these lands, but all the other odd sections within the twenty-mile limits on each side of the line of the road, await its pleasure? Had the settlers in that populous region no right to buy of the government because the company might choose to take them, or might, after all this delay, find out that they were necessary to make up deficiencies in other quarters? How long were such lands to be withheld from market, and withdrawn from taxation, and forbidden to cultivation?"

In Barney v. Railroad Co., 117 U. S. 232, 6 Sup. Ct. 656, Mr. Justice Field, after noticing "the well-established distinction observed between granted lands and indemnity lands," said: "It is these 'granted lands' of the prior grant falling within the six-mile limit that in our opinion are reserved, and not the possible indemnity lands which might be subsequently acquired."

The case of Buttz v. Railroad Co., 119 U. S. 55, 7 Sup. Ct. 100, cited by the court of appeals in the Groeck Case, has no application to that case or this. There the controversy related solely to lands within the primary limits of the grant, which in that case was of all the odd sections within 40 miles on each side of the road, and all of which were withdrawn by the statute from sale or pre-emption.

In the case of Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Musser-Sauntry Land, Logging & Mfg. Co., 168 U. S. 604, 18 Sup. Ct. 205, also cited in the Groeck Case, the sole question was "whether the withdrawal from sale by the land department in March, 1866, of lands within the indemnity limits of the grant of 1856 and 1864 exempted such lands from the operation of the grant to the plaintiff," which was made after the withdrawal; and it was held that the act of the secretary withdrawing the lands from settlement was, in effect, a reservation, within the terms of the later grant to the plaintiff, and excepted them therefrom; but this does not support the holding in the Groeck Case that the terms of the grant here under consideration operate of themselves to withdraw the indemnity lands from settlement "from the moment when a map of the general route is made and filed," or that "the lands in the indemnity limits are as truly granted lands, within the terms of the act, as are the lands within the place limits." In support of the same proposition, viz. that the grant itself withdraws the lands within the indemnity limits, the circuit court of appeals also quoted from U. S. v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 146 U. S. 600, 13 Sup. Ct. 158, the following: "When the general route of the road is thus fixed in good faith, and information thereof given to the land department by filing a map thereof with the commissioner of the general land office or the secretary of the interior, the law withdraws from sale or pre-emption the odd sections to the extent of forty miles on each side. The object of the law in this particular is plain. It is to preserve the land for the company to which, in aid of the construction of the road, it is granted." This, however, was not the language of Mr. Justice Brewer, but was quoted from Buttz v. Railroad Co., 119 U. S. 71, 72, 7 Sup. Ct. 107, where the primary or place limits were 40 miles on each side of the road, and had no reference to indemnity lands; nor did the case of U. S. v. Southern Pac. Co. have any reference to indemnity lands; but, as shown by the statement of facts, "the lands in controversy are within the granted or place limits of both the Atlantic & Pacific and the Southern Pacific Companies at the place where these lines cross"; and it was this fact that made the quotation from the Buttz Case applicable.

The case of Van Wyck v. Knevals, 106 U. S. 360, 1 Sup. Ct. 336, cited by appellant, has no application here. In the statement of facts it is said: "The lands in dispute are within ten miles of the road as built and of the line as delineated on the map." They were in the place limits, and not indemnity lands.

In the Groec Case the court said: "After such lands have been once set aside by congressional act, no authority is vested in the secretary of the interior, or in any officer of the land department, to restore them or open them to settlement." That is conceded; but it is clear that the indemnity lands were not set aside by "congressional act." As to the lands within the place limits, section 6 of the act provided that "the odd sections of land hereby granted shall not be liable to sale or entry," except by the company; but the same section further provided that the homestead and pre-emption laws "shall be, and the same are hereby, extended to all other lands on the line of said road when surveyed, excepting those hereby granted to said company." It has been often decided, as we have seen, that the words "hereby granted" import a grant in present, which vests the title in the grantee as of the date of the grant. The expression "all other lands" must therefore include the indemnity lands, the title to which, when selected and approved, relates to the date of selection; and as to these lands the pre-emption and homestead laws were expressly extended. The only debatable question, therefore, is whether the land department had authority to withdraw said indemnity lands from settlement; and upon this question Mr. Secretary Lamar expressed the opinion that the act deprived the department of that power. See Atlantic & P. R. Co., 6 Land Dec. Dep. Int. pp. 87-91. But it is not necessary to a decision of the present case to decide that question; for as these lands were not withdrawn by force of the act of congress, and the withdrawal having been revoked, and as the complaint does not allege that Wood's settlement was made before the revocation, or while they were withdrawn, it is not shown that his settlement was illegal or unauthorized, or that the patent was improperly issued.

In a supplemental brief filed by respondent our attention is called to the case of Moore v. Cormode (decided by the supreme court of Washington Dec. 5, 1898) 55 Pac. 217). That case arose under the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad, the language as to the indemnity lands being the same as in the grant to the appellant, and the general facts being the same as here. The plaintiff was the grantee of the railroad company, and the action was brought to cancel defendants' patent, and to obtain possession. We should like to quote largely from the opinion, but must content ourselves with a single sentence: "After a consideration of the numerous cases cited in the briefs, we are of the opinion that the grant did not take effect as to any lands within the indemnity limits until actually selected by the company, and that prior thereto they were open to settlement."

In view of the conclusion reached upon the first ground of demurrer, it is not necessary to consider either the second or third ground. I advise that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

(6 Cal. Unrep. 284)

LOTHROP v. GOLDEN et al. (Sac. 386.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1899.)

TROVER AND CONVERSION — ACTIONS — PARTIES — MISJOINDER — PLEADING — EXEMPLARY DAMAGES — EVIDENCE — INSTRUCTIONS — APPEAL — REVERSIBLE ERROR.

1. A judgment will not be reversed for alleged ambiguity in the complaint, where it appears from defendant's answer that he was not thereby misled to his prejudice.

2. Where a complaint does not show that a party is improperly joined as a defendant, his remedy is by answer, and not by a demurrer for misjoinder of parties.

3. Where, in an action for conversion, plaintiff claims damages for malicious acts of defendants in tearing down fences and buildings where the property was situated, there is not a misjoinder of causes of action; complainant's intention being to bring the case within Civ. Code, § 3294, allowing exemplary damages where defendant has been guilty of oppression and malice.

4. In an action for the conversion of grain, there was evidence that it was forcibly taken in the absence of the owner, and over the protest of his wife; that defendants were twice arrested to prevent their taking it, but they obtained their release and returned to the premises. Held, that a verdict allowing plaintiff damages for grain taken, for time and money expended in pursuit thereof, and for the malicious taking, was proper, there being sufficient evidence as to the amounts of such damages given.

5. In an action for conversion, it is not error to deny defendant an instruction as to the doctrine of commingling of goods, where there was no evidence thereof.

6. In an action for the conversion of grain, a part of which plaintiff alleged to have been recovered, and as to which he sought relief only for money expended in pursuit, an instruction that the jury, in estimating the damages, should find the value of the grain at the time of the taking, is not erroneous, as misleading them in to believing that damages for the value of the grain returned could be recovered.

7. In an action for conversion, an erroneous instruction authorizing the jury to award exemplary damages if the taking was unlawful is not reversible error where the jury specially found damages for the malicious taking of the property.

8. Plaintiff in an action for the conversion of grain alleged that a part had been returned prior to the suit, but sought, under Civ. Code, § 3336, to recover compensation for the time and money expended in its pursuit. Held, that the actions were not improperly joined, since all the grain converted was taken at the same time, and the acts complained of constituted one and the same wrong.

9. Error, in an action for conversion, where plaintiff claimed damages for malicious acts of defendant in tearing down his fences to obtain access to the property, in an instruction that if defendants did such acts they were trespassers, and were liable therefor to plaintiff, is harmless, where the special verdict awarded no damages for trespass.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Glenn county.

Action for conversion by M. H. Lothrop against M. Golden and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ben. F. Geis and H. M. Alberry, for appellants. Chas. L. Donohoe, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action for the conversion of certain 585 sacks of barley, and for damages. A fourth amended complaint alleges the malicious, forcible, and unlawful taking from plaintiff by defendants, and the conversion, of certain 1,388 sacks of whole barley about July 26, 1894, of which plaintiff recovered 803 sacks before this action was commenced. Damage is claimed of $600 and interest for the value of 585 sacks of barley not recovered, "and one hundred dollars damages by reason of the malicious, forcible, oppressive, and unlawful acts of defendants towards plaintiff." It is alleged that "plaintiff has been damaged, in time and money properly expended in the pursuit of said eight hundred and three sacks of barley, in the sum of two hundred dollars." It is also alleged that plaintiff has been damaged, in time and money properly expended in the pursuit of said 585 sacks of barley, in the sum of $100. The prayer is for judgment against defendants for the sum of $1,000, and for costs of suit. The complaint is verified. Defendants demurred on several grounds: (1) Insufficiency of facts; (2) several causes of action improperly united; (3) uncertainty and ambiguity; (4) misjoinder of parties defendant. The demurrer was overruled, and defendants answered, specifically denying the material allegations of the complaint. For further answer it is alleged that the barley, the subject of the action, was grown upon land belonging to and cultivated by one T. J. Kirkpatrick, who had theretofore mortgaged the crops grown and to be grown thereon to defendants, other than O'Brien, to secure the payment of the sum of $1,182.68 owing to defendants Hochheimer & Co. by said Kirkpatrick; that the barley in question was grown upon these mortgaged premises, and was a part of the crop subject to said mortgage, and that said mortgagees were entitled to the possession thereof; that defendant O'Brien was in the employ of and acting for said Hochheimer & Co., and under their direction, during all the times mentioned in the complaint. It is further alleged in the answer that plaintiff claims the barley in question under a pretended purchase from said Kirkpatrick after the execution of said mortgage, and that said sale or transfer was not accompanied by an immediate delivery of the barley, nor followed by an actual and continued change of possession thereof; that no consideration was paid therefor, and said sale was made to defraud the creditors of said Kirkpatrick, and especially defendants, and was fraudulent and void. The cause was tried by a jury, and plaintiff had a verdict for $91.33 "for the value and the interest on the value of ninety-seven sacks of barley," and $163.37 "as money and compensation for time expended in the pursuit of the eight hundred and three sacks of barley," and $34.20 "for money and time properly expended in the pursuit of ninety-seven, number of sacks of barley not returned to plaintiff," and $33.75 "for the malicious taking of the barley." Judgment was accordingly entered for $322.65, the amount of said verdict. The appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

1. The complaint is sufficient upon general demurrer. As to the alleged ambiguity and uncertainty, the rule as laid down by this court in numerous cases was stated in the recent case of Hardware Co. v. Brownstone (S. F. 870) 56 Pac. 468, and need not be repeated here. An examination of defendants' answer, not to mention the evidence at the trial, clearly shows that defendants were not misled to their prejudice by the alleged ambiguity or uncertainty in the complaint, in which case the judgment will not be reversed. If O'Brien was not a party to the alleged unlawful taking and conversion of the property, his remedy was by answer, and not by demurrer for misjoinder of parties. Nothing in the complaint shows that he was improperly joined as defendant. Plaintiff had the right to join all who participated in the alleged taking and conversion. Nor do we think that the complaint necessarily discloses a misjoinder of causes of action. The claim of misjoinder is based upon the following allegations: "And by reason of the malicious, forcible, oppressive, and unlawful acts of defendants towards plaintiff, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of one hundred dollars," and allegations charging defendants with "tearing down fences and buildings where the barley was situated," and having "maliciously, forcibly, and unlawfully entered upon the premises of plaintiff." These allegations all point to the gravamen of the complaint, which was that defendants "took and carried away said thirteen hundred and eighty-eight sacks of whole barley, and converted and disposed of the same to their own use and benefit." The evident purpose of the pleader was to bring the case within section 3294, Civ. Code, which allows exemplary damages "where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud or malice, actual or presumed," etc. There may be some ambiguity and uncertainty in the pleading as to whether the malice and force alleged related exclusively to the manner of taking the barley, but we have seen that defendants were not for this reason misled to their prejudice.

2. It is claimed that the evidence does act sustain the verdict. To determine the question we cannot look where the preponderance of the evidence lies, nor can we accept or reject the evidence of this or that witness, as the jury had the right to do. We can only search to find sufficient evidence to support the verdict upon the questions of fact submitted to the jury. It appears that on August 26, 1893, said T. J. Kirkpatrick was farming sections 1, 2, 11, 12, and 24, township 22 N., range 4 W., in Glenn county. Being indebted to defendants Hochheimer & Co. in the sum of $1,182.68, he gave them a crop mortgage on the crops growing and to be grown on sections 11 and 24 for the crop season of 1893 and 1894. The barley in question was harvested in July, 1894. Plaintiff testified that about July 4, 1894, he entered upon negotiations with Kirkpatrick, who was his father-in-law, for the lease of the land being farmed by the latter; and plaintiff began moving his furniture to the place, and his family occupied the premises on the 9th. His father-in-law and family still occupied the house with plaintiff, and continued to do so. He testified further that the bargain for the lease was made early in July, but was not put in writing until July 24th. He had been in possession before that date, but took possession under the written lease July 24th. The lease does not appear in evidence. On that date Kirkpatrick made a written bill of sale to plaintiff of some farming implements, 900 sacks of barley, and 60 tons of hay in barn, "all situated on the ranch known as the 'Kirkpatrick Ranch,' near Orland, Glenn county" (the land above described). He gave two notes to Kirkpatrick,—one for the lease and one for the personal property,—and these notes, he testified, he afterwards paid. It appears from the evidence of E. C. Kirkpatrick, son of T. J., that he (witness) hauled the barley in question from the field to the granaries on the ranch, whence it was taken by defendants; that he hauled 1,518 sacks to these bins, part of which was put in loose and part in sacks; that he assisted in hauling 130 or 140 sacks of this barley to Chico on July 23d. When this barley was taken out he "nailed the granaries up," and there remained in the bins all the barley, less 130 sacks. When he returned from Chico in the afternoon of the 24th, the barley was in the same condition as he left it. The dwelling and granaries were on section 12. He testified that sections 11 and 24 (the mortgaged land) produced 512 sacks, and the other sections 1,518 sacks; that he delivered all the barley grown on sections 11 and 24 to Hochheimer & Co., and there were but 512 sacks of it; that there was no barley hauled to the granaries from sections 11 and 24. The evidence tends to show that under the personal direction of defendant Golden, one of the members of Hochheimer & Co., defendants went with several large freighting teams to where this barley was stored, on July 25th, with the purpose of hauling it away, and while attempting to do so the wife of plaintiff—plaintiff being absent at Sacramento—told Golden the barley belonged to plaintiff, and forbade his taking it. Upon his persisting, which he did by causing the loose barley to be sacked and the wagons loaded, plaintiff's wife secured warrants for the arrest of the entire party, and they were arrested. She had the barley put back in the granaries, and the teams taken out to the public road. The party, however, were all released, and returned to remove the barley, and were a second time arrested, and a second time returned, and this time hauled away the barley. The evidence tended to show that 803 sacks were delivered to Hochheimer & Co. at their Orland warehouse, and 271 sacks were delivered to them at Greenwood Switch, or at their Germantown warehouse, of all of which plaintiff succeeded in recovering 803 sacks, and no more. The jury gave a verdict for 97 sacks of barley, which, added to the 803 previously recovered, make 900 sacks, the number mentioned in the bill of sale. There was ample evidence to show at least this many sacks taken by defendants in addition to the 803 sacks. The jury found plaintiff entitled to $163.37 expended in the pursuit of the 803 sacks. Plaintiff testified upon this point that he paid out $15 for keeper's fees in Orland; $40 for the rent of a building to which he moved the barley, and $15 for cost of moving it; $50 to haul the barley back to the ranch; and for seven different trips to Willows and expenses, $30. He testified that he spent 10 or 15 days "in looking up this eight hundred and three sacks of barley," and he valued his time and expenses at $5 per day. The jury allowed $34.20 for time and money expended in the pursuit of the 585 sacks, for 97 sacks of which the jury gave a verdict. Plaintiff testified that he spent $20 in money and 15 or 20 days' time in searching for the 585 sacks claimed, and that it was worth $1 a day for a man to take his place and drive a team. We cannot say that the jury were not justified in the conclusion they reached as to these items. The item of $33.75 "for the malicious taking of the barley" finds sufficient support in the evidence, and is authorized under section 3294, Civ. Code. The evidence shows that the barley was taken with considerable display of violence, in the absence of the one who claimed to own it, and against the protest of his wife; that the defendants were twice arrested to prevent their taking the barley, and as often obtained their release and returned to the premises of plaintiff, and finally by force obtained access to the premises and granaries, and worked nearly the entire night of the 26th of July to accomplish their purpose. It may be that defendants thought they had a right to the barley. But they do not justify under any legal process, and were not warranted by any claim of title through their crop mortgage in resorting to so extraordinary a course to obtain possession.

3. Defendants introduced evidence tending to show that sections 11 and 24 produced more barley than 512 sacks, as testified to by E. C. Kirkpatrick, and it is claimed that this evidence tended to show that some of the mortgaged crop was hauled to the granaries; and was mingled with plaintiff's barley, and hence was involved the rule as to mingled goods, as to which defendants asked several instructions, which were refused. There was no evidence which, as we view it, in any way tended to show that any of the mortgaged barley was removed to the granaries, and the direct evidence of Kirkpatrick was that none went there. As we regard defendants' evidence, it tended to contradict Kirkpatrick, who testified that all the mortgaged barley was delivered to defendants, but it did not tend to show that any of it was hauled to the granaries, and therefore it was not error to refuse instructions as to the doctrine relating to commingling goods. There was no evidence calling for instructions upon that subject.

4. The correctness of several instructions given by the court is challenged.

(a) The court instructed the jury as follows: "In estimating the damages sustained by the plaintiff, you will find the value of the property at the time of the conversion as shown by the evidence," etc. The objection is that, using the term "the property," the instruction included "property not sued for as well as property sued for." We suppose defendants refer to the 803 sacks of barley recovered before this suit was brought. The action was for the conversion of all the barley, a part of which had already been found and taken back. As to this latter the only relief sought was for money expended in its pursuit. The instruction could not have misled the jury into believing that a verdict for the value of any part of the 803 sacks could be recovered.

(b) The jury were instructed that if they should find from the evidence that the barley was taken from plaintiff by defendants, "and that such taking was malicious and unlawful and fraudulent, or was malicious or unlawful or fraudulent, that you may find for the plaintiff damages * * * by way of punishment to the defendants for their malicious and unlawful acts." The objection is that the jury were told they might award exemplary damages if they found the taking to have been unlawful. We think the instruction was erroneous. Yerian v. Linkletter, 80 Cal. 135, 22 Pac. 70. But the jury found specially that plaintiff was damaged "in the sum of thirty-three dollars and seventy-five cents for the malicious taking of the barley." It thus appears that the instruction, though erroneous, did not mislead the jury, and was without injury. There was evidence justifying the verdict that the taking was malicious.

(c) An instruction was given that plaintiff was entitled to recover for time and money expended in the pursuit of the 803 sacks of barley. The objection is that this barley had already been recovered, and plaintiff could not have damage in this action for its pursuit. Plaintiff claims under section 3336, Civ. Code, which provides that "the detriment caused by the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be: * * * (2) A fair compensation for the time and money properly expended in pursuit of the property." The complaint shows that defendants originally took this 803 sacks with the other barley, and, although the complaint also shows that plaintiff recovered the 803 sacks before this suit was brought, it does allege "that plaintiff has been damaged in time and money properly expended in the pursuit of said eight hundred and three sacks of barley." We can perceive no good reason why plaintiff should be put to his separate action in order to recover this damage. If he had not succeeded in getting possession of this portion of the barley, and had included it in the complaint as converted, he clearly could have recovered the damage given by the statute. All the barley was taken at the same time, and the acts complained of constituted one and the same wrong. The damage to plaintiff in time and money expended in pursuit of the property grew out of this wrong. The law gave him his action to recover the property or its value, and also damage for money expended in its pursuit. The remedy to recover possession or the value did not become necessary as to the 803 sacks, but it did become necessary as to the time and money expended to get possession. For this the law affords a remedy, and we think, under the circumstances of this case, it was proper in this action. The reasoning in Arzaga v. Villalba, 85 Cal. 191, 24 Pac. 656, we think, supports this view.

(d) Instruction 7, in effect, declares that, if defendants did the acts complained of and mentioned in the instruction (coming upon the premises, and tearing down fences and tearing down the doors of the granaries), "then they and their agents were mere trespassers, and for such acts are liable to plaintiff in damages." This was erroneous, and, if there had been a general verdict, would call for a reversal of the judgment. But the verdict is special, and clearly shows that no damages were awarded for trespass, and hence defendants were not injured.

(e) Instruction 10 is that defendants admitted in their answer the taking of 1,388 sacks of barley from plaintiff, and instruction 11 is that the answer admitted taking 1,074 sacks of barley in question on July 26th, and that 803 sacks were recovered by plaintiff, and 271 were never returned, and that, if the jury find that plaintiff was the owner of the 271 sacks, they should find in favor of plaintiff for the value thereof. The answer admits the value of the barley to be $1,100, and that defendants took from plaintiff 1,074 sacks. By failure to deny, defendants admitted the return of 803 sacks, and that there were 271 sacks not returned. Conceding that it was not admitted that they took 1,388 sacks, and that the instruction was unwarranted, still the admission covers 174 sacks more than the jury found were not recovered, and defendants were not injured by the instruction.

Error is claimed as resulting from many other instructions given by the court, but it would greatly prolong this opinion to notice them in detail. It may be remarked that the jury, by its special verdict, cured many of the errors complained of, and others involve questions already noticed. We have discovered no error which could have resulted in injury to defendants. Discovering no reversible error, it is advised that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

CULL v. SAN FRANCISCO & FRESNO LAND CO. (S. F. 1,107.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 1, 1899.)

PLEADING—BREACH OF CONTRACT—VALUE OF SERVICES.

A plaintiff cannot recover under a complaint which alleges that defendant employed him to do certain work, the alleged value of which he seeks to recover, where the evidence shows that the work was done by him pursuant to an agreement to farm defendant's land on shares, and that defendant, after he had performed the work, refused to carry out the agreement.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county.

Action by S. T. Cull against the San Francisco & Fresno Land Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appealed. Reversed.

H. H. Welsh, for appellant. Geo. E. Church and W. D. Tupper, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Plaintiff alleged in his complaint that defendant employed him to summer fallow certain land, between 400 and 500 acres in area, and to plow and sow in wheat another parcel of 80 acres; both tracts being the property of defendant. He prayed judgment for the alleged value of such services. By its answer, defendant denied that plaintiff did any of said work under its employment.

As nearly as we can ascertain from the evidence in the record the following facts appeared at the trial, without conflict: For several years next prior to and including the cropping season of 1895-96 plaintiff farmed, "on shares," it seems, a tract of some 2,000 acres of land owned by defendant, which included the parcel of 80 acres last mentioned in the complaint. In February, 1896, he entered into an agreement with defendant whereby he undertook to summer fallow the 400 acres and upward, first described in his complaint, lying outside of the tract he had previously farmed, and defendant agreed to advance certain cash towards paying the wages of men and for the feed of teams to be engaged in the work. Other conditions of this arrangement were stated in the testimony of plaintiff himself as follows: "I was to do the summer fallowing for my own benefit, and they [meaning the defendant] were to advance me the money to do that summer fallowing. I was to give them one-fifth of the crop. I did this summer fallowing for my own benefit, and with the expectation of receiving my pay entirely from the crop [referring to the crop which he expected to plant on the fallowed ground in the fall of 1896].” He further testified that he accordingly fallowed the outside land, completing the work in April, 1896; that the defendant advanced for the expenses thereof certain cash, which subsequently he repaid; that the plowing and seeding of the 80-acre parcel was done by him in September, 1896, “under a renting, * * * providing I farmed the land and planted the seed, I was to receive a certain part of the crop, * * * three-fourths, and one-fourth would be the property of” the defendant. It further appeared that in October following plaintiff and defendant had some dispute, and in consequence plaintiff declared his intention to abandon the lands, or the greater part thereof, he had previously farmed, but refused to surrender possession, except on terms to which defendant would not agree. He claimed, however, the right to retain and seed the summer-fallowed land in any event. Defendant then brought an action against him, and in December, 1896, obtained judgment therein for possession of all the land, including the fallowing of the previous spring. On January 12, 1897, this action was begun. Plaintiff recovered a verdict and judgment, and defendant appeals.

The cause of action alleged in the complaint was not sustained by any evidence. Allowing that the action brought by defendant to recover possession of all the land, and the judgment obtained in that case, was a violation of defendant's agreement relative to the summer fallowing, yet what was the obligation violated? At most, only a contract for the cropping of land on shares where the owner agreed to contribute to the joint adventure the use of his land. There is no element of a contract of employment in it. Defendant had no direction of the time or the manner or the means of doing the work, it advanced some money to plaintiff in furtherance of the mutual design, but this is shown to have been merely a loan, and is a false quantity in the case. It was not defendant's crop—at least not defendant's crop solely—which was to be grown on the fallowed land. In plaintiff's view, he fallowed the ground “for his own benefit.” The subsequent wrongful refusal of defendant to allow him to proceed with the contract—if there was such refusal—gave him the right to recover the value of the contract at the time of breach, which might have been more or less than the value of the labor he had performed. As remarked in a case of the same character, “If the plaintiff was not a servant or employé of the defendant by the terms of the contract, he does not become such by the breach thereof.” Bowers v. Graves & Vinton Co., 8 S. D. 385, 66 N. W. 931. To somewhat similar effect is Walls v. Preston, 25 Cal. 59. See, also, on the subject of damages, Taylor v. Bradley, 39 N. Y. 129; Dickinson v. Hart, 142 N. Y. 183, 36 N. E. 801.

Plaintiff's case is in no better position as concerns the 80 acres which he plowed and seeded,—perhaps not as good. He seems to have done this work for his own purposes either as a tenant of the land or in expectation of renewing his previous tenancy, and afterwards declined to proceed on that footing. Whether this declination was with or without sufficient cause, a matter which cannot be determined from the record, there is yet no evidence from which to infer a contract of employment between him and defendant for the doing of the work. The judgment and order denying a new trial should be reversed, with leave to plaintiff to amend his complaint, should he be so advised.

We concur: GRAY, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, with leave to plaintiff to amend his complaint, if he be so advised.

NICHOLSON v. TARPEY et al. (S. F. 329.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 19, 1899.)

REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS—LOST DEEDS —PROOF OF CONTENTS—DECLARATIONS OF GRANTOR—FRAUD—LIMITATIONS.

1. In a suit for specific performance of a land contract, involving the reformation of the description in a lost deed, its contents cannot be shown by declarations of the grantor made after execution, as to what land he had conveyed.

2. A grantee sent his wife with a deed to a lawyer to examine it carefully, and ascertain what land was described in it. The lawyer testified that the wife showed him the deed, saying that there was a controversy between her husband and the grantor as to certain land, and the deed contained a description of it, and that they had it surveyed, and there was less than stated therein. The grantee had returned the land to the tax assessor according to the survey. Held, that the grantee could not claim, in a suit to reform the deed for fraud, that he did not learn that the deed conveyed less land than stated therein until just before the suit, and thus avoid the bar of limitations.

3. The fact that one seeking to enforce specific performance of a land contract which included more land than was conveyed has been in continuous possession of the land does not prevent the bar of limitations.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county.

Suit by Murdock Nicholson against Winifred C. Tarpey and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

D. M. Delmas, for appellants. H. V. Morehouse and H. D. Tuttle, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This is the third appeal of this case. The undisputed facts are these: In 1867, Matthew Tarpey was in possession and claimed to be the owner of the Carneros rancho, in Monterey county, near the town of Watsonville, consisting of 4,400 acres. Murdock Nicholson was at the time living in San Francisco. In May or June of that year Nicholson came to Watsonville with a view of finding and buying some desirable piece of land. After some negotiations, an understanding was reached between the parties, whereby Nicholson was to purchase for $1,500 a piece of the rancho, which both parties assumed to contain about 400 acres. The conveyance was to be executed upon completion of the payment. The tract lay in the northeast corner of the rancho, fronting on the south side of the public road leading from Watsonville to San Juan. About 150 acres, more or less, adjoining the road, was susceptible to cultivation. After the agreement to purchase, Nicholson returned to San Francisco, leaving the land purchased in charge of Tarpey, who agreed to take care of it and see to the payment of the taxes. Under this arrangement, Tarpey for four years, from 1867 to 1871, looked after the property. He yearly returned to the assessor 400 acres of the land to be listed to Nicholson, and 4,000 acres, consisting of the remainder of the rancho, to himself. In 1868, Nicholson having completed the stipulated payment, Tarpey delivered to him a deed, which he represented to be in conformity with the agreement, and which was accepted as such by Nicholson. The instrument was at once sent to Monterey county, where it was recorded. In February, 1872, Nicholson, with his family, moved down and built a home upon the arable tract adjoining the public road. He at once caused a survey to be made, and ascertained the location of the lines of his deed upon the ground, and found that the description, instead of covering 400 acres, as supposed, included something less than 200. Tarpey owned and was occupying the land all around him, and the relation of the two parties seems to have remained friendly as before. Immediately after making the discovery that the land fell short of what was supposed, Nicholson gave in 200 acres for the purpose of assessment, instead of 400 theretofore given by his agent, Tarpey, and thereafter he gave in 200 acres as the land belonging to him. In 1872, when Nicholson first gave in the land belonging to him as 200 acres, it seems to have occurred to the assessor that the 200 additional acres theretofore assessed to him should be put on Tarpey's assessment, as the latter was still the owner of the rest of the rancho. He accordingly called Tarpey's attention to the matter, who replied: "Well, the land has been surveyed, and, of course, you can put that on my assessment,—the two hundred acres. You can add it to my assessment." Accordingly, from that time on, Nicholson was assessed for 200 acres, and Tarpey for 4,200 acres. Tarpey died in 1873. Thenceforth, until the spring of 1879, the land outside the tract covered by the deed "remained uncultivated, unimproved, and uninclosed, * * * open to the cattle grazing on the adjoining lands, and the cattle from the adjoining lands, including the cattle of Matthew Tarpey during his lifetime, and after his death of the defendants in this action, frequently roamed and grazed upon the said uninclosed portion." In 1879, Nicholson fenced in the land outside of his deed, and which is claimed in the action to have been included in this agreement of purchase, and in March, 1880, brought this action against the widow and children of Matthew Tarpey. The action is for specific performance of the alleged agreement between the plaintiff and Matthew Tarpey, and which it is alleged the deed of conveyance of 1868 failed to fully perform, in reference to the quantity of the land to be conveyed.

On the first appeal (70 Cal. 608, 12 Pac. 778), the judgment was reversed on the ground of error in the admission of testimony on the part of the plaintiff as to what he told the assessor when he gave in the property for assessment. On the second appeal (89 Cal. 617, 26 Pac. 1101), the judgment on the second trial was reversed on the ground also of error in the admission of testimony in reference to a conversation between the parties at the time of entering into the agreement, which was offered and received for the purpose of proving the contents of said agreement. On this appeal, the first point made by the appellant is that the court below erred in the admission of testimony which seems to have been offered for a similar purpose to that referred to on the second appeal. On the trial the plaintiff asked the witness Gilkey the following: "Q. Did you in June, 1867, have a conversation with Matthew Tarpey, in which he said he had made a sale of the land in controversy to the plaintiff? and, if so, state what that conversation was." After objection being properly made and noted on the part of the defendants, plaintiff's counsel stated that he offered to prove by the witness, as tending to prove the agreement between Nicholson and Tarpey, as set out in the complaint, that he had a conversation with Tarpey in June, 1867, in which Tarpey stated to him that he had sold the land to Nicholson, pointing out the boundaries substantially as stated in the complaint. Thereupon the court overruled defendants' objection, and admitted the testimony. The witness said that he was talking to Tarpey about buying a piece of land, and Tarpey replied: "I have sold that piece of land already to a man in San Francisco,"—describing the land, and saying that it was some 600 or 800 acres, but that the greater part of it was not worth anything. Thereupon the defendants moved to strike out the testimony upon the grounds stated in the objection, and also that it appeared from the answer that it would shed no light whatever upon the contents of the writing between Nicholson and Tarpey, referred to in the complaint, nor upon the terms of the agreement for the sale of the land mentioned in the complaint. The motion was denied, and exception duly taken. On the former appeal this court used the following language in reference to the testimony then offered, which was held to be erroneously admitted: "The material question was as to the language of the written contract. Whether lost or not, there could be no evidence, in the absence of mistake or fraud, of the intention of the parties, other than the written instrument itself. The rights of the parties must be ascertained from its terms. Code Civ. Proc. § 1856. The Code expressly provides, in case of lost instruments, for oral evidence of its contents. Code Civ. Proc. § 1855; Id. § 1870, subd. 14. Evidence of the character received in this case imposes upon the court the construction of the contract by the witness. In U. S. v. Britton, 2 Mason, 464, Fed. Cas. No. 14,650, Justice Story remarked: 'If no such copy exists, the contents may be proved by parol evidence by witnesses who have seen and read it, and can speak pointedly and clearly to its tenor and contents.'" The same rule which declares incompetent the statements of one of the contracting parties made before or contemporaneously with the execution of the written agreement equally declares incompetent his declarations made after such execution. The reason in both cases is the same. In neither are the declarations evidence of the contents of the paper, the only thing which, the paper lost or at hand, the law allows to be proven. The rule that no contract for the sale of land is valid unless embodied in a writing signed by the party to be charged has, since its promulgation in the reign of Charles II., been adopted and embodied in the jurisprudence of every English speaking community. Greenleaf says: "All oral testimony of a previous colloquium between the parties, or of conversation or declaration at the time when it was completed or afterwards, as it would tend in many instances to substitute a new and different contract for the one which was really agreed upon, to the prejudice, possibly, of one of the parties, is rejected." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 275. In Edwards v. Noyes, 65 N. Y. 127, it is said: "Parol evidence to establish the contents of a lost deed should be clear and certain. It should show that the deed was properly executed, with the formalities required by law. It should show all the contents of the deed, not literally, but substantially. If anything less than these requirements would suffice, evil practices, which it was the object of the statute of frauds to prevent, would be encouraged." The testimony of the witness Gilkey did not purport to give the contents of the written agreement, and did not show that he had ever seen the written agreement between Tarpey and the plaintiff, or read it or heard it read. It is simply the expression of Tarpey that he had sold a part of his rancho to a man in San Francisco, without even giving the name of the man to whom he had sold it. Under well-settled rules, the testimony was clearly inadmissible.

Appellants also rely upon the statute of limitations as a bar to the action. The gravamen of the complaint is the fraud alleged to have been practiced by Tarpey upon the plaintiff in 1868 by imposing upon him, by means of premeditated deception, a deed which was intended and accepted as a fulfillment of the contract, but which in fact did not cover one-quarter of the land therein described. As the action was not brought until 12 years afterwards (1880), the plaintiff seeks to avoid the plea of the statute of limitations by averring that he did not discover the fraud until just before the beginning of the action. He says in his complaint "that the plaintiff was wholly unsuspecting of any attempt or design on the part of the said Matthew Tarpey to deceive or defraud him, and implicitly relied on his statements and representations, and, he himself being unable to read said deed, the same was laid away and unthought of until said month of April, 1879"; and that "in the latter part of said month of April, 1879, or in the following month of May, he was for the first time informed and advised that his said deed from the said Matthew Tarpey did not include or embrace within its calls the whole of the lands * * * which the said Matthew Tarpey had agreed to convey to him," * * * but that the same included or described only 191.14 acres; * * * that up to that time last aforesaid he had never thought, believed, or suspected that said deed described a less, other, or different parcel of land from that herein first above described." These averments are made by the plaintiff under oath, yet in his testimony on the trial he is compelled to admit that in 1873 he directed his wife to "take the deed to Mr. Craig's [a lawyer's] office," and adds: "I wanted him to look if this land was specified in the deed that I have got from Tarpey. I wanted my wife to ascertain what land was described within the boundaries of my deed,—to examine it carefully. My wife could not find Mr. Craig, so she went to Mr. Barham's office." And he further admits, on such examination in court, that after he came to live upon the land, in February, 1872, he gave in the property to the assessor for assessment, and the assessor's testimony and the assessment itself shows that he gave in 200 acres, and no more, as already shown. Mr. Barham, to whom, by direction of the plaintiff, his wife went for advice, testified that, after showing him the deed, she said "there was a controversy between herself or her husband and Mr. Tarpey about certain land, and that paper contained a description * * * of the land." She stated during the course of the conversation that Mr. Tarpey had sold them or conveyed to them 200 acres of land. The assessor testifies that the wife told him that they "had it [the land described in the deed] surveyed, and there was less than 200 acres." In fact, the court is obliged to find from the testimony at the trial, in the face of the averments in the complaint sworn to by the plaintiff, that "as early as the beginning of the year 1872 said Nicholson ascertained and knew that the description contained in said conveyance did not include all the land described in said agreement, and did not comprise more than 200 acres thereof, and knew the location on the ground of the lines and boundaries described in said conveyance." It is clear, therefore, that the plaintiff knew as well, in 1872 or 1873, all of the alleged facts and circumstances connected with the transaction upon which the alleged fraud and misrepresentation are based, as at the time of beginning the suit.

It is claimed, however, on the part of the respondent, that the statute of limitations is not properly pleaded. The following is the portion of the answer containing the pleading: "And these defendants aver and say that the said pretended cause and causes of action of the plaintiff are each and all thereof barred by section 337, c. 3, tit. 2, pt. 2, Code Civ. Proc. Cal., and also by section 343 of same chapter and title and part of said Code of Civil Procedure, and also by section 319 of chapter 2 of said title and Code." Our Code of Civil Procedure changes the old rule in reference to pleading the statute of limitations. It is as follows: "In pleading the statute of limitations it is not necessary to state the facts showing the defense, but it may be stated generally that the cause of action is barred by the provisions of section — (giving the number of the section and subdivision thereof, if it is so divided, relied upon) of the Code of Civil Procedure." Code Civ. Proc. § 458. The plea of the statute in this case is according to the requirements of the Code, and is sufficient. Hageley v. Hageley, 68 Cal. 348, 9 Pac. 305; Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 598, 14 Pac. 379; Webber v. Clarke, 74 Cal. 11, 15 Pac. 431.

But inasmuch as the court found that the plaintiff had, since 1871, exclusively occupied and possessed the premises described in the written agreement, it is contended by the respondent that the statute of limitations does not apply. This, however, is not an action based upon the right of possession, or to recover possession, but its purpose is to obtain the legal title to the premises in controversy by enforcing the alleged written agreement between Tarpey and the plaintiff,—in other words, the specific performance of said alleged contract; and therefore the possession of the plaintiff, if it were a fact, would not avail to defeat the bar of the statute in the present action. This case is one, as shown by the testimony and all the surrounding circumstances, where it is justifiable to invoke and apply the bar of the statute of limitations, if ever. Under the old rule, the testimony of an interested party was not received, but now all parties, with certain exceptions, are allowed to give testimony, the credibility of such testimony to be left to the court or jury. One of the excepted cases is that "parties or assignors of parties to an action or proceeding, or persons in whose behalf an action or proceeding is prosecuted, against an executor or administrator, upon a claim or demand against the estate of a deceased person, as to any matter of fact occurring before the death of such deceased person," cannot be witnesses. Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3. To escape this wholesome provision of the law, the action in this case is not against the estate of the deceased, Tarpey, but it is against those who succeeded to his title and estate after the settlement and distribution of said estate. It gives the plaintiff full sweep to testify,—and the character of his testimony has already been noticed,—whereas the other party to the contract had been dead some seven years before the action was commenced.

The plea of the statute set up in the answer presented an issue upon which the court should have found, and the failure to so find is assigned as error, and now urged by the appellant. As already stated, the court finds that since 1871 the plaintiff has been in the actual and exclusive possession, adverse to all the world, of the premises in controversy, whereas the record shows that "it was proved by competent testimony that the piece of land stated in the complaint herein to have been described in the agreement alleged in the complaint to have been executed in June, 1867," was located as already stated, and that, outside of the inclosed part of about 200 acres, the rest was "rough, uncleared, uncultivated, and unimproved, consisting mostly of dense chapparel hills, with a few grassy canyons, and a little timber; that this part of the land remained uncleared, uncultivated, unimproved, and uninclosed up to March, 1879; that during the whole of this time, to wit, from 1867 to 1879, this uninclosed portion of said tract was open to the cattle grazing on adjoining lands, and the cattle from the adjoining lands, including the cattle of Matthew Tarpey during his life, and after his death of the defendants in this action, frequently roamed over and grazed upon the said uninclosed portion; that no other use was made of this uninclosed portion, except for grazing purposes, except that the plaintiff cut wood therefrom." The court finds that Tarpey was the owner in fee of the Rancho las Carneros at the time of entering into the contract. The pleadings admitted and conceded that Tarpey was the owner of only seven-eighths of the rancho, and the respondents' counsel concedes that these admissions are according to the fact, and that the finding in this respect is erroneous; but he suggests that, if the judgment is sustained in all other particulars, the court below be directed to amend its decree accordingly, instead of ordering a new trial. For the reasons, however, given in reference to other parts of the case, the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

LAMPE v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 982.)¹(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1899.)
CITIES—STREET GRADING—SURFACE WATER—DAMAGES.

A city is not liable for damages caused by the obstruction of the flow of surface waters from land abutting on a street, occasioned by the necessary and lawful grading of the street.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Charles Lampe against the city and county of San Francisco. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. M. Osmont and Frank J. French, for appellant. Harry T. Cresswell, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Action to recover damages from defendant. Demurrer sustained to complaint. Plaintiff declined to amend, and judgment was entered for defendant. This appeal is from the judgment. The complaint, after alleging that defendant is a municipal corporation, states that defendant in accordance with law established the official grade of Sanchez street, between Liberty and Twenty-First streets, and thereafter proceeded to fill in and raise said Sanchez street about five feet above its natural and original grade, and about five feet above the natural level of plaintiff's lot, thus causing an embankment about five feet high in front of the lot of plaintiff. It is stated in said complaint: "That, by reason of said embankment so raised in said street, the natural flow of the surface and other waters from plaintiff's lot is impeded, and the waters from the premises above and adjoining plaintiff's said premises flow upon plaintiff's aforesaid lot; that by reason thereof the basement of plaintiff's said dwelling has become and remains damp and unwholesome, and the water does not flow off as freely as it had done prior to the grading of said street, but accumulates on plaintiff's said lot, and the healthfulness and comfort of said house and premises as a dwelling has been greatly impaired, to plaintiff's great injury and damage." The complaint further alleges damage by reason of a sewer and foul odors therefrom. The demurrer was upon three grounds: First, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; second, that it is ambiguous, uncertain, etc.; and, third, that there is a misjoinder of causes of action united in the same count, and not separately stated. Counsel for appellant in their brief say that no damage is claimed and no relief is asked on account of the sewer, and that the allegations of the complaint as to the sewer may be treated as surplusage. We will, in discussing the case, adopt this view, and thus the only question left is as to whether or not the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The portion of the complaint before quoted is the material part. As we understand it, damages are claimed because the grading of the street, which is the property of defendant, prevents the surface water from flowing off the lands of the plaintiff and onto the lands of defendant, as it had been wont to flow. The question is as to whether or not defendant is liable for damages caused by the obstruction of the flow of surface waters from the lands of plaintiff, occasioned by the necessary and lawful grading of defendant's street in front of plaintiff's said lands. Upon the solution of this question depends the result as to whether or not this judgment shall be affirmed.

In 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1039, the rule is stated: "As to surface water, quite different principles apply. This the law very largely regards (as Lord Tenterden in an analogous case phrased it) as a common enemy, which every proprietor may fight or get rid of as best he may. The reports contain many instances in which it has been sought to make municipal corporations liable for damages caused in various ways by surface water to private property. Reference will first be made to cases in which the work of grading or improving the streets has been the cause of the injury. Where the damage has resulted solely as a consequence of the proper execution of a legal power by the corporation, it falls within the principles already discussed, and there is no implied liability therefor." Section 1042: "We agree to the doctrine that the municipality is not bound to protect from surface water those who may be so unfortunate as to own property below the level of the street." The authority quoted is supported by a long line of decisions both in this country and in England. Gould, Waters, §§ 263, 269; Clark v. City of Wilmington, 5 Har. (Del.) 243; Waters v. Village of Bay View, 61 Wis. 642, 21 N. W. 811; Lynch v. Mayor, etc., 76 N. Y. 60. It was expressly so held by this court in Corcoran v. City of Benicia, 96 Cal. 1, 30 Pac. 798; Los Angeles Cemetery Ass'n v. City of Los Angeles, 103 Cal. 467, 37 Pac. 375. In the latter case it is said: "The doctrine of the civil law, in reference to a servitude in the lower tenement in favor of the upper or dominant tenement, for the flow of surface water, has no application to lots held in cities and towns, where changes and alterations in the surface were essential to the enjoyment of such lots, and this rule has been very generally adopted in this country."

There is in some of the books an apparent exception to the general rule in that class of cases where the surface water, owing to the conformation of the country, has found for itself a definite channel in which it is accustomed to flow, in which class of cases it is said that the municipal corporation in making an embankment while grading its streets should erect a culvert or waterway so as not to obstruct the flow of the surface waters in their well-defined channel; but the case under discussion is not one of that class. Counsel for appellant, with apparent confidence, in their brief say: "That the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action is settled in Stanford v. City and County of San Francisco, 111 Cal. 198, 43 Pac. 605." We have carefully examined that case, and find nothing in it in conflict with what is herein stated. The question in that case was as to whether or not the city was liable for damage caused by the accumulation of surface water which was the necessary consequence of paving the streets. It appeared that by reason of the grading of the street large quantities of surface water accumulated and broke over the curbing, and ran into the basement occupied by the plaintiff. In the opinion, after discussing the principle upon which the city was held liable, it is said: "Nor is this case within that numerous class of cases where it is held with almost entire unanimity that a municipality is not bound to protect from surface water those who may be so unfortunate as to own property below the level of the street." In this case there is no allegation that the grading of the street caused surface waters to accumulate in unusual quantities, and that such surface waters were turned upon the lands of plaintiff. From these views it follows that the judgment should be affirmed, and we so advise.

PACIFIC BANK et al. v. MADERA FRUIT & LAND CO. et al. (Sac. 484.)

RECEIVERS—SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNT—JURISDICTION—DISMISSAL OF ACTION.

After a receiver has been appointed in an action, and he has taken possession of the property, the court is not deprived of jurisdiction to hear and settle his accounts by plaintiff's dismissing the action before issuance of summons or appearance of defendant.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Madera county.

Action by the Pacific Bank and others against the Madera Fruit & Land Company and others. A receiver was appointed, and from an order refusing to dismiss his account and petition for a settlement plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Sawyer & Burnett and Wm. Grant, for appellants. A. Everett Ball, for respondents.

COOPER, C. On January 31, 1894, the plaintiff filed its complaint, and, among other things, asked for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of a large amount of real and personal property. One S. Ephraim was thereupon, and at the request of the plaintiff, appointed receiver of all the property described in the complaint. He gave the proper bond, took the oath, and thereupon took charge of said property as such receiver. Thereafter, on March 6, 1895, before the issuance of any summons or the appearance of any defendant, the plaintiff filed with the clerk a written dismissal of the case, and judgment of dismissal was accordingly entered by the clerk. Thereafter the said receiver filed his account and petition, and asked the court to settle the same, fix his compensation, etc. The plaintiff thereupon made a special appearance, and filed a written motion to dismiss the account and petition of the receiver on the ground that by the judgment of dismissal of the said action the court had lost jurisdiction to settle the account of the receiver. The court overruled the said motion, and proceeded to hear the account of the receiver, and, after hearing evidence, made an order settling the said account. From this order the plaintiff has appealed.

The only question argued or presented on this appeal is as to whether or not, after the plaintiff had dismissed the action, the court had jurisdiction to hear and settle the account of the receiver. The court below held that it had such jurisdiction, and we think its conclusion correct. In Beach, Rec. § 796, the author lays down the rule as follows: "The end of the suit, its final adjudication, gives cause for the discharge of the receiver, but does not, ipso facto, effect his discharge, which results only from an order or decree of court so directing. After the settlement of the suit the receiver must have time and opportunity to prepare and present his accounts, and for the adjustment of the details of the receivership. * * * The dismissal of the action does not discharge the receiver from accountability to the court which appointed him. He is an officer of the court, and subject to its orders in relation to the property placed in his hands as receiver until discharged by the court." The same rule is given by High, Rec. § 833, and is thus stated: "It is to be observed, however, that the abatement of the action, or the entry of final judgment therein, does not have the effect of discharging the receiver ipso facto. And although, as between the parties to the litigation, his functions have terminated with the determination of the suit, he is still amenable to the court as its officer until he has complied with its directions as to the disposal of the funds which he has received during the course of his receivership."

In State v. Gibson, 21 Ark. 140, it appeared that the action was compromised and dismissed during a vacation of the court. It was claimed that, the action being dismissed, the court had no further jurisdiction in the premises. The supreme court said: "But the dismissal of the bill did not discharge the receiver from accountability to the court of chancery from which he received his appointment. He was an officer of the court, and subject to its orders in relation to the partnership effects placed in his hands as receiver."

er until discharged by the court." To the same effect are Ireland v. Nichols, 40 How. Prac. 85; Whiteside v. Prendergast, 2 Barb. Ch. 471. The same practice was followed in the lower court in Garniss v. Superior Court, 88 Cal. 415, 26 Pac. 351, and the practice was not questioned in this court. The only case cited by appellants in regard to receivers is the case of Field v. Jones, 11 Ga. 415; but that case is against the proposition contended for, and directly in line with the authorities cited. The court said: "The bill, by virtue of which Mr. Schley was appointed receiver and came into the possession of this fund, was dismissed upon demurrer, the legal consequence of which was to dispense with the functions of the receiver as a depository of the parties litigant. His duties ceased with the termination of the litigation between the parties, and that ceased when it went out of court upon the demurrer. But his relations to the court of chancery from which he received his appointment did not determine. His amenability to that court as receiver continued. That is to say, he was still an officer of the court. His possession of the fund was the possession of the court." If the court below lost jurisdiction of the case by virtue of the dismissal, so that it could not settle the accounts of the receiver, nor make any disposition of the funds in his hands, how would the account be settled or the funds disposed of? The money on hand and collected by the receiver is, in contemplation of law, in the hands of the court, to be disposed of as the law directs. The expenditures made by the receiver for the preservation of the property, and under the orders of the court and at the request of the parties, should be repaid by some one. If the court in which the receiver was appointed cannot, after the dismissal of the case, settle and adjust the accounts of the receiver, to what jurisdiction will he resort? The dismissal of the case was the end of it as between the parties; but we think the court still retained the power to settle the accounts of its receiver, and to direct the application of the funds in his hands. We advise that the order be affirmed.

Ve concur: HAYNES, C.; BRITT, C.

BEATTIE v. CREWDSON et al. (S. F. 1,631.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 1, 1899.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—NOTICE OF OCCUPANT'S TITLE—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—BURDEN OF PROOF—EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. A purchaser is bound to know who is in possession, and is chargeable with notice of the occupant's title.

2. A purchaser having actual or constructive notice before payment of a third person's title is not a bona fide purchaser.

3. The burden is on a purchaser to show that he did not have notice of a third person's title.

4. Merely to refuse, in an action of ejectment, to permit answers to the questions, what did plaintiff's grantor say when the deed was executed? and what occurred at the time it was delivered? cannot be held error unless it affirmatively appears that the evidence to which the questions related was competent and relevant, and not hearsay.

5. Where a judgment for defendant in ejectment is sustained on other grounds than that of his adverse possession, error in finding that he had paid the taxes on the land during the time he was in possession is harmless.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county.

Ejectment by A. Beattie against G. F. Crewdson and others. From a judgment in favor of defendant Crewdson, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. R. Gale and John T. Campbell, for appellant. T. J. Butts and J. M. Thompson, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Ejectment. The property consists of certain lots in Hewitt's addition to the city of Santa Rosa. Trial by the court without a jury. Defendant Crewdson claimed title to the lots in question, and by way of cross complaint asked to have his title quieted. Defendant Michaels answered that he is not and has not been in possession since June 1, 1897 (the complaint was filed December 7, 1897), and defendant Pollini claims that he occupies the premises as tenant of defendant Crewdson. Judgment was given in favor of Crewdson that he is the owner and entitled to possession, and quieting his title. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for new trial.

The court found the following facts: That one Behmer, in April, 1885, being the owner of the lots, sold the same for full value to defendant Crewdson by deed of conveyance, which said deed was not recorded, and was afterwards lost. Soon after receiving his deed, Crewdson took possession of the property under his deed, and immediately began improving the same, and erected a dwelling thereon, costing $800, which was completed by the first of the year 1886, and he has ever since been in the actual and continuous possession of the premises, and is now in possession of the same. Crewdson has never sold or conveyed said property, or any part thereof, and has paid all taxes levied and assessed upon the property "for the five years next prior to the commencement of the action." Said Behmer had no interest in the property since April, 1885. On May 27, 1893, said Behmer and wife made and delivered their deed to the property to one Julia E. Riley, which was duly recorded, but said Behmers did not then own the property, nor were they in actual possession thereof, but defendant Crewdson was then "in the actual, open, and notorious and exclusive possession of said property, and said Riley at said time had notice of the right, interest, and equities of said Crewdson in and to said premises." There is "no evidence that said Riley paid any valuable consideration for said property, or that she was a bona fide purchaser of said property." It is further found that said Riley deeded the property to one Angelina Hutton, June 26, 1896, and this deed was duly recorded, and that Mrs. Hutton conveyed by deed to plaintiff November 21, 1896, which was duly recorded, and that neither Mrs. Riley nor Mrs. Hutton owned the property at the time, and that Mrs. Hutton and plaintiff had notice of Crewdson's possession of and interest in the lot when they took their deeds, and that Mrs. Hutton paid no value for said premises, and was not a purchaser in good faith, and that there is no evidence that plaintiff was a purchaser in good faith, without notice, or that he ever paid any valuable consideration for said premises.

1. The principal error assigned is that the court adjudged plaintiff's deed to be void because he failed to prove that he was an innocent purchaser, for value, without notice of Crewdson's possession. We are cited to section 1614, Civ. Code, where it is provided that "a written instrument is presumptive evidence of a consideration"; to section 1615, Id., which provides that "the burden of showing want of consideration sufficient to support the instrument lies with the party seeking to invalidate it"; and to section 1214, Id., which provides that "every conveyance of real property is void as against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee * * * in good faith and for a valuable consideration whose conveyance is first recorded,"—citing also numerous cases from our reports. But section 1217 of the Civil Code declares that "an unrecorded instrument is valid as between the parties and those having notice thereof." One who purchases real estate is bound to know who is in possession thereof, and is chargeable with notice of the occupant's title (Scheerer v. Cuddy, 85 Cal. 270, 24 Pac. 713); and if he had notice, actual or constructive, at any moment of time before the payment of the money, he is not a bona fide purchaser (Eversdon v. Mayhew, 65 Cal. 163, 3 Pac. 641), and the burden is upon such purchaser to show that he had not such notice (Wilhoit v. Lyons, 98 Cal. 409, 33 Pac. 325).

2. But it is claimed that the findings as to defendant's purchase, improvements, possession, and payment of taxes above stated are unsupported by the evidence. The evidence tends to show that defendant Crewdson received a deed to the property from Behmer, as found by the court, and that he went into possession under the deed, and improved the property, and has ever since, except at short intervals, occupied the premises by himself, or members of his family, or by tenants. At the time Behmer's deed was delivered to Crewdson another deed of the property from Behmer's sister to Behmer was also delivered to Crewdson. This latter deed was recorded, but for some reason the former deed was not. Crewdson took it to his home, and put it away in a bureau drawer. He did not discover its loss until about the time this action was brought, and he has not been able to find it upon search made. He had no actual notice of any of the deeds to plaintiff, and did not know that he or any other person made any claim to the property, until shortly before this suit was brought. Plaintiff introduced in evidence a deed from Behmer and wife to Mrs. Riley, dated May 27, 1893; also deed from Mrs. Riley to Mrs. Hutton, dated June 26, 1896; also deed from Mrs. Hutton to plaintiff, dated November 31, 1896. Mrs. Riley was Mrs. Hutton's mother, and Mrs. Hutton, prior to March 25, 1895, was Crewdson's wife. On August 1, 1890, while Mrs. Hutton was wife of Crewdson, she made a deed of the lots to Mrs. Riley without the knowledge of Crewdson, and without consideration. Mrs. Riley then made a mortgage of the lots to plaintiff to secure a loan of $250 to Mrs. Riley. Afterwards plaintiff (May 27, 1893) procured the deed to be made from Behmer to Mrs. Riley. After Mrs. Hutton was divorced from Crewdson, Mrs. Riley, without consideration, deeded the property to Mrs. Hutton, and on the same day Mrs. Hutton deeded it to plaintiff, and the deeds were recorded at the same time. Crewdson knew nothing of these various transactions. Mrs. Hutton testified that she never owned the lots, and never had any interest in them; that she never received anything or paid anything for them; that she conveyed them to her mother with the understanding that her mother would reconvey them to her. Plaintiff also introduced a deed from one McCann to himself, dated July 26, 1897, to two of the lots. McCann held certain tax deeds to these lots, given for delinquent taxes for the years 1889, 1890, and 1891. Plaintiff bought this title from McCann shortly before suit brought. For eight or nine years previous to this suit plaintiff lived in a neighboring town about seven miles distant from Santa Rosa. The circumstances surrounding all these transactions, as disclosed by the evidence, show that he knew, and, if he did not, that he had ample means of knowing, that Crewdson was in possession and claiming ownership of these lots; and at no time while on the witness stand did he disclaim knowledge of Crewdson's rights, and he admitted that he paid no consideration to Mrs. Hutton. He claims, however, that he indirectly paid a consideration by reason of the loan of money to Mrs. Riley, but there is no evidence that he has canceled the mortgage given by her, and, besides, it appears that he had the same notice of Crewdson's claim when he took the mortgage that he had when he took the deed from Mrs. Hutton. He did not undertake to get possession or ask for it until six months after Mrs. Hutton deeded the lots to him, and his conduct throughout the transactions with which he was connected points strongly to the conclusion that he was endeavoring to get a paper title with a view to defeat Crewdson's claim.

3. Certain errors of law occurring at the trial are assigned. When plaintiff testified, he explained how he came to take the deed from Mrs. Hutton, and, after stating that she said "she would sooner give me a deed than to have me foreclose," he was about to state what further she said at that time, whereupon defendant's objection on the ground of incompetency, and that the evidence was hearsay, was sustained. We cannot say, from anything the record discloses, that this was error. If plaintiff had stated what he wished to prove, it is possible that its relevancy and competency would have appeared. Merely to refuse an answer to the question, "What did she say?" cannot be held error without the record showing affirmatively that the evidence was competent and relevant, and not hearsay. The same may be said of the alleged error in refusing to allow the witness Mrs. Beattie (plaintiff's wife) to answer the question, "What occurred at the time of the delivery of these deeds, if you know?" referring to the deed of Mrs. Riley to Mrs. Hutton and the deed of Mrs. Hutton to plaintiff. It is claimed that the evidence does not sustain the finding that defendant Crewdson paid the taxes assessed on the property for five years immediately preceding the action. There is some evidence tending to show payment of taxes by him during this period. It is rebutted as to the year 1895 by a certificate of tax sale dated June 28, 1896, showing sale to the state for nonpayment of taxes, indorsed, "Redeemed Nov. 14, 1896, by A. Beattie." Defendant objected to the introduction of this certificate as incompetent and irrelevant. No proof was offered of the official position of the person purporting to have issued the certificate, or of any other fact as to its issuance. It was not authenticated in any way, and plaintiff did not testify that he paid any money for redemption. The judgment is sustained upon grounds other than the adverse possession of Crewdson, as already shown, and, if the finding referred to was not supported, it was error without injury.

It is not necessary to consider the claim that the court erroneously held the tax deeds of McCann to be void. Plaintiff obtained that title with notice of Crewdson's claim of title and possession. Plaintiff could not strengthen his position in this way, and, as to Crewdson, it was proper to hold the McCann deeds to be void. Furthermore, these deeds were not printed in the record, and the court may have found in them some fatal defects of which we have here no knowledge.

Numerous other assignments of error are made, but upon examination they appear to depend more or less upon questions already disposed of, and do not call for special notice. It is advised that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WESTLAKE (Cr. 491.)

TAX COLLECTOR—EMBEZZLEMENT—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE—WITNESSES—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

1. Where a tax collector was indicted, under Pen. Code, § 504, for embezzlement in fraudulently misappropriating public money, it was error to instruct that defendant was guilty, if, after receiving public money, he willfully omitted to pay it over to the county treasurer.

2. An instruction plainly erroneous is not cured by a correct instruction in some other part of the charge.

3. In a prosecution of a tax collector for embezzlement, his successor testified that at his first settlement as collector his attention was called to the condition of the retail liquor license book, from which he had procured his retail liquor license. Held, that he could not then be asked what he discovered unusual about the book, since it did not appear that the book was ever in defendant's possession, nor where it had been kept, and that it was in the same condition as when the witness received it.

4. In a prosecution of a tax collector for embezzlement, a deputy testified to issuing liquor licenses to the amount thereof, identified licenses as issued by defendant, and stated what was done in the office with money received for licenses and taxes, and that she issued licenses, as deputy auditor, to defendant during one month; and examined, and expressed her opinion as to, a stub book. Held, that defendant was entitled to cross-examine her in relation to her duties as deputy, and generally as to how the business of the collector's office was conducted.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county.

Charles L. Westlake was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Reversed.

C. F. Lacey and G. A. Dougherty, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Ford, for the People.

COOPER, C. The defendant was indicted by the grand jury of Monterey county for the crime of embezzlement, charged to have been committed by him while tax collector of said county. The charging part of the indictment is: "Did then and there, to wit, on said 7th day of July, 1897, and in the county of Monterey, fraudulently and feloniously, and not in the due and lawful execution of his trust, employment and duty as aforesaid, convert, appropriate, and embezzle the said public moneys to his own use, contrary to the form," etc. The amount of money alleged to have been so embezzled was $371, received between the 1st day of June and the 7th day of July, 1897. Defendant was found guilty as charged, and sentenced to a term of 10 years in the state prison. He made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and order denying his motion.

Pen. Code, § 503, defines embezzlement as follows: "Embezzlement is the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted." Section 504 is as follows: "Every officer of this state, or of any county, city, or town, or other municipal corporation or subdivision thereof, and every deputy, clerk or servant of any such officer, and every officer, director, trustee, clerk, servant or agent of any association, society or corporation (public or private), who fraudulently appropriates to any use or purpose, not in the due and lawful execution of his trust, any property which he has in his possession or under his control by virtue of his trust, or secretes it with a fraudulent intent to appropriate it to such use or purpose, is guilty of embezzlement." The indictment was drawn under section 504. The court, in its instructions to the jury, said, "The defendant is charged with the crime of embezzlement. Section 424 of the Penal Code, under which this prosecution is made, reads as follows," and then proceeded to read all of section 424. Section 424 contains 10 subdivisions in regard to the definition of crime by a public officer, and the portions of the section necessary to be discussed herein are as follows: "Each officer of this state, or of any county, city, town or district of this state, and every other person charged with the receipt, safe keeping, transfer or disbursement of public moneys who either, (1) without authority of law appropriates the same, or any portion thereof, to his own use or to the use of another, or, * * * (10) willfully omits or refuses to pay over to any officer or person authorized by law to receive the same any money received by him under any duty imposed by law so to pay over the same, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one nor more than ten years, and is disqualified from holding any office in this state." The court further in its charge to the jury told them that if, after receiving public money, the defendant "willfully omitted to pay over the same to the county treasurer,—such money, or any part of it,—no matter whether it be the sum named in the indictment or some smaller sum, he is guilty as charged." The court, by reading section 424 to the jury, and by telling them that defendant was being prosecuted under said section, and that, if he willfully omitted to pay over money to the county treasurer, he was guilty as charged, evidently defined embezzlement by a public officer to consist in willfully refusing to pay over public money to the county treasurer after receiving it. We think the instruction and the views given to the jury by the court below erroneous. The defendant, no doubt, could have been prosecuted under section 424, but he was charged under section 504. If the instruction given by the court stated the law correctly, then the willful omission of a public officer of a county to pay over to the county treasurer money which has been received by him in his official capacity is embezzlement. The money might be claimed by the officer as due him for commissions, or under other bona fide claim; and yet, under the instructions of the court, if he willfully refused to pay over the money he would be guilty of embezzlement. The omission to pay over money by a public officer is not necessarily embezzlement. In People v. Carrillo, 54 Cal. 63, the defendant was charged with fraudulently and without authority of law and willfully and feloniously appropriating money to his own use which had come into his possession as tax collector. The court below instructed the jury that if they found the facts to be that defendant received the money, and failed to pay over the same as required by law, this, if unexplained, raised a presumption of felonious appropriation, which would authorize a verdict of guilty. This court held the instruction erroneous, and reversed the case, using this language: "The instruction is clearly erroneous, in that the jury are told that the failure of the prisoner to pay over the money, if unexplained, raises a presumption of a felonious appropriation, which will authorize a verdict of guilty. The alleged felonious appropriation was the ultimate fact to the solution of which the deliberations of the jury were to be addressed. It was the ultimate and important fact to be found by their verdict before judgment of conviction could properly go against the prisoner. To tell them, therefore, that, if they should find some other and merely probative fact, then the principal fact of guilty appropriation was to be reached by mere presumption, was an unwarrantable interference with the functions of the jury." In the case just quoted the judge of the lower court told the jury that the failure to pay over the money raised a presumption of felonious appropriation. In the case at bar the judge told the jury that the willful omission to pay over the money of itself made the defendant guilty as charged. If the judge in this case had told the jury that the willful omission to pay over the money by defendant was sufficient to raise a presumption of his guilt, it would clearly have been error, under the ruling in the case of People v. Carrillo. To tell them that the willful omission to pay over the money was conclusive of his guilt is certainly more injurious to defendant and more clearly erroneous. In the Carrillo Case the presumption was open to explanation, and the judge so told the jury. In the case at bar, under the instruction of the court, there was no room for explanation; and, if the jury found that the defendant willfully omitted to pay over the money, they either had to find the defendant guilty, or disobey a plain mandate of the court.

Defendant could have been indicted under subdivision 10 of section 424 of the Penal Code, and in such case the indictment would have to state that defendant received public money, and refused or omitted to pay the same to an officer authorized by law to receive it, under a duty imposed by law upon him to pay over the same. The indictment in this case contains no allegation as to any one being authorized by law to receive the money, and no allegation as to any duty imposed by law upon defendant to pay over the same. If the willful omission to pay over money to the county treasurer is a crime, under subdivision 10 of section 424, the indictment certainly should have stated that the county treasurer was the person authorized by law to receive the money, and that it was the duty of defendant, under the law, to pay it to the treasurer. The defendant might not have known to whom the money should have been paid. But here we have the defendant charged with embezzlement in fraudulently appropriating money to his own use, and the law given to the jury, that, if he willfully refused to pay the money to the county treasurer, "he is guilty as charged." The instruction is the equivalent of saying to the jury, "If the defendant has willfully omitted to pay the money to the county treasurer, I charge you, as a matter of law, that he is guilty of having fraudulently and feloniously appropriated it to his own use, as charged in the indictment." The statement of the proposition carries with it its own refutation. In People v. Hamilton, 103 Cal. 489, 37 Pac. 629, the defendant was informed against by the district attorney, under section 424 of the Penal Code, for the crime of omitting and refusing to pay over public moneys received by him in his official capacity to his successor. The court in its opinion said: "The gravamen of the charge in the information is that it was the duty of the defendant, imposed by law, to transfer the money in question to his successor in office; that he willfully, fraudulently, and feloniously neglected and refused to pay the same to his successor," etc.,—and then, after discussing the case further, used this language: "Defendant could not, under the information, be convicted for a failure to pay these moneys to the county treasurer for the reasons: (1) He was not charged in the information with any neglect or refusal so to do. * * *" In this case defendant is not charged with any such neglect, refusal, or omission, and yet the jury are told that such omission would make defendant guilty as charged.

It is claimed that, if the instruction given was error, the court gave the law correctly in other parts of its instructions. It is the rule that when a single instruction, standing alone, does not contain all the conditions and limitations which it should, and is thus subject to legal criticism, the giving of it will not be error, if it can be read in connection with other instructions, and thus make all the instructions harmonize as a whole, and if, being read together, supplemented by each other, they all together fairly and correctly state the law; but this rule does not apply when the instruction contains a plain statement of an incorrect principle of law. An instruction plainly erroneous is not cured by a correct instruction in some other part of the charge. People v. Wong Ah Ngow, 54 Cal. 151; People v. Bush, 65 Cal. 129, 3 Pac. 590; People v. Marshall, 112 Cal. 422, 44 Pac. 718.

One Elmer Alexander, who had succeeded the defendant as tax collector of the county August 2, 1897, was called as a witness by the prosecution, and stated that at his first settlement as tax collector his attention was called to the condition of the retail liquor license book from which he had procured his retail liquor license. It will be noted that the witness does not fix the date of making his first settlement. The witness was then asked by the prosecution the following question: "Q. What did you discover about that book unusual?" To this question the defendant objected upon the ground that the question related to a time subsequent to the time the defendant left the office, that there was no proof that the book was in the same condition it was in when defendant left the office, and upon the ground that the book itself is the best evidence. The court overruled the objection, and the witness answered: "There was more stubs than I had received licenses for." We think the objection to this question should have been sustained, and that the answer may have materially injured the defendant before the jury. It is not at all clear what the answer meant, but it is susceptible of such interpretation as would cause the jury to believe that defendant had taken out licenses from the book without accounting for them. It does not appear that the book was ever in the possession of defendant, nor where it had been kept, nor that it was in the same condition as it was in when Alexander first received it. The book might have been in the hands of a dozen different persons after August 2, 1897, and before the witness made his first settlement as tax collector. Where the liberty and rights of a defendant are being tried, the ends of justice are better subserved by rejecting all incompetent or doubtful testimony.

Mrs. Baker, a witness for the prosecution, testified that she was employed in the auditor's office during 1897, while the defendant was tax collector, and that she was familiar with the method of issuing licenses to the tax collector; that between the 1st day of January and the 2d day of August, 1897, she issued to defendant various licenses, amounting in the aggregate to $294; that she was also employed in the tax collector's office (being the office held by defendant) during the whole of his incumbency. The witness identified a large number of licenses as being issued by defendant, and testified that they were in defendant's handwriting. She further testified in her direct examination that, when she issued licenses from the defendant's office, she put the money in the safe, as a rule, but sometimes in the cash drawer; that the tax money was put in the cash drawer; that in the month of May, 1897, she issued licenses from the auditor's office to the tax collector. The witness, after examining a stab book, said that she believed that all the licenses issued were from the book of new-style licenses. The witness on cross-examination testified that she was deputy auditor and deputy tax collector at the same time, and that she went to work in defendant's office about March 1, 1897, and continued there until August 2, 1897. The following questions were asked of the witness by the defendant in cross-examination: "(1) Q. What was the extent of your duties there? (2) Q. What did you do in your capacity as deputy tax collector? (3) Q. During this period of time, from the 1st of March until the 2d of August, 1897, who in the tax collector's office attended to the business of collecting money orders, post-office orders, and such as that? (4) Q. Who besides yourself had the combination of the safe? (5) Q. Did you have the combination of the safe? (6) Q. While you were in charge of the tax collector's office, or employed there as deputy, from the 1st of March until the 2d of August, how often was the cash settled and balanced?" There were several other questions asked, of the same general character, but the above will be sufficient for the purposes of this decision. To each of these questions the prosecution objected upon the ground that it was not proper cross-examination, and the objection was sustained, and to each ruling the defendant excepted. We think the court below confined the cross-examination within too narrow limits. The witness was testifying against the defendant, who was being tried for embezzling public moneys. She had been a deputy in the office, and in charge of many important details in connection with it. It was for the jury to determine whether the defendant was himself the party who had fraudulently appropriated public money. The power of cross-examination is one of the most efficacious tests which is known to the law for the discovery of truth. To deprive the defendant of this right in a proper case, and in regard to material matter, and when the cross-examination is confined within the general scope of the direct examination, is error for which a judgment of conviction should be reversed. It is always proper to cross-examine a witness fully as to all facts and circumstances connected with the matters stated in his direct examination. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 445. This rule, in substance, has been adopted by this court in many cases. In People v. Gallagher, 100 Cal. 476, 35 Pac. 83, the court said, "The right of cross-examination affords the most effective mode of testing the accuracy or credibility of a witness, and should not be restricted beyond the requirements of the statute." In City of Santa Ana v. Harlin, 99 Cal. 545, 34 Pac. 227, the court said, "Great liberality is properly extended in such cross-examinations, and for the purpose of testing the knowledge, judgment, or bias of the witness the liberality is wisely exercised." Applying the above rules, the questions asked appear to us to have been within the general scope and pertaining to the direct examination. We advise that the judgment and order be reversed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

MERCHANTS' AD-SIGN CO. v. STERLING.
(L. A. 588.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 18, 1899.)

CONTRACTS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE—ESTOPPEL.

1. A contract between a stockholder who is active manager of a corporation, and one to whom he sold his stock and the good will of the corporation, restraining the vendor from carrying on a like business, is void, as in restraint of trade.

2. Where a stockholder in a corporation sells the good will of the business, the fact that he received a valuable consideration therefor does not estop him to deny that he had a vendible interest in such good will.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by Merchants' Ad-Sign Company against Thomas M. Sterling. Judgment for defendant sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fuller & Burnett, for appellant. Davis & Rush, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Injunction to restrain defendant from engaging in the business of advertising. It is alleged that plaintiff is a corporation engaged in the business of bill posting and other methods of advertising in the city and county of Los Angeles; that about August 20, 1896, defendant owned 80 shares of the capital stock of plaintiff company, and was actively engaged in the management of plaintiff's said business; that about September 15, 1896, he transferred, without consideration, 60 of said 80 shares to his wife, in trust for himself and his sole use and benefit, and for the purpose of concealing the true ownership of said 60 shares; that on August 12, 1897, he sold, by written contract, for a good and valuable consideration, to one Wilshire, "all his interest, direct and indirect, in the plaintiff, and his interest in the good will of the business of plaintiff, and said defendant in said contract, for a good and valuable consideration to him in hand paid by said Wilshire, agreed to and with said Wilshire that he would not conduct nor assist in the conduct of bill posting in said city of Los Angeles so long as said Wilshire, or any person deriving title to said good will from him, should carry on a like business therein"; that on January 20, 1898, Wilshire transferred the contract of August 12th to plaintiff. The complaint then alleges the formation of the Los Angeles Bill-Posting Company, a corporation, about January 17, 1898, in said city and county, its business in part being similar to that of plaintiff's, and that since said date it has been so engaged; that defendant, in violation of his said agreement, helped to form the Los Angeles Bill-Posting Company, and became a stockholder therein, and conducted and assisted to conduct its business, and is its principal manager, and said company has thereby been enabled to enter, and has so entered, into successful competition with plaintiff in the bill-posting business in said city, and that without the services of defendant said company could not have been able successfully to compete with plaintiff in its said business. Plaintiff seeks damages, and to restrain defendant from conducting, or assisting in conducting, the business of the Los Angeles Bill-Posting Company. A demurrer to the complaint for insufficiency of facts and for ambiguity and uncertainty was sustained, and the court gave judgment for defendant without leave to amend, from which this appeal is prosecuted. Respondent has filed no brief.

The principal question presented by appellant is as to the validity of the contract between defendant and Wilshire. The allegation of the complaint is that defendant sold his interest in the good will of the business of plaintiff corporation, in consideration of which he agreed not to conduct, or assist in conducting, the business of bill posting, in which plaintiff was engaged. There is no allegation that defendant had any interest in such good will, except, as the owner of certain shares of the corporation, it may be so inferred. Section 1673, Civ. Code, reads as follows: "Every contract by which any one is restrained from exercising a lawful profession, trade, or business of any kind, otherwise than is provided by the next two sections, is to that extent void." Section 1674, Id., provides as follows: "One who sells the good will of a business may agree with the buyer to refrain from carrying on a similar business within a specified county, city, or part thereof, so long as the buyer, or any person deriving title to the good will from him carries on a like business therein." Section 992, Id., defines the "good will" of a business to be "the expectation of continued public patronage"; and section 993, Id., says it "is property, transferable like any other property." "One who sells the good will of a business thereby warrants that he will not endeavor to draw off any of the customers." Section 1776, Id. "A partner, as such, has not authority to do any of the following acts, unless his co-partners have wholly abandoned the business to him, or are incapable of acting: * * * (2) To dispose of the good will of the business." Section 2430, Id. But "partners may, upon or in anticipation of a dissolution of the partnership, agree that none of them will carry on a similar business within the same city or town where the partnership business has been transacted, or within a specified part thereof." Section 1675, Id. These constitute all the statutory provisions upon the subject of good will and restraint of trade which bear upon the question.

It is conceded by appellant, what is obviously true, that a stockholder cannot transfer the good will of the corporation. In the case of Waterworks v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69 (at page 118), it was said: "It is contended that good will enters into and forms an element in the value of the shares of stock. No case has been produced to us, nor have we been able to find any, holding, or even intimating, that this is so. We find no such element of value in the least hinted at by any one who has written on the subject, nor has any such been called to our attention. We cannot recognize any such element as giving value to shares in a trading corporation. It would be strange to predicate good will as pertaining to, or extending to, an abstraction, to an 'artificial being, invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law.'" Apparently conceding the correctness of these views, counsel for appellant insist that, "where a stockholder has been actively engaged in the management of the business of the corporation, he surely has the privilege of increasing the vendibility of his stock by being able to agree with the buyer that he will refrain from carrying on a similar business to that heretofore engaged in by himself and the corporation which he managed, of course within the time and territorial limits allowed by the Code." We are cited to the following well-considered and instructive cases, as showing that the statute should be given a liberal construction: Brown v. Kling, 101 Cal. 295, 35 Pac. 995; Carpet Works v. Jones, 102 Cal. 506, 36 Pac. 841; Meyers v. Merillion, 118 Cal. 352, 50 Pac. 662. In the case now before us there seems to be no room for construction. Defendant, as a stockholder, did not and could not transfer the good will of the corporation, assuming, what we do not consider it necessary to decide, that good will, as property, pertains to a corporation. The element of good will, therefore, is not present in the transaction. The statute says that "one who sells the good will of a business may agree," etc.; but the statute also says that "every contract by which one is restrained from exercising a lawful * * * business of any kind, otherwise than is provided by the next two sections [in which the above provision is stated], is to that extent void." Reading the sections 1673 and 1674 together, they may be briefly paraphrased as follows: Every contract by which any one is restrained from exercising a lawful business is to that extent void, except where he has sold the good will of a business, in which case, as to that or similar business, he may agree not to engage therein so long as the buyer carries on a like business, within specified limits. It is not a question whether the holder of shares of a corporation should be permitted to enhance their vendibility by agreeing to abstain from carrying on business similar to that of the corporation, within the limitations prescribed, but it is a question whether such an agreement is not by law declared to be void. We are pointed to Carpet Works v. Jones, supra, where it was said that "the Code introduces no new principles; it simply eliminates from the controversy arising upon such restrictions the question as to what is a reasonable territorial limit." And so we are told that the Code commissioner's note shows that this one question of territorial restriction is the only departure from common-law principles sought to be effected by the Code provisions. We think the Code provision was intended to and in fact went further than is here suggested. In Vulcan Powder Co. v. Hercules Powder Co., 96 Cal. 510, 31 Pac. 581, the rule at common law, even as finally relaxed and applied, was said to be "uncertain, and led to much perplexing legislation, and the law upon the subject in this state is now declared in section 1673 of the Civil Code." Referring to the next two sections, it was said that they merely provide that "one who sells the good will of a business may agree not to carry on a similar business within a specified county or city; and that, in anticipation of a dissolution of a partnership, a partner may agree not to carry on a similar business within the city or county where the partnership business is transacted." These latter sections were held not to apply, because the case did not fall within either one of the exceptions, i. e. being the sale of a business and its good will or a dissolution of a partnership. The case was determined wholly under section 1673. The contract there involved was held to be void as in restraint of trade. The cases cited by appellant from our Reports and other cases not cited, where these sections have been referred to, are cases where the business and good will were sold, and the liberal construction given the sections was in aid of agreements coming within the exceptions of, and permitted to be made by, the Code. It seems to me that the only question here is, as it was in the Vulcan Powder Company Case, was the contract in restraint of trade? The language of the Code is unmistakable: "Every contract by which one [i. e. any person] is restrained from exercising a lawful * * * business of any kind * * * is to that extent void." The allegation is that defendant agreed not to engage in the business of bill posting, which is a lawful business. This was an agreement in restraint of trade, and therefore void.

2. But it is said that defendant, having represented by his conduct that he had such an interest in the business and good will of plaintiff as would support the restraining covenant, and having accepted a valuable consideration therefor, he is now estopped from denying the existence of such interest; citing Potter

v. Ahrens, 110 Cal. 674, 43 Pac. 388. In the case cited the contract purported to dispose of the business and good will of manufacturing and vending certain articles of merchandise. No question arose as to the right of the parties to dispose of the good will. Being clothed with ownership and power to sell, the defendants were clearly estopped to deny their interest in what they purported to sell. In the case here, however, it is conceded that defendant could not dispose of the good will of the corporation. Defendant had no vendible interest in that good will within his disposition, and this the plaintiff must be presumed to have known, and defendant is therefore not estopped. The contract being void as in restraint of trade, and it so appearing from the face of the complaint, the defense is available on demurrer. The maxim, "Ex turpi causa non oritur actio," applies. It is advised that the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LEWIS. (Cr. 488.)¹

HOMICIDE—VERDICT—INSTRUCTION—DEATH HASTENED BY DECEASED—STATEMENTS BY PROSECUTING ATTORNEY—ORDER OF TRIAL.

1. The verdict of a jury in a criminal case, based on conflicting evidence, will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. No exception lies to the refusal of a trial judge to advise the jury to acquit defendant under Pen. Code, § 1118, which provides that the court may, if it deems the evidence insufficient to support a conviction, advise the jury to acquit defendant, but that the jury shall not be bound thereby.

3. Defendant inflicted a mortal wound on the person of deceased by shooting him. After the shooting, and while in great pain, deceased cut his own throat, thereby hastening his death. Held, that if the wound inflicted by defendant contributed, concurrently with the wound inflicted by deceased, to cause death, defendant is guilty of the homicide.

4. A prosecuting attorney, in his opening to the jury, stated that he would prove a certain act contributory to the death of deceased to have been done by defendant. There was no evidence introduced which tended to prove the act. Held, that such statement, if made in good faith, and with intent to attempt its proof, was not an abuse of his position.

5. The remark was not prejudicial, as it tended to raise in the minds of the jury the belief that proof thereof was essential to the prosecution's case.

6. Permitting the calling of a witness by the state, after the defense has closed its case, to testify to matters not prejudicial to defendant, is harmless error.

7. Where it appears that deceased, after he was mortally wounded by defendant, inflicted upon himself a wound which would necessarily cause his death sooner than the wound inflicted by defendant, an instruction that, if it is impossible to tell whether deceased died from the wound inflicted by himself or the one inflicted by defendant, they must acquit defendant, is erroneous, as excluding the theory that both wounds might have concurrently contributed to cause death.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Shasta county.

Frank A. Lewis was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Affirmed.

H. E. Highton and Theo. J. Roche, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Ford, for the People.

TEMPLE, J. The defendant was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial. It is his second appeal. The main facts are stated in the decision of the former appeal. 117 Cal. 186, 48 Pac. 1088. Since, however, it is now claimed that the people failed to overcome the presumption of innocence upon the last trial, it may be noted that the jury, in the proper exercise of their functions, may have found the facts to be much less favorable to the defendant than the statement contained in the opinion on the former appeal. It was within their province to reject some testimony, and to accept such as to them seemed credible. For instance, they may have rationally concluded from the evidence that Lewis did not, in the altercation, say that he did not question the veracity of Farrell, but that, on the other hand, when asked by Farrell whether his word was not good, replied, "No, not with me," and that when this was resented he jumped up from the table, and drove Farrell from the house; that Farrell fled before him until, out of doors, he took up a singletree, and challenged Lewis to come out and fight, and did not advance or threaten to strike otherwise than by such challenge; and that thereupon Lewis, being in no danger whatever, raised his rifle to his shoulder, and with the remark, "Damn you, I'll teach you to fight me," fired the fatal shot, and soon after, when his wife asked some one to go for a doctor, he said: "Don't go for a doctor. Damn him, let him die." All contradictory evidence may well have been discredited. As has often been stated, this court has no jurisdiction of criminal cases on questions of fact, and, consequently, I fail to see why there should have been a hundred pages of printed brief carefully reviewing the testimony, witness by witness, showing what contradictory statements were made by some of them, that some had evidently been drilled, or for various reasons the testimony of some of the witnesses for the prosecution was entitled to less credence than the testimony for the defense. Even if, at the conclusion of the evidence for the prosecution, the defense asked the court to advise the jury to acquit, and the request was refused, and such refusal could be reviewed here, such review would only go to the extent of determining whether there was an absence of any substantial evidence as to some fact that the prosecution was bound to prove. I know of no mode by which it can be made proper for this court to enter upon such a minute inquiry as to the value of the testimony and the credibility of the witnesses as we are invited to in this case. But I think no exception is authorized to a refusal of the court to give such advice. Had it been given, the jury would not be bound to obey it. If the defense was satisfied that there was a total lack of evidence upon some essential issue, it could have submitted the case upon the evidence of the prosecution. But, as it did not do so, it was proper for the court on just terms to allow the defect to be supplied at any time before the final submission of the case. Sec Pen. Code, §§ 1118, 1170, et seq.

Upon a motion for a new trial questions of law may be presented in regard to the legal sufficiency of the evidence, and such questions may be reviewed here. In fact, in this case the only substantial questions presented are so presented, but their consideration does not require this elaborate consideration and discussion of the evidence. The evidence upon which these points are based is not conflicting, and, of course, there is no substantial disagreement in regard thereto. But for the considerations presented in these few propositions, really constituting but one point, we may assume, and the fact is, that the evidence abundantly sustains the verdict. Defendant and deceased were brothers-in-law, and not altogether friendly, although they were on speaking and visiting terms. On the morning of the homicide the deceased visited the residence of the defendant, was received in a friendly manner, but after a while an altercation arose, as a result of which defendant shot deceased in the abdomen, inflicting a wound that was necessarily mortal. Farrell fell to the ground, stunned for an instant, but soon got up, and went into the house, saying: "Shoot me again. I shall die anyway." His strength soon failed him, and he was put to bed. Soon afterwards,—about how long does not appear, but within a very few minutes,—when no other person was present except a lad about 9 years of age, nephew of the deceased, and son of defendant, the deceased procured a knife, and cut his throat, inflicting a ghastly wound, from the effect of which, according to the medical evidence, he must necessarily have died in five minutes. The wound inflicted by the defendant severed the mesenteric artery, and medical witnesses testified that under the circumstances it was necessarily mortal, and death would ensue within one hour from the effects of that wound alone. Indeed, the evidence was that usually the effect of such a wound would be to cause death in less time than that, but possibly the omentum may have filled the wound, and thus, by preventing the flow of the blood from the body, have stayed its certain effect for a short period. Internal hemorrhage was still occurring, and, with other effects of the gunshot wound, produced intense pain. The medical witnesses thought that death was accelerated by the knife wound. Perhaps some of them considered it the immediate cause of death. Now, it is contended that this is a case where one languishing from a mortal wound is killed by an intervening cause, and therefore deceased was not killed by Lewis. To constitute manslaughter, the defendant must have killed some one, and if, though mortally wounded by the defendant, Farrell actually died from an independent intervening cause, Lewis, at the most, could only be guilty of a felonious attempt. He was as effectually prevented from killing as he would have been if some obstacle had turned aside the bullet from its course, and left Farrell unwounded. And they contend that the intervening act was the cause of death, if it shortened the life of Farrell for any period whatever. The attorney general does not controvert the general proposition here contended for, but argues that the wound inflicted by the defendant was the direct cause of the throat-cutting, and therefore defendant is criminally responsible for the death. He illustrates his position by supposing a case of one dangerously wounded, and whose wounds had been bandaged by a surgeon. He says, suppose, through the fever and pain consequent upon the wound, the patient becomes frenzied, and tears away the bandage, and thus accelerates his own death, would not the defendant be responsible for a homicide? Undoubtedly he would be, for in the case supposed the deceased died from the wound, aggravated, it is true, by the restlessness of the deceased, but still the wound inflicted by the defendant produced death. Whether such is the case here is the question. The attorney general seems to admit a fact which I do not concede,—that the gunshot wound was not, when Farrell died, then itself directly contributing to the death. I think the jury were warranted in finding that it was. But, if the deceased did die from the effect of the knife wound alone, no doubt the defendant would be responsible, if it was made to appear, and the jury could have found from the evidence, that the knife wound was caused by the wound inflicted by the defendant, in the natural course of events. If the relation was causal, and the wounded condition of the deceased was not merely the occasion upon which another cause intervened, not produced by the first wound, or related to it in other than in a casual way, then defendant is guilty of a homicide. But, if the wounded condition only afforded an opportunity for another unconnected person to kill, defendant would not be guilty of a homicide, even though he had inflicted a mortal wound. In such case, I think, it would be true that the defendant was thus prevented from killing.

The case, considered under this view, is further complicated from the fact that it is impossible to determine whether deceased was induced to cut his throat through pain produced by the wound. May it not have been from remorse, or from a desire to shield his brother-in-law? In either case the causal relation between the knife wound and the gunshot wound would seem to be the same. In either case, if defendant had not shot the deceased, the knife wound would not have been inflicted. Suppose one assaults and wounds another, intending to take life, but the wound, though painful, is not even dangerous, and the wounded man knows that it is not mortal, and yet takes his own life to escape pain, would it not be suicide only? Yet the wound inflicted by the assailant would have the same relation to death which the original wound in this case has to the knife wound. The wound induced the suicide, but the wound was not, in the natural course of things, the cause of the suicide. Though no case altogether like this has been found, yet, as was to have been expected, the general subject has often been considered. In 1 Hale, P. C. 428, the law is stated. So far as material here, his views may be thus summarized: (1) If one gives another a dangerous wound, which might, by very skillful treatment, be cured, and is not, it is a case of homicide. (2) If one inflicts a dangerous wound, and the man dies from treatment, "if it can clearly appear that the medicine, and not the wound, was the cause of the death, it seems it is not homicide; but then it must appear clearly and certainly to be so." (3) If one receives a wound, not in itself mortal, and fever or gangrene sets in because of improper treatment or unruly conduct of the patient, and death ensues, it is homicide, "for that wound, though it was not the immediate cause of his death, yet it was the mediate cause thereof, and the fever or gangrene was the immediate cause of his death, yet the wound was the cause of the gangrene or fever, and so, consequently, is causa causati." (4) One who hastens the death of a person languishing with a mortal disease is guilty of a homicide, for the death is not merely by a visitation of Providence, but the hurt hastens it, and the wrongdoer cannot thus appportion the responsibility, etc. It would make no difference, I presume, if the person killed was languishing from a mortal wound, rather than from an ordinary disease. In State v. Scates, 50 N. C. 420, a child was found dead, badly burned, and with a wound from a blow on the head. The burning was admitted by defendant, but the blow was not, and it was not proven who inflicted it. The medical witness thought the burning was the primary cause of death, but the blow may have hastened it. The jury was told that, if it was doubtful which was the immediate cause of death, they must acquit, but if they found that the burning was the primary cause of death, and the blow only hastened it, they could convict. The case was reversed, the appellate court holding that the blow might have been the independent act of another, and, if it hastened the death, it, and not the burning, was the cause of death. In Bush v. Com., 78 Ky. 268, the deceased received a wound not necessarily mortal, and, in consequence, was taken to a hospital, where she took scarlet fever from a nurse, and died of the fever. The court said: "When the disease is a consequence of the wound, although the proximate cause of the death, the person inflicting the wound is guilty, because the death can be traced as a result naturally flowing from the wound, and coming in the natural order of things; but when there is a supervening cause, not naturally intervening by reason of the wound, the death is by visitation of Providence, and not from the act of the party inflicting the wound. * * * If the death was not connected with the wound in the regular chain of causes and consequences, there ought not to be any responsibility." The last case, in my opinion, so far as it goes, correctly states the law. The facts of this case do not bring it strictly within any of the propositions found in 1 Hale, P. C. 428. The second and third propositions both predicate a wound not necessarily mortal. What the law would have been in the second case, had the wound been mortal, and the applications had hastened the death, is not stated. It seems to me, however, the case of a person already languishing from a mortal wound is precisely that of one suffering from a mortal disease. Certainly, the willful and unlawful killing of such a person would be a felony, and it cannot be true that the first offender and the last can each be guilty of murdering the same man, if they had no connection with each other, and both wounds were not actively operating to produce death when it occurred.

But why is it that one who inflicts a wound not mortal is guilty of a homicide, if through misconduct of the patient or unskillful treatment gangrene or fever sets in, producing a fatal termination, when, if it can be clearly made to appear that the medicine, and not the wound, was the cause of the death, he is not guilty of a homicide? In each case, if the wound had not been, the treatment would not have been, and the man would not then have died. In each case the wound occasioned the treatment which caused or contributed to the death. The reason, I think, is found in the words advisedly used in the last sentence. In the one case the treatment caused the death, and in the other it merely contributed to it. In one case the treatment aggravated the wound, but the wound thus aggravated produced death. In the other the wound, though the occasion of the treatment, did not contribute to the death, which occurred without any present contribution to the natural effect of the medicine from the wound. Take, for instance, the giving of a dose of morphine, by mistake, sufficient to end life at once. In such case it is as obvious that the treatment produced death as it would have been had the physician cut off his patient's head. But see People v. Cook, 39 Mich. 236. In this case it appears that defendant had inflicted a dangerous wound, but it was contended by the defense that death was caused by an overdose of morphine. Defendant asked an instruction as follows: "If the jury believe that the injury inflicted by the prisoner would have been fatal, but if death was actually produced by morphine poisoning, they must acquit." The instruction was refused, but the jury were told that if the wound was not in itself mortal, and death was caused solely by the morphine, they must acquit. The action of the trial court was sustained on the ground that a mortal wound had been given, which necessitated medical treatment; that the physicians were competent, and acted in good faith; and that it was not made clearly to appear that the morphine solely produced death, and that the wound did not at all contribute to the death at that time. Under the authorities, this was equivalent to a finding that the wound did not contribute to the death. This case differs from that in this: that here the intervening cause, which it is alleged hastened death, was not medical treatment, designed to be helpful, and which the deceased was compelled to procure because of the wound, but was an act intended to produce death, and did not result from the first wound in the natural course of events. But we have reached the conclusion by a course of argument unnecessarily prolix, except from a desire to fully consider the earnest and able argument of the defendant, that the test is—or, at least, one test—whether, when the death occurred, the wound inflicted by the defendant did contribute to the event. If it did, although other independent causes also contributed, the causal relation between the unlawful acts of the defendant and the death has been made out. Here, when the throat was cut, Farrell was not merely languishing from a mortal wound; he was actually dying; and after the throat was cut he continued to languish from both wounds. Drop by drop the life current went out from both wounds, and at the very instant of death the gunshot wound was contributing to the event. If the throat-cutting had been by a third person, unconnected with the defendant, he might be guilty; for, although a man cannot be killed twice, two persons, acting independently, may contribute to his death, and each be guilty of a homicide. A person dying is still in life, and may be killed; but, if he is dying from a wound given by another, both may properly be said to have contributed to his death.

Other points are raised by the defense. One is that the prosecuting attorney told the jury in his opening that he would prove that the defendant himself did the throat-cutting. No evidence tending to establish this proposition was offered by the prosecution, and it is contended the defendant was prejudiced by this statement. We cannot say that the statement was not made in good faith, and with the intent to attempt its proof. If so, it was not an abuse of his position by the prosecuting officer. It was made, not by the district attorney, but by an assisting attorney, who probably was not as well advised of the case as he should have been. But the defense could not have been prejudiced. It doubtless weakened the case for the prosecution, which, by the statement, seemed to admit that such proof was essential to its case.

After the defense had closed, the prosecution was permitted to call a witness to prove the facts concerning the knife wound. This had only been shown before by the medical witness who testified as to the wounds, and one witness who came in just as Farrell breathed his last, and who spoke of the wounds. The witness called was the son of defendant, and he is strongly indorsed by the defense as a truthful witness. It appears that there was no other witness who could have testified to the occurrences at that time. The procedure was irregular, but the defense was certainly not injured thereby. In fact, I do not see that the evidence was at all important to the prosecution.

The court refused to instruct the jury as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that it is impossible to tell whether Will Farrell died from the wound in the throat or the wound in the abdomen, you are bound to acquit." The instruction was properly refused. It assumed that death must have resulted wholly from one wound or the other, and ignored the proposition that both might have contributed, as the jury could have found from the evidence.

The other points are relatively trivial. I have examined them, and cannot see how injury could have resulted, supposing the rulings to have been erroneous. The judgment is affirmed.

ARCHER v. FREEMAN et al. (L. A. 261.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 27, 1899.)

FRAUD—DISCOVERY—LACHES—LIMITATION —ASSIGNMENT.

1. Fraud alleged in the sale of land consisted of false statements that a college would be immediately built on the adjacent land, and that the grantor had donated $100,000 in cash towards it. The grantor lived in a distant state, but spent several months each winter on the land purchased, and had several daughters he wished to send to the college. The foundations were laid the first winter, and work continued for a few months, but was entirely abandoned, and it soon became apparent that no college was to be built. Three years later the grantee tried to avoid payment for another tract because the college was not being built, but paid a lesser amount in compromise. At this time the grantor expressed a belief that the college would be built; but the grantee did not ask him about the donation. Held, that the circumstances put him on inquiry as to the falsity of the statements, and in an action 6 years after the purchase he could not avoid the plea of limitation by alleging failure to discover the fraud.

2. A right to sue for fraud, unconnected with something having a legal existence and value, is not assignable.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by W. L. Archer against Daniel Freeman and another. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Murphy & Gottschalk, for appellant.
Cochran & Williams, S. M. White, Sheldon Borden, and Lamme & Wilde, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff through certain alleged misrepresentations made by defendants with respect to certain lands at Inglewood, in Los Angeles county, purchased by plaintiff from defendants. There is also a second count in the complaint for damages alleged to have been sustained by one Thompson under conditions similar to those stated in the first cause of action, it being averred that Thompson assigned his cause of action to plaintiff. After plaintiff had introduced all his evidence and rested, the defendants moved for a nonsuit, which was granted. Judgment was rendered for defendants, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. In their answer the defendants denied the material averments of the complaint, and also set up the statute of limitations and laches on the part of the plaintiff. The motion for a nonsuit was based upon numerous grounds, among others the statute of limitations and laches; and from the opinion of the court below, which is attached to the brief of respondents, it appears that the court granted the nonsuit mainly upon the two grounds last above stated. If the nonsuit was properly granted upon those grounds, it is not necessary to critically examine the other points made in the case. And we think that the court correctly granted the nonsuit upon the grounds aforesaid.

The plaintiff commenced negotiations for the purchase of the land in question in November, 1887, and the transaction was completed in January, 1888, at which time he paid the purchase money and received a deed of conveyance of the land. This action was commenced June 25, 1894, which was between 6½ and 7 years after the alleged fraudulent misrepresentations and promises which are alleged to have been made and given at the time of the purchase. Therefore the statute of limitations had run more than twice from the time of the alleged frauds until the filing of the complaint, unless, under section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure, there was no discovery by plaintiff of the facts constituting the alleged frauds until within three years next preceding the commencement of the action. However, it is the clearly established law that in such a case a party must be held to have had knowledge of the alleged fraud whenever the means of knowledge existed and the circumstances were such as to put him on inquiry. Moore v. Boyd, 74 Cal. 171, 15

Pac. 670, and cases there cited; Lataillade v. Orena, 91 Cal. 578, 27 Pac. 924; Bills v. Mining Co., 106 Cal. 9, 39 Pac. 43. Therefore if plaintiff had the means of knowledge, and was put upon inquiry as to the alleged frauds more than three years before the commencement of the suit, the action is barred. The frauds relied on consist of certain alleged representations made by the defendants, principally through their alleged agents, with respect to certain improvements that were going to be made and certain things that were going to be done in connection with the townsite of Inglewood, recently laid out, in which the lots of land sold were situated. It is averred in the complaint that defendants falsely represented that extensive arrangements had been made for irrigating the land; that extensive parks, gardens, walks, etc., would be constructed, and particularly that a college would be built on the grounds; that the defendant Freeman "had donated" $100,000 in cash for the building of the college; and that the college "was to be commenced and prosecuted to the finish." But the main frauds relied on were the alleged promise that the college building would be immediately erected, and the alleged misrepresentation that Freeman had donated $100,000 for that purpose. The other alleged misrepresentations are not much dwelt on by counsel for appellant, and need not be further considered. The plaintiff averred and testified that he had daughters and other young ladies under his charge whom he wished to send to the college, and that the building of the college was the main inducement to his purchase of the land; and upon his own statement he expected the college to be speedily erected and put in running order, so that he might have the advantage of sending his daughters and wards there to be educated. The alleged misrepresentations were made by several different firms of real-estate dealers, some of them residing in Los Angeles, a few miles from Inglewood, others of them residing at Pasadena, also in that general neighborhood, and others residing at Inglewood itself. These real-estate agents had advertisements and maps upon which there were pictures of a large college building "with turrets." It is denied by the defendants that these agents had any authority to make such representations; but, for the purposes of this opinion, that question need not be considered. It sufficiently appears that as early as 1888, and certainly in April, 1891, the plaintiff, as a man of reasonable caution and observation, ought to have known that said alleged representations, if made, were false, and that the least inquiry would have demonstrated their falsity. In the latter part of 1887, or in the first part of 1888, there were foundations laid for a college building; but work thereon continued for only two or three months, and was then entirely abandoned. No more work was ever done towards the erection of the college, and it was quite apparent that no college was to be built.

The plaintiff had his legal residence in the state of Pennsylvania; but during all the years from 1887 to 1894, when this suit was commenced, he spent several months each year at and near Inglewood, and was an observer of the condition of things at the latter place. He and his assignor, Thompson, had purchased from the defendants some other land at Inglewood, which they had not entirely paid for; and, being pressed for payment in the spring of 1891, they were evidently suspicious that no college was to be built, and made some efforts to avoid the last payments on said land. They finally, however, in April, 1891, settled their payment on said land by a compromise in which Freeman released a considerable amount of the money due. Before that settlement plaintiff and Thompson had some conversation with Freeman, and that was the only occasion in which it was claimed that Freeman himself ever made any promises or representations. The substance of the conversation was that they asked Freeman if the college would ever be built, and his reply was that it was his belief that it would be. But as to the most important alleged misrepresentation, namely, that Freeman had donated $100,000 in money for the building of the college, they never made of him any inquiry. Neither did they make any inquiry about said $100,000 of any person who could have given them correct information upon the subject. The statement which they claim that defendants' alleged agents made to them was simply that Freeman had donated this $100,000; but no donee was named, nor did the plaintiff ever endeavor to find out who the donee, if any, was. Upon the maps presented by the agents it appeared that the land where the college was to be built belonged to the "University of Southern California," who might well be the donee, if there were any, of the said money; but no inquiry was ever made of said university or of the president thereof, who was known to plaintiff, as to whether any money had ever been delivered to them for that purpose; nor was there any inquiry made by plaintiff of any one as to who the donee of this great donation was. Even if he was as childlike, innocent, unsuspicious and unable to cope with wide-awake Western people as his counsel represents Pennsylvanians to be, still it is difficult to believe that he was so unsophisticated as to have had no suspicion that the alleged $100,000 donation was a myth; and the fact that there was not to be any college there at which he could educate his daughters and wards must have forced itself on his observation. This case furnishes another illustration of the reasons upon which the statute of limitations and the doctrine of laches are founded, namely, "the probability that during the course of many years witnesses will die and recollections of events long past will become indistinct in the memories of the living"; for it appears that many persons, who, if living, would be important witnesses as to the alleged fraudulent misrepresentations and false promises upon which the action is founded, had died before it was commenced.

As to the second count of the complaint, the considerations above stated apply as well to the conduct of the assignor, Thompson, even if the assignment could be considered as valid; but the alleged assignment was of a pure, naked right to bring an action for fraud, unconnected with any property or thing which had "itself a legal existence and value, independent of the right to sue for fraud," and was therefore void. A mere right to complain of fraud is not assignable. Emmons v. Barton, 109 Cal. 662, 42 Pac. 303; Whitney v. Kelley, 94 Cal. 146, 29 Pac. 624; Sanborn v. Doe, 92 Cal. 152, 28 Pac. 105. Under the foregoing views, which are elaborated in the opinion of the learned judge of the trial court, it is unnecessary to discuss the other matters argued in the briefs of counsel. The judgment is affirmed.

CONTRACT—RESCISSION FOR FRAUD—LACHES.

The purchaser of a house seeking to avail himself of a fraudulent statement that it was "first-class in every respect" remained in possession of the house nearly four years before objecting to his contract, and claimed not to have discovered the fraud for two years, but gave no reason therefor, and continued to pay interest on a mortgage he assumed for sixteen months after the alleged discovery of fraud. Held, that his repudiation of the contract was not made "promptly" after the discovery, as required by Civ. Code, § 1691.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Suit by Louise S. Harrington against Edward M. Paterson and another. There was a judgment for plaintiff against defendant Paterson, and he appeals. Affirmed.

T. M. Osmont, for appellant. Warren Olney, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. October 7, 1891, appellant purchased from the plaintiff certain premises in the city of Oakland, with a dwelling house thereon, for the sum of $9,000. A thousand dollars was paid in cash, and the purchaser assumed and agreed to pay and discharge the mortgage on said premises, previously executed by the plaintiff and her husband to the defendant bank, in the sum of $3,500, and also executed a note and mortgage to the plaintiff in the sum of $4,500, the balance of the purchase price.

The action is for the foreclosure of the mortgage executed to the plaintiff, and was commenced April 26, 1895. The defendant bank, by way of cross complaint based upon its own and prior mortgage, also asked for foreclosure. The defendant Paterson filed his amended answer and cross complaint as against the plaintiff. The plaintiff demurred "to the cross complaint and affirmative matter set forth in the amended answer and cross complaint of the defendant Edward M. Paterson," on the ground, among others, that it "did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cross complaint or cause of action, nor entitle the defendant Paterson to any affirmative or other relief." The court sustained "the demurrer of plaintiff to defendant Paterson's amended cross complaint," without leave to amend. The matters averred in the cross complaint necessary to be considered are that, while the negotiations for the purchase were pending, the husband of the plaintiff, as her agent, represented to the defendant that the dwelling house on the premises was in every respect a first-class building; that it was constructed throughout with first-class material; that it had been built for plaintiff and her family; that, in order to insure the most thorough construction and equipment of said building and the use of the best material therein, the plaintiff had caused the same to be built by day labor, and not by contract; that said building was constructed at a much greater cost, and in much more substantial manner, and of much better materials than it would have been if built by contract; that it cost $5,200, and was worth the sum of $5,250; that the land on which it was built, being the premises conveyed, was worth $3,250; that these representations were false; that the dwelling house was built by contract, not by day labor, was not constructed of first-class material, but second and third class, and it did not cost to exceed $3,200, was not built for the home of plaintiff, but upon speculation; that the defendant was a man ignorant of, and had no knowledge of, the construction or value of dwelling houses; and that the defendant, for the first time, discovered and ascertained the falsity of the representations stated on December 1, 1893. And he alleged that he thereupon notified plaintiff of such discovery, and that he refused to be bound by said contract of sale, and repudiated the same, and demanded the return of all moneys paid thereunder, and that he would redeem the property to the plaintiff, and restore the possession thereof, but does not aver either the execution or tender of a deed. It appears further from the cross complaint that the appellant entered into the possession of the house and premises at the time of the purchase thereof, and has since continued in such possession. There is no reason shown why the appellant did not discover or ascertain the facts showing the representations to be false, as alleged, prior to December, 1893, and, further, it appears from the cross complaint that the appellant continued paying interest on the bank mortgage up to April, 1895, and on the plaintiff's mortgage up to January, 1893.

Our Code prescribes the general rule in reference to the rescission of a contract. The party desiring to rescind must do so promptly on discovering the facts which entitle him to rescind. He must restore to the other party everything of value which he has received, or offer to do so. Civ. Code, § 1691. From the time the appellant entered into possession of the premises he had every facility for ascertaining whether the alleged representations were false or true, and the law presumes that within a reasonable time he had fully ascertained the truth or falsity of such representations, if made, and it was his duty immediately to take steps for a rescission, if he desired so to do. "Upon obtaining knowledge of the facts he should commence the proceeding for relief as soon as reasonably possible. Acquiescence, consisting of unnecessary delay after such knowledge, will defeat the equitable relief." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 817. "He is not allowed to go on and derive all possible benefits from the transaction, and then claim to be relieved from his own obligations by rescission or refusal to perform on his own part. If, after discovering the untruth of the representations, he conducts himself in reference to the transaction as though it were still subsisting and binding, he thereby waives all benefit of, and relief from, the misrepresentations." Id. § 897.

From his own showing the appellant continued to pay rent on the bank's mortgage for many months after he admits he discovered the allegations to be false, and paid interest on the plaintiff's mortgage for over a year after he entered into possession of the premises, and still took no steps for a rescission until the suit brought to foreclose the second mortgage. Archer v. Freeman (L. A. No. 261, a bank case just decided) 57 Pac. 474, presented features of laches and acquiescence something similar to this case. There, upon an action for damages claimed to have arisen from false representations on the sale of real estate, the plaintiff was nonsuited, and this court, in affirming the judgment, uses this language: "It is the clearly established law that in such a case a party must be held to have had knowledge of the alleged frauds whenever the means of knowledge existed and the circumstances were such as to put him on inquiry. Moore v. Boyd, 74 Cal. 171, 15 Pac. 670; Lataillade v. Orena, 91 Cal. 578, 27 Pac. 924; Bills v. Mining Co., 106 Cal. 9, 39 Pac. 43." We think the demurrer to the cross complaint was properly sustained. Judgment affirmed.

COLUSA COUNTY v. GLENN COUNTY.

(Sac. 561.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1899.)

TAXATION—ACTION BETWEEN COUNTIES—STATE BOARD OF EQUALIZATION—JURISDICTION—MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED.

1. St. 1893, p. 290, § 1, provides that every assessment of property made after the year 1879 which is invalid, or may afterwards be declared invalid, shall be remade and reassessed by the state board of equalization for the year for which the assessment was invalid. Held, that the board cannot make a reassessment of the property of a railroad which has been regularly assessed under Pol. Code, §§ 3664-3669, regulating the manner of making such assessments, since such sections are constitutional and valid.

2. A railroad company, pursuant to an attempted reassessment of its property for taxes under St. 1893, p. 290, § 1, paid them to a new county, which had been, subsequent to the original assessment, created out of the county in which the prior assessment was made. The act creating such new county made no provision for an apportionment of the public property, or of the debts or credits of the old county, between it and the new one. Held, that such county, having received the taxes, knowing that they were under an assessment made by the old county, was liable on its implied promise to pay them to the old county, which was entitled thereto.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Action by the county of Colusa against the county of Glenn. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John T. Harrington, for appellant. H. W. Johnson and Ernest Weyand, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Action to recover $1,622.72 taxes assessed by plaintiff against the Northern Railway Company for the years 1886 and 1887, and which said sum was paid by said railway company to defendant in November, 1894. The case was submitted in the court below upon a stipulation as to the facts. Judgment was entered for plaintiff for the amount prayed. Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and order.

The following is a portion of the stipulation: "That in the years 1886 and 1887 the said Northern Railway Company was regularly assessed by the state board of equalization the amount of assessable property and the amount of taxes due from said Northern Railway Company, and the number of miles of track of said Northern Railway Company in said county of Colusa were determined, and the whole thereof in said years 1886 and 1887 apportioned to plaintiff, by said board of equalization; that the various steps required by law were regularly taken in the matter of the assessment of the railway company, the said Northern Railway Company, and said assessments and taxes were made and levied in accordance with the constitution of the state of California and the provisions of the Political Code of said state, and said apportionment made by the said state board of equalization to the said county of Colusa regularly made in accordance with law; that the county clerk, auditor, and board of supervisors of the county of Colusa during said years 1886 and 1887, and after the action of the said state board of equalization, did all things required of them by law in the matter of the assessment of the property of the said Northern Railway Company, and levy of taxes due from it: that after the completion of all the necessary steps relating to the assessment and the levy of the property of and the taxes due from said Northern Railway Company, and the ascertainment of the amount due from said company, the same was not paid, but all steps necessary to be taken and all requirements or law were done, performed, and fulfilled." It was further stipulated that the state board of equalization reassessed the property of said railway company for the years 1886 and 1887, and apportioned the amount in controversy to defendant, under an act of the legislature of the state of California entitled "An act in relation to reassessments of property or equalization of the same and the collection of taxes thereon in cases where a former assessment made since 1879 is illegal or invalid, or where the proceedings for the collection of such taxes have been ineffectual by reason of error, irregularity or invalidity, and such taxes have not been paid," which act was approved March 23, 1893. St. 1893, p. 290. The case was here on a former appeal (Colusa Co. v. Glenn Co., 117 Cal. 434, 49 Pac. 457), and on that appeal it appeared that the court below sustained a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff declined to amend, and judgment was entered for defendant. This court, after a full consideration of the case, held that the complaint stated a cause of action, and that the demurrer should have been overruled; and reversed the case. On that appeal it was claimed that there was a reassessment of the property by the state board of equalization under the said act of March 23, 1893. The court held that the question was not then presented in such manner that it could be passed upon, and used this language: "Whether there was such reassessment, and whether, if there was, it would affect the right of the plaintiff to recover in this action, are questions that are not so presented as to require decision. If there was a reassessment, and if that fact relieves the defendant from liability, it is open to the defendant to plead it." Upon the case being remanded the defendant accordingly filed an amended answer, and pleaded in defense of the action a reassessment made by the state board of equalization in August, 1894. The law of the case was practically settled on the former appeal, except as to the effect of such reassessment by the said state board.

ed by this court is as to whether or not the state board had jurisdiction to make the reassessment. The point is thus stated in appellant's brief: "If the state board had jurisdiction to make the reassessment, the decision is erroneous." We will therefore first examine this question. The state board of equalization being a limited tribunal, its jurisdiction is limited, and it possesses only such powers as are expressly conferred by statute, and none others. Finch v. Tehama Co., 29 Cal. 457; Modoc Co. v. Spencer, 103 Cal. 498, 37 Pac. 483. Looking at the said act of March 23, 1893, for the power of the said state board, we find that the portion of section 1 of said act applicable to this case reads as follows: "Every assessment of property made after the year 1879 which is invalid or may hereafter be adjudged to be by reason of any illegality, invalidity or irregularity declared or existing in the assessment of such property, or in the mode provided for the assessment thereof, shall be remade and the property re-assessed and equalized for each year for which such assessment is invalid as aforesaid and for the year for which the assessment of such property was invalid as aforesaid." It is therefore evident that the said state board had no power to reassess the property of the said Northern Railway Company for the years 1886 and 1887, unless said assessment for said years was invalid when said act took effect, or was thereafter adjudged to be so. The stipulation hereinbefore quoted shows that the assessment for the years 1886 and 1887 was regularly made, and "that the various steps required by law were regularly taken in the matter of the assessment of the railway company." It is therefore admitted that the assessment of 1886 and 1887 was made strictly in compliance with the sections of the Political Code, 3664 to 3669, but it is claimed that the said sections of the Political Code are unconstitutional and invalid, and that this court so hold in People v. Central Pac. R. Co., 83 Cal. 393, 23 Pac. 303. In the opinion in that case, written by Mr. Justice Fox, the court did apparently so hold; but the case is, as to this point, expressly overruled in People v. Central Pac. R. Co., 105 Cal. 576, 38 Pac. 905, in an exhaustive opinion of the court in bank, delivered by Mr. Justice Harrison, in which the principal question was as to the validity of said sections of the Political Code; and they were held to be constitutional and valid. It was claimed that the case of People v. Central Pac. R. Co., in 83 Cal. 393, 23 Pac. 303, had held said sections of the Political Code to be unconstitutional, but the court said: "There are matters in the opinion of Mr. Justice Fox in People v. Central Pac. R. Co., 83 Cal. 393, 23 Pac. 303, in support of the contention of the appellant; but, after the court had decided that the complaint was insufficient in any aspect in which it might be reviewed, its further opinion of the effect of a complaint that would have sufficiently presented a cause of action must be regarded as obiter dicta." It follows that the state board of equalization had no jurisdiction to make the reassessment, and that the assessments of 1886 and 1887 were valid, and made while all the territory now included in Glenn county was a part of the territory of plaintiff. The act creating the county of Glenn did not provide for any apportionment of the public property or of the debts or credits of Colusa county between it and the new county, and in such case the whole thereof belonged to Colusa county. Los Angeles Co. v. Orange Co., 97 Cal. 329, 32 Pac. 316; Tulare Co. v. Kings Co., 117 Cal. 195, 49 Pac. 8; Colusa Co. v. Glenn Co., 117 Cal. 438, 49 Pac. 457. It is said by Mr. Justice Harrison, speaking for the court, in Los Angeles Co. v. Orange Co.: "In the absence of any provision in reference thereto [property and assets], the old county will be entitled to retain all public property and assets except such buildings and structures as lie within the limits of the new, and will also be liable for its prior obligations." It follows that the money due Colusa county as taxes for the assessment of the years 1886 and 1887 was at the time of the creation of Glenn county assets of the plaintiff, and plaintiff has the right to recover it. It does not now occur to us why the plaintiff would not be entitled to the money due for taxes for said years even if the assessments of 1886 and 1887 were void, and it was collected by reassessment through the machinery of the act of March, 1893. If the law should provide a method of collecting a debt in a case where before there was no machinery for its collections, this would not change the title from the true owner of the debt to some one else. The debt, when collected, would be the property of the owner thereof. It is said that, if the board of equalization had no jurisdiction to make the reassessment, then the payment by the railroad company to defendant was a voluntary payment and in no way concerned the plaintiff. To this view we cannot accede. The stipulation of facts shows that the payment by the Northern Railway Company of the amount was for taxes due for the years 1886 and 1887 under the attempted reassessment. Defendant was not created, had no name or existence, until March, 1891. We look in vain for any statute authorizing the defendant to collect a debt that had long been due to plaintiff at the time defendant came into existence. Defendant received the money knowing that it was paid for taxes under the assessment of Colusa county for the years 1886 and 1887. Where money is received by one, and belongs to another, the law implies a promise on the part of the receiver to pay it over, and the party entitled to it may maintain an action for its recovery. *District Tp. of Norway v. SWEENEY et al. v. MEYER et al. (S. F. 1415).¹

MECHANICS' LIENS—PREMATURE PAYMENT OF CONTRACTOR—OWNER'S LIABILITY—FORECLOSURE—EXTRA WORK—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

1. By Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, relating to mechanics' liens, no payment made before due, under the contract, will defeat, diminish, or discharge any lien except the contractor's. It is also provided that, on service of a written notice by one who has performed labor or furnished material, the owner shall withhold from the contractor all or sufficient money to answer such claim, and money paid while the notice is in force shall be deemed, for the purpose of all liens except the contractor's, a premature payment, within the meaning of, and subject to, this section. Held, that the continued liability on a premature payment imposed by the first provision does not depend on the giving or failure to give the notice referred to in the latter provision.

2. In an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, where extra work is claimed for, the complaint and the evidence in support thereof, should specifically show what constituted such claim.

3. In a consolidated action to foreclose mechanics' liens, attorney's fees, of $100 each, were allowed to two claimants who had separate attorneys, and who filed separate complaints, and were adjudged $293.23 and $107.64, respectively. The other eight plaintiffs had other attorneys, and joined in a complaint on claims aggregating $663.02, and were allowed $100 attorney's fees, to be apportioned ratably according to their several judgments. The trial was of considerable length and some complexity. Held, that the allowance of attorney's fees was not excessive.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by G. C. Sweeney and others against Johanna K. Meyer and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants Johanna K. and A. Meyer appeal. Judgment modified, and order affirmed.

Frank M. Parcels, for appellants. A. G. Eells, H. K. Eells, J. N. Young, and H. W. Hutton, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a consolidated action for the foreclosure of certain liens of mechanics and material men. Judgment passed for the plaintiffs, and the owners, Johanna and Antone Meyer, appeal from that judgment and from the order denying a new trial.

1. The contract specified the times during the progress of the work when the partial payments were to be made. The court found that the third and fourth of these payments were made prematurely, and in advance of the terms of the contract, and prior to the time when due, and were therefore invalid as payments for the purpose of diminishing or discharging the liens, or any of the liens, involved in the action. By the mechanic's lien law, "no payment made prior to the time when the same is due, under the terms and conditions of the contract, shall be valid for the purpose of defeating, diminishing or discharging any lien in favor of any person except the contractor, but as to such liens such payment shall be deemed as if not made, and shall be applicable to such liens." Code Civ. Proc. § 1184. By the same section, it is also provided that a written notice may be served upon the owner by one who has performed labor or furnished material, and that upon service of such notice "it shall be the duty of the owner to and he shall withhold from his contractor, or from any other person acting under such owner * * * all money due or that may become due to such contractor * * * or sufficient of such money to answer such claim; * * * and all money paid thereafter by the owner to the contractor, while such notice is in force, shall, for the purposes of all liens of all persons except that of the contractor, be deemed a payment prior to the time the same was due within the meaning of and subject to the provisions of this section." Under this law, appellants contend that an owner becomes liable for payments prematurely made to his contractor only in the event that thereafter, and before the time when such payments are due, he is served with the requisite notice. To this it must be answered that, while such might well have been the law, the law is not so written. The provision as to notice is entirely separate and distinct from the provision invalidating payments prematurely made. The proceedings under the notice are in the nature of a garnishment, whereby there is impounded specific moneys due, or thereafter to become due, to the contractor. The provision of the law as to premature payments is not made dependent upon the giving or the failure to give notice. The provision is but a forthright declaration that, if a contractor shall make a payment prior to the time when it is due, that payment shall be deemed not to have been made, so far as affects all lien claimants other than the contractor himself. It is a provision like the provision requiring recordation. It is an arbitrary demand of the statute, for the failure to comply with which the owner must suffer. If it be said that it is a harsh requirement, this may be conceded, but at the same time it should be noticed that the owner need not suffer from it if he complies with the law.

2. It is claimed that the court erred in refusing to strike out all of plaintiffs' evidence relating to the extra work, the value of which the court found to be $700. It is also claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and judgment as to said extra work. Four of the plaintiffs did extra work of the aggregate value of $194.92, and the court finds upon sufficient evidence that this work was done at the instance of defendants, and that the several sums were justly due, and were of the reasonable value charged therefor. The evidence relating to these matters, we think, was clearly admissible. It is also found by the court that the plans and specifications were materially departed from, "and a large amount of extra work, * * * outside that mentioned in said contract, * * * was done upon said structure at the order of said owner of said property, the amount and value of which departures, extra, and different work was and is the sum of seven hundred dollars, no part of which has ever been paid, and all of which, together with the sum of six hundred and seventy-five dollars, the last and final payment due under said contract, is applicable to the payment of the liens of the several plaintiffs." This sum of $700 is added to the third and fourth payments, making applicable to the lien $2,375. In another finding it appears that this extra work was done by Alsup, and there is evidence tending to support the finding. The evidence and the findings show that certain four of the plaintiffs did extra work of the value of $194.92, and defendants concede that they are entitled to liens therefor; but it is claimed that there is no evidence and no finding and no sufficient pleadings to justify the decision of the court that the owners are chargeable with $700 due Alsup for extra work. None of the complaints charge that Alsup did any extra work, and no extra work is mentioned in the pleadings, except that above stated, amounting to $194.92. In the course of the trial, however, there was evidence tending to show that Alsup performed extra labor and furnished extra supplies worth $700 or $800. By leave of court, plaintiffs amended two of the complaints so as to show the whole amount due from defendants on account of said contract to be the sum of $2,375. This amendment, we suppose, was made to let in the $700 extra work done by Alsup, but the complaints were not amended so as to allege that he did any extra work.

After the court had stricken out all of defendants' evidence as to payments made by them to sundry persons for material, counsel for defendants said: "The plaintiffs, aside from the extras which they have separately specified and declared upon, have not set forth any itemized statement or bill of those extras which they claim are of the value of seven hundred dollars. * * * If the plaintiffs will submit an itemized statement of the extras, we may be able to show that they have been paid. Until this statement is forthcoming, I move that all the evidence introduced thus far touching the extra and additional work, not specifically declared upon, be stricken out." The court denied the motion, to which ruling defendants excepted. We think defendants were entitled to know —first, by appropriate and sufficient allegations of the complaint, and, second, by evidence in support thereof—what constituted this extra work. These facts do not appear either in the pleadings or by sufficient evidence. Without a showing of some kind by which specifications of this extra work could be brought to defendants' knowledge, it was not possible for them to intelligently meet the claim. As the matter stands, the court increased the fund subjected to the liens by $700 for extra work, without any allegations in the complaints in any way referring to this extra work, and without evidence in detail as to what it was and the value thereof, except that witnesses stated generally that the extra work done by Alsup was of the value of $700. The state of the pleadings and evidence considered, we think it was error to make this sum applicable to the liens, as was done by the decree.

3. We are asked to modify the allowance made for attorney's fees as excessive. Heath filed a separate complaint. The court gave him judgment for $293.23, and $100 attorney's fees. De Lair also filed a separate complaint, and was given judgment for $107.64, and $100 attorney's fees. The other eight plaintiffs filed a consolidated or joint complaint, the claims aggregating $663.02. The court allowed $100 attorney's fees in these eight claims, to be apportioned among the eight claimants, ratably according to their several judgments. Heath and De Lair each had separate attorneys, and the eight others had still other attorneys. Section 1195, Code Civ. Proc., provides that the trial court "must allow, as a part of the costs, * * * reasonable attorney's fees in the superior and supreme courts, such costs and attorney's fees to be allowed to each lien claimant whose lien is established, whether he be plaintiff or defendant, or whether they all join in one action, or separate actions are consolidated." The fixing of attorney's fees is a duty devolved upon the trial court by the statute (Lumber Co. v. Welton, 115 Cal. 1, 46 Pac. 735, 1057); and conceding, but not deciding, that this court may, from what appears in the record, modify the judgment of the trial court in such matter, we do not think there is ground for doing so in this case. The transcript discloses a trial of considerable length and some complexity. The pleadings are necessarily somewhat extended in this class of cases. The trial judge was in better position than we are to determine a just apportionment of the attorney's fees, and, while it may appear that De Lair received a greater proportionate allowance than did the eight who consolidated their claims, we cannot say that there was such abuse of discretion as to warrant interference here. Under all the circumstances of the trial, the total of attorney's fees allowed seems not to be excessive. The judgment should be modified so as to show that the liability of defendants applicable to plaintiffs' liens is limited to the sum of $1,675. The judgment is ordered thus modified, and the order appealed from is affirmed.

SAN JOSÉ WATER CO. v. LYNDON, Sheriff.
(S. F. 1,301.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1899.)

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—REDEMPTION.

A junior mortgagee joining in foreclosure of the senior mortgage, and asking by cross complaint for foreclosure of his mortgage and sale of the premises, cannot redeem from the sale.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county.

Mandamus by the San José Water Company against James H. Lyndon, as sheriff. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. M. Rosenthal, for appellant. S. F. Leib, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from the judgment of the superior court in a mandamus case commenced therein. The purpose of the proceeding was to compel the defendant, as sheriff, to execute a conveyance of certain property sold by him to plaintiff's assignor under a decree of foreclosure and sale. The court below ordered the mandate to issue as prayed for, and the appellant appeals from the judgment. The appellant contends that the sheriff properly refused to execute the deed, because redemption from the sale had been made by one Herman Levy. This contention cannot be maintained, and the judgment must be affirmed upon the authority of Black v. Gerichten, 58 Cal. 56. The only facts necessary to be stated are these: An action was brought to foreclose a mortgage upon the land in question, and the said Levy, who was a junior mortgagee, was made a party to the foreclosure suit. Levy, by a cross complaint, set up his junior mortgage, and prayed for a foreclosure of his mortgage and sale of the premises. The court decreed a foreclosure of both mortgages and a sale under them. The proceeds of the sale were merely sufficient to pay the senior mortgage, and Levy had a judgment docketed, but did not pray for nor was there any deficiency judgment, at least in form, entered. The facts in Black v. Gerichten, supra, were similar to those in the case at bar, except that in the former case the junior mortgagee had a deficiency judgment entered; but the latter fact does not alter the rule there declared. A mortgagee cannot redeem from the sale made upon the foreclosure of his mortgage; and it makes no difference whether the foreclosure is in a suit originally brought by him, or upon a cross complaint in which he prays for and obtains a foreclosure in a suit brought by another mortgagee. In the case above cited the court say: "Whether such mortgage was foreclosed in the action in which the mortgagee was plaintiff or defendant is immaterial, for in the latter case he filed a cross complaint, and prayed a foreclosure of his mortgage. It is quite clear that the plaintiff in this case had no mortgage lien on the property subsequent to that on which the property was sold; for it was sold upon his mortgage lien, and his mortgage was merged in the judgment under which it was sold." Appellant relies upon Frink v. Murphy, 21 Cal. 108, but that case is referred to in Black v. Gerichten, and shown not to be applicable, because in Frink v. Murphy there was no cross complaint, and no foreclosure, nor prayer for a foreclosure, of the junior mortgage. See, also, Camp v. Land, 122 Cal. 167, 54 Pac. 839, where Black v. Gerichten is approved. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

GARNISHMENT—AFFIDAVIT — JURISDICTION — MONEY IN HANDS OF OFFICER—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—CONVICTS—CIVIL DEATH.

1. An affidavit, for the order of examination of a garnishee to show cause why he should not obey the writ, which states that such garnishee "has property of said judgment debtor," etc., is a substantial compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 717, providing that, upon proof by affidavit that any person has property of the judgment debtor, such person may be required to appear and answer concerning the same.

2. Where a garnishee appears and answers, and proceeds to the hearing in the trial court, without making any objection to the sufficiency of the affidavit on which citation issued, he waives any objection to its sufficiency.

3. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 717, 719, are not unconstitutional, for the reason that no provision is made for notice to the judgment debtor in an action of garnishment, and no opportunity given him to be heard.

4. Pen. Code, § 673, declaring that the sentence of a person to less than a life imprisonment suspends all his civil rights, and section 674, declaring that one sentenced for life is civilly dead, construed in connection with sections 675 and 677, providing that such provisions do not render the person convicted incompetent as a witness in criminal actions nor incapable of conveying property nor work a forfeiture, do not deprive the court of jurisdiction to make an order subjecting the property of a person sentenced for life to the satisfaction of a judgment.

5. Garnishee, a chief of police, by search made under a prisoner's directions, came into possession of money belonging to such prisoner. The search was made on the theory that material evidence as to the insanity of the prisoner would be disclosed. Held, that since it is presumed, from the fact that the prisoner was convicted, that the plea of insanity, if offered, did not prevail, a ruling of the court refusing to admit evidence, on the part of the garnishee, that at the trial of such prisoner on the charge of murder his counsel interposed the plea of insanity, does not prejudice the garnishee.

6. Garnishee, a chief of police, by search made under a prisoner's directions, came into possession of money belonging to such prisoner, with his consent; such money not being taken at the time of arrest, nor from the person of the prisoner, and having no connection with the cause of arrest. Held, that the money was not in custodia legis, so as to be exempt from garnishment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Walter A. Coffee against Theodore Park Haynes. I. W. Lees was garnished. From an order requiring said Lees, as garnishee, to pay over to the sheriff a sum of money belonging to defendant, he appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Dunne, for appellant. Geo. D. Collins, for appellee.

CHIPMAN, C. Action for the value of certain legal services as attorneys at law rendered defendant, Haynes, by plaintiff's assignors. Plaintiff recovered default judgment for $1,920 on June 21, 1898, and on the same day a writ of execution was duly issued in the action, and was served upon appellant, Lees, June 22d, as garnishee. Appellant answered as follows: "San Francisco, June 22, 1898. [Directed to the sheriff.] Dear Sir: Replying to your process of garnishment, * * * I have in my possession no moneys * * * belonging to Theodore P. Haynes, * * * except such as has come into my possession in my official capacity * * * by reason of said * * * [defendant] having been a prisoner in my custody, and any and all of which property is exempt from attachment or execution by reason of its having come into my custody in the manner aforesaid. Yours, respectfully, I. W. Lees, Chief of Police." Thereafter, and on the same day, plaintiff filed his affidavit in the court praying an order of the court directed to the said Lees to show cause why he should not obey the writ of execution. On June 27th, the judge issued an order requiring the said Lees to show cause, to which the latter made written return under oath, July 1, 1898. The matter was heard upon the papers and upon the proofs submitted at the hearing, and the court ordered the said Lees to pay over to the sheriff the sum of $947.45. The appeal is from this order, and is here upon bill of exceptions.

On March 23, 1898, Lieut. Burke, of the police department of San Francisco, was shot and killed by defendant, who was promptly arrested and brought to the police station, where he continually proclaimed that the men who had visited him on the occasion of the lieutenant's death were robbers and thieves, and that the lieutenant was not an officer, but was a robber, and had come there to rob him. It was suggested to defendant that these persons would not have robbed him of much if they had robbed him, whereupon he disclosed the fact that he had money hid away and buried. To determine whether this was a mere delusion, appellant went to defendant's cabin, taking the latter with him. A search was made under defendant's direction, and under the cabin floor a considerable sum of money was unearthed, and some jewelry contained in tin cans. Appellant believed, from the persistent claim of defendant that he was about to be robbed, and from his conduct in the matter, that some question was raised as to defendant's sanity, and that whether the existence of this money was or was not a mere delusion was a material fact bearing upon defendant's sanity. It seems that defendant stated with great accuracy just what he had buried away in each tin can, and it was thought by appellant that to that extent this knowledge showed that he was sane; and it was claimed by appellant that the money so seized was necessary evidence to be used at the trial, and hence could not be taken by attachment. It is not disputed that the money belonged to defendant. His examination took place on April 11, 1898, and his trial began on June 8th following. He was convicted on June 13th, and was sentenced to imprisonment for life.

1. It is claimed that the affidavit of plaintiff for the order of examination is fatally defective, because it fails to state facts showing that the garnishee has property of the judgment debtor; that the statement in the affidavit that such garnishee "has property of said judgment debtor," etc., is a mere conclusion of law; and hence the affidavit is a nullity and the order void. The point was not raised at the hearing in the superior court. Appellant appeared and answered, and proceeded to the hearing upon the citation issued upon this affidavit, and appellant must be held to have waived any objection to its sufficiency. Furthermore, we think the affidavit was a substantial compliance with section 717, Code Civ. Proc.

2. It is further claimed that sections 717, 719, Code Civ. Proc., are unconstitutional, for the reason that no provision is made for notice to the judgment debtor and no opportunity given him to be heard. The question has been otherwise decided by this court. High v. Bank, 95 Cal. 386, 30 Pac. 556.

3. It is claimed that defendant was civilly dead when the order was made, and the court was without jurisdiction to make the order; citing Pen. Code, §§ 673-675. By section 673, "a sentence of imprisonment in a state prison for any term less than for life suspends all the civil rights of the person so sentenced. * * *" By section 674, "a person sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for life is thereafter deemed civilly dead." By section 675 it is provided "that the provisions of the last two preceding sections must not be construed to render the persons therein mentioned incompetent as witnesses upon the trial of a criminal action or proceeding, or incapable of making and acknowledging a sale or conveyance of property." Section 677 provides: "No conviction of any person for crime works any forfeiture of any property, except in cases in which forfeiture is expressly imposed by law. * * *" Under a statute similar to section 674, it was held in Re Nerac's Estate, 35 Cal. 392, that the suspension of the civil rights of the person sentenced to imprisonment in a state prison for a term less than life did not suspend the civil rights of his creditors, and that they still had the right to subject the property of the person so sentenced to the satisfaction of their judgment; and that no consequences follow, except such as are declared by the statute. Appellant invokes the rule expressio unius, etc., and argues that the consequences of civil death are such that the only rights reserved are those enumerated in section 675. If this be conceded as to the person sentenced, still it does not follow that the creditors lose all rights. He may not be entitled to bring an action, but actions may be brought against him. 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 65, tit. "Civil Death," and cases cited. The proceeding before us is not against the defendant, but against his creditor. The action was begun before defendant's trial on the criminal charge, but judgment was not entered until after his conviction. But we think plaintiff had a right to enforce the judgment subsequently entered. We cannot agree with appellant that civil death is identical in law with physical death. We are referred to In re Nerac's Estate, supra, where it was said: "If the convict be sentenced for life he becomes civiliter mortuus, or dead in law, in respect to his estate, as if he was dead in fact." That case called for no expression of opinion as to the consequences following a life sentence, and the declaration was therefore obiter. Our statute now makes the life convict a competent witness in criminal actions, and capable "of making and acknowledging a sale or conveyance of property." Section 675, supra. If he may sell his property, we can see no reason why his property may not be taken to pay his debts.

4. Error is claimed because the court refused to admit evidence that at the trial of defendant on the charge of murder his counsel interposed the plea of insanity. There was no claim made by appellant at the hearing of this citation that defendant was in fact insane. On the contrary, appellant expressly refrained from taking that position, and it must be presumed, from the fact that defendant was convicted, that the plea of insanity, if offered, did not prevail. Appellant was therefore not prejudiced by excluding this evidence, even if it were material, which we do not think it was.

5. The principal question presented is whether the money was protected from process because in custodia legis. It was held in Hathaway v. Brady, 26 Cal. 581, where money is deposited with the sheriff by a defendant to procure the release of an attachment, it is in the custody of the law; but, as was said in Kimball v. Richardson-Kimball Co., 111 Cal. 386, 43 Pac. 1111, this is true because the money thus deposited becomes "a symbol of, and stands in place of, the attached property." In the Kimball Case it was said: "It is only where property is lawfully taken by virtue of legal process that it is in the custody of the law, and not otherwise,"—citing Gilman v. Williams, 7 Wis. 334. It is generally held to be the law that property taken from a prisoner on his arrest by an officer charged with that duty is not, while in the hands of such officer, subject to levy, and cannot be reached by the process of garnishment; the reason being that to hold otherwise would lead to a grave abuse of criminal process. 1 Freem. Ex'ns, § 130a; 2 Freem. Ex'ns, § 255. Mr. Freeman says, supra: "This exception is not strictly on the ground that the property is in the custody of the law, for the charge under which the arrest was made may not relate to the property taken from the prisoner, and under no circumstances could it affect the title thereto." In the case here the money was not taken at the time of the arrest, nor from the person of the defendant, and had no connection whatever with the cause of the arrest. Appellant came into possession of it by direction of defendant, and with his consent. Appellant is neither more nor less than the bailee of defendant. He does not hold the money in his official capacity, and owes no duty to disburse it in such capacity, and we think it may be reached by garnishment. Mechem, Pub. Off. § 876; Wap. Attachm. § 411, citing the instructive case of Ex parte Hurn, 92 Ala. 102, 9 South. 515. Appellant makes the shadowy claim that the money was necessary at the trial to aid in establishing defendant's sanity. But the evidence is that it was not introduced at the trial, and it appears to us it was in no sense necessary to have the money in court to show the fact upon which appellant relied to prove defendant's sanity. The important fact was that he told with accuracy how much money he had and where it could be found. That could be conclusively proved without proof of the money itself. Suppose the money had been lost by or stolen from appellant before the trial of defendant; would there have been any difficulty in proving the essential fact bearing upon defendant's sanity? Certainly not. It seems to us quite clear that this money was not in the custody of the law, although in the custody of an officer of the law. The custody of the officer is not necessarily nor always the custody of the law. We are not called upon to say under what circumstances property taken from or belonging to a prisoner will be protected from civil process in civil actions against the prisoner. The decisions are not altogether harmonious upon the question. But we are satisfied that the property in the present case does not come within the reason of the rule, and ought not to be placed within its operation. The order should be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

GRIMBLEY v. HARROLD et al. (Sac. 541.)¹
(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1899.)

INSURANCE—CHANGING BENEFICIARY—AGREEMENT NOT TO CHANGE BENEFICIARY ENFORCEABLE—JURISDICTION—BY-LAWS—
ESTOPPEL—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. The beneficiary named in a certificate of a mutual benefit insurance association, where she became such pursuant to an agreement with the member that she would pay all future assessments, and take care of him, and that he would not change the beneficiary, cannot be changed without the consent of the beneficiary.

2. Plaintiff was the beneficiary of a certificate in a mutual benefit insurance association, the by-laws of which provided for the appointment of a board of arbitration to hear and determine who were its beneficiaries under its certificates, when conflicting claims are set up, and that the decision of such board should be conclusive, subject to appeal to the grand lodge. After death of insured, another claimed the proceeds of the certificate, and plaintiff filed her claim with the grand lodge, and subsequently adduced evidence of her claim before the board of arbitration, which decided against her, whereupon she commenced this suit, and did not appeal to the grand lodge. Held, that plaintiff is not bound by the decision of the board of arbitration, nor can the association, by its by-laws, deprive the courts of jurisdiction of the property rights vested by virtue of membership.

3. A beneficiary in a certificate issued by a mutual benefit life insurance association is not estopped to question the validity of a certificate issued to another subsequent to the issuance to her of her certificate, on the ground that she failed to state to the former the ground on which she claimed it, when the member demanded its return for the purpose of having a new certificate issued to such other, where he did not inquire the reasons of such refusal.

4. Evidence that plaintiff performed services in addition to the obligation alleged in the complaint to have been assumed by her, and that such services were a part of the consideration of the contract, though not so alleged, is not prejudicial to defendant, where the proof of the performance of the agreement alleged is sufficient, and plaintiff would be entitled to recover on the cause alleged.

5. As the extent to which cross-examination of a witness may be carried is largely a matter of discretion with the trial judge, the supreme court will not say that it was error to sustain an objection to a question in itself proper, where a witness has been exhaustively examined concerning the ultimate fact sought to be proved by such question.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Action by Helen Jane Grimbley against C. H. Harrold and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant C. H. Harrold appealed. Affirmed.

Budd & Thompson, for appellant. O. B. Parkinson, for respondent.

BRITT, C. There was evidence at the trial of this action that in the summer of the year 1894 the plaintiff, a young woman, upon the request and at the expense of one Frederick Shelton, her uncle, left her home in England, and came to this state, where said Shelton resided, for the purpose of caring for him in sickness; he proposing in rather indefinite terms to make some provision for her, saying, among other things, that he had some papers he wanted her to have. Shelton was then, and had been for several years previously, a member of the society called the Ancient Order of United Workmen, which has for one of the purposes of its organization the payment of a sum of money ($2,000), upon the death of any member, "to such person as he may, while living, direct, according to the rules, laws, and regulations of the order." He held the usual "beneficiary certificate," declaring his right of membership in said order, and his right to designate the beneficiary of said fund. The rules, laws, and regulations aforesaid allow any member to change his direction for payment of such money, and on August 16, 1894, Shelton surrendered the said certificate previously issued and obtained from the defendant grand lodge of said order the issuance of another, wherein he designated the plaintiff as the beneficiary thereunder, which new certificate he at once delivered to the plaintiff. Regarding this transaction the plaintiff alleged in her complaint, and the court found in substance, on sufficient evidence, that at and prior to the time of the delivery of such certificate to plaintiff it was agreed between Shelton and herself that she should thereafter pay all his dues to said order and all assessments levied by it against him, and that she should be the beneficiary to receive said sum of $2,000 at his death, and that he would not change the certificate in that behalf; that plaintiff accordingly did pay such dues and assessments after said August 16, 1894, and until July, 1895, when the order declined to receive the same from her further, for the reason that Shelton, in April, 1895, had changed the designation of the beneficiary of his insurance to the defendant Harrold, and had procured a new certificate to be issued in his favor, although plaintiff did not consent to such change, and still held the certificate of August 16, 1894, and refused to surrender the same. The court also found, though this circumstance was not alleged in the complaint, that plaintiff further undertook, as part of her said agreement with Shelton, that she would personally care for him as long as she was able, and that she performed this promise, except as excused or prevented by Shelton from so doing. There were other findings that, besides procuring the new beneficiary certificate of April, 1895, in Harrold's favor, Shelton also conveyed to him other property, real and personal, all upon certain trusts which Harrold undertook to execute; that out of funds thus derived Harrold paid certain debts of Shelton and his dues and assessments as a member of said order in July and August, 1895; and that Harrold had no knowledge of any contract between Shelton and plaintiff respecting said insurance money until after Shelton's death, but did know of her refusal to surrender the certificate she had received from Shelton, or to consent to his proposed change of the beneficiary thereof. Shelton died August 18, 1895. Among the rules of said order it is provided that a board of five members, to be appointed by the grand master workman, shall constitute "a board of arbitration to hear and determine all controverted questions which may arise as to the disbursement of the beneficiary fund under the control of the grand lodge, * * * and as to the liability of the grand lodge for any claim made against it by those claiming to be the beneficiaries of deceased members, and also as to who are entitled as beneficiaries when conflicting claims are set up," and that the decision of said board shall be conclusive, subject to appeal to the grand lodge or supreme lodge, "it being the purpose of this provision that all these rights shall be thus determined without recourse to the courts of law." After Shelton's death, plaintiff presented to said grand lodge her claim for payment of the said certificate of August 16, 1894, and her protest against payment of the subsequent certificate in favor of Harrold; whereupon, under the regulation just mentioned, the grand master appointed a board of arbitration, which heard such claim and protest, and decided adversely to plaintiff. She took no appeal to any other tribunal of the order, but, instead, brought this action against said grand lodge and Harrold. The answer of the grand lodge herein is, in effect, that it holds the sum of $2,000, to be paid to the party which the court by its judgment may decide to be entitled to receive the same. Judgment went for plaintiff, requiring the grand lodge to pay the money to her, and declaring that defendant Harrold is not entitled to any part thereof. Harrold has appealed.

Decisions of the courts of other states differ regarding the effect to be given to the contract of a member in societies such as the Ancient Order of United Workmen, whereby he assumes to dispose of his interest in the beneficiary fund of the order, virtually the proceeds of a policy of life insurance; but the question is hardly an open one here, so strong have been the intimations of this court that such a contract, when valid and not in conflict with the lawful conditions upon which the order grants the insurance, is effectual as against the subsequent attempt of the member to violate or annul it; and this must be held to be the law. Jory v. Supreme Council, 105 Cal. 20, 29, 38 Pac. 524; Adams v. Grand Lodge, 105 Cal. 325, 38 Pac. 914; Hoeft v. Supreme Lodge, 113 Cal. 91, 45 Pac. 185; Leaf v. Leaf, 92 Ky. 166, 17 S. W. 354, 854; Smith v. Society, 123 N. Y. 85, 25 N. E. 197; Maynard v. Vanderwerker (Sup.) 24 N. Y. Supp. 932. The case last cited, which is precisely in point here, was decided at special term, and the judgment was reversed on appeal upon a question of fact; but the opinion then delivered proceeds on the assumption that the law held by the trial judge was correct. 27 N. Y. Supp. 714, 76 Hun, 25.

Appellant urges that, as plaintiff took no appeal from the decision of the board of arbitration, she is concluded thereby; that this is the effect of the laws of the order under which the beneficiary certificate was issued. But the certificate issued to Shelton, like a policy of life insurance, evidenced a valuable right of property, and we cannot concede that it was competent for the order, while clothing him with such right, to confer upon its internal judicatories the sole power of determining the fact and consequences of any disposition he might make or attempt to make of it. Suppose Shelton had been permitted to designate a beneficiary by last will and testament; it would seem to be an extraordinary proposition to say that the society could confer on its own tribunals exclusive power to determine, in relation to the proceeds of the certificate, whether any will had been executed, allow or refuse it probate, and decide how it should be construed. The case before us is, in principle, but little different. The order in this instance has with entire fairness declared its indifference between the contending claimants; but the appellant, Harrold, insists that, to entitle her to recover as against him, the plaintiff must make a case on which she would be entitled to recover against the order, and cites some authorities to that effect. However that may be, we think the questions whether Shelton contracted with plaintiff as she alleged, and, if he did, what right she acquired in the subject of the contract, pertained to the jurisdiction of the courts of the political sovereign, the state, and it was not compulsory upon her to resort elsewhere. Relief Dept. v. White, 41 Neb. 547, 59 N. W. 747; Daniher v. Grand Lodge, 10 Utah, 110, 37 Pac. 245. See, also, Whitney v. Association, 52 Minn. 378, 54 N. W. 184; Bac. Ben. Soc. §§ 71, 450; Moore v. Woolsey, 4 El. & Bl. 243. Nothing to the contrary was held in Robinson v. Templar Lodge, 117 Cal. 370, 49 Pac. 170. That was a dispute between a member and the organization concerning rights founded immediately on the contract of membership, and which the member had, by assenting to its rules, agreed to submit to its tribunals. The plaintiff here is not a member of the order, and her cause of action contains an element wholly foreign to its laws, viz. her contract with Shelton.

It is contended, however, that plaintiff voluntarily left her demands to arbitration, and must abide by the result, even though the rules of the order in that behalf were not binding on her. The assumption of fact for this argument fails. The plaintiff presented to the grand lodge her demand for payment to herself, and protest against payment to Harrold. This was a proper course, whatever other proceedings she designed to take. The grand lodge did not respond directly. Her demand and protest were assigned for hearing to the board appointed by the grand master. Although called a board of arbitration, it lacked, as concerned the plaintiff, a prime essential of a legal body of arbitrators, in that she had no voice in selecting its members. It was really but a committee upon which, under the rules of the order, was devolved the duty of answering plaintiff's demand. The fact that she produced evidence before it to support her claims could not convert the hearing into an arbitration any more than if she had presented her proofs before the grand lodge itself. Compare Kumle v. Grand Lodge, 110 Cal. 204, 42 Pac. 634.

Appellant claims that the court should have held his equitable right to receive the money to be superior to that of plaintiff. This is asserted mainly on the circumstance that plaintiff did not inform him of her contract with her uncle at the time the latter demanded the surrender of the certificate she held in order that a new one might be issued to Harrold. But it appears that Harrold knew that plaintiff held the certificate, and that she denied the right of her uncle to deprive her of its benefits. This was sufficient to put him on inquiry as to the ground of her claim, and we cannot hold that she is estopped by failure to disclose to him particulars of which, so far as appears, he did not inquire.

It is objected that the court erred in receiving evidence that the plaintiff bestowed care on her uncle during his illness, and that this was part of the consideration for his agreement to make her the beneficiary of his insurance, on the ground that the complaint contained no allegation that she agreed to render such attentions. It is said, also, that the finding on this subject was beyond the issues. But the evidence tended to exhibit the relative situation of the parties towards each other, and hence to make more probable the matter which was averred, viz. that Shelton, in consideration of her payment of his dues and assessments, agreed that she should receive the insurance. It was therefore relevant. And, if the finding was beyond the issue,—which we do not decide,—yet, as the facts found within the issue were sufficient evidence of a valid contract, the appellant is not injured.

Plaintiff testified that she paid her uncle's dues and assessments, as she agreed with him, from her earnings at domestic service. On cross-examination counsel sought to ascertain whether she had funds sufficient for this purpose, with a view, apparently, to showing that the money she paid was really furnished by Shelton. She testified that she took some instruction in music, but paid for it out of her own money. Counsel inquired how much she paid for the lessons, and the court sustained an objection to the question. Possibly the question was proper cross-examination in the abstract; but the ultimate matter to be developed by this line of inquiry was whether she paid the assessments from funds supplied for that purpose by her uncle, and upon this it appears that appellant's counsel did examine her fully, and educed quite explicit answers. The extent to which cross-examination shall be carried is in some degree a matter of discretion with the trial court, and we cannot say that in this instance its discretion was abused. Other points argued are not important. We discover no material error in the record. The judgment and order denying a new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

BEMMERLY et al. v. WOODWARD.

(Sac. 573.)¹

EXECUTORS AND TRUSTEES—LIABILITY—COMPOUND INTEREST—CLAIM AGAINST ESTATE—PRESENTATION—CORRECTION OF JUDGMENT.

1. Where a will constitutes the executors trustees, and they fail to keep the funds invested as is their duty as trustees, but mingle them with their own, and occasionally draw them from the bank for their own private purposes, they will be charged with compound interest.

2. Though a trustee, who has failed to keep the trust funds invested, and has mingled them with his own, should be charged with compound interest up to his death, his estate is not thereafter liable therefor; the estate being simply indebted on a claim.

3. That a claim had not been presented against an estate before action thereon, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1500, is mere matter of abatement, which is waived unless pleaded, provided the claim is thereafter presented within the time limited for presentation of claims.

4. Where a complaint is entitled B. and V., "heirs and administrators" of B., but it is plainly stated in the body of the complaint that they sue in their representative character, and that the estate of B. has not been distributed, and judgment is so entitled, the entry of judgment for plaintiffs in their individual capacity is a clerical mistake, which may be corrected at any time.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county.

Action by Albert M. Bemmerly and another, described in the caption of the complaint as "Heirs and Administrators of the Estate of Michael Bemmerly, Deceased," against Mary Woodward, executrix of G. W. Woodward, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Modified.

E. B. Mering and A. L. Hart, for appellants.
J. C. Ball, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an action against the executrix of a deceased executor to compel an accounting and to recover property of the estate. The plaintiffs are, respectively, administrator and administratrix, with the will annexed, of the estate of Michael Bemmerly, deceased. The complaint shows that Bemmerly died in 1877, testate, and leaving an estate of great value. G. W. Woodward and Henrietta Bemmerly were named in the will as executor and executrix, and both were appointed and duly qualified in June, 1877. Mrs. Bemmerly resigned as executrix in 1879, and G. W. Woodward took into his possession the entire estate, and continued in the exclusive possession thereof until the 21st day of December, 1894, when he died. While executor he received the rents, issues, and profits of the estate, and "thereby made and received large profits." The will is not set out in the complaint, but it imposed upon the executors a continuing trust, in addition to the ordinary duties of executors. The fourth subdivision reads as follows: "(4) I direct that all the balance of all my real estate of which I may die possessed shall not be sold or divided, except as hereinafter provided; that is to say: Whenever one of my children becomes of age, it shall be entitled to his or her share of the estate then remaining in the hands of my executors, and they are hereby directed and authorized to deliver up such child's portion by fair division made of the lands then belonging to the estate." It is charged that on the 2d day of January, 1884, the executor filed his last annual account, which was settled and approved by the court, and from which it appears that he then had in his hands, in cash, $17,433.74. The estate consisted of a large amount of real estate and personal property, and it is charged that since the above annual account Woodward has made no return, but has rented the land and sold the product, from which he has realized large sums, which he has kept and mingled with his own property. The complaint contains allegations in regard to specific pieces of real estate, and as to each it is charged that Woodward received rents and profits, which he commingled with his own money; also statements of profits over and above expenses of each year, showing that at all times since the last annual account rendered, to his death, Woodward had a large amount of money in his hands belonging to said estate; also, that he yearly made sales of grain and other products without any order of court, and never made any report of such sales. There is also a general averment that all receipts from the estate were commingled by Woodward with his private funds, and were used in his private business, and for his own profit and gain, and have been so used since his death by the defendant, who is his executrix. The complaint contains no express averment that Woodward neglected to keep the money of the estate invested, as his duty was as trustee. The amended and supplemental complaint avers the due presentation of a proper claim against the estate of Woodward, but also shows that such presentation and rejection were after the commencement of this action. The answer admits nearly all the facts stated in the complaint, including the charge that Woodward received the moneys, and made large profits from the use and advantage thereof. By a very generous construction, it may be understood as denying that Woodward commingled the funds of the estate with his, or used them in his private business. It is worthy of note, however, that, while the answer admits that Woodward had in his hands for many years large sums belonging to the estate, no investments on behalf of the estate are set out. There is, however, in the complaint a general allegation that Woodward, while executor, acquired other property, from which he received rents and profits, and one piece of property so acquired is specified. The answer also includes a statement of the accounts of Woodward, which itself shows that Woodward at all times since 1884 had on hand large sums of money which he did not invest for the advantage of the estate.

The findings are generally in favor of plaintiffs, but upon the questions of fact principally litigated and discussed they are strangely indistinct and unsatisfactory. The main point of difference at the trial was whether Woodward had mingled the funds of the estate with his private funds, and had used the estate money in his own business and for his private advantage. I think it appears by necessary inference from the findings that Woodward did use the money of the estate in his private business, but it is not distinctly so found, nor is there a finding of any special investment made of estate moneys for his own advantage. The next most important issue was whether Woodward had neglected to invest money in his hands as trustee for the advantage of the trust. There is no express finding upon the subject, but, as in regard to the other matter, I think it appears by necessary inference that the trustee had and held in his hands for years sums of money which he ought to have invested for the advantage of the estate, and did not. Whether such inferences are necessary from the findings is matter of argument, and the most troublesome question presented by the appeal. It is found that Woodward took possession of the estate, and rented the land for one-fourth of the crop; that the yearly crops were placed in the warehouse by the tenants, and were sold by Woodward without any order of court, and no report of such sales, or showing receipt of the money, has ever been made; also, that Woodward dealt with the property as his own, and his management thereof was prudent; also, that he kept no account with a bank of the funds of the estate, but had a general account in his own name with the Bank of Woodland, where he deposited his own money and that of the estate, and checked out of this account money for his private use and for current expenses of the estate; at times he drew all the money from the bank, and occasionally the account was overdrawn, and frequently there was less money in the account than the money due from Woodward to the estate; also, that he mingled the funds of the estate with his own, and used them indiscriminately. It does not appear necessarily from this finding that Woodward used the estate money for his own advantage. The evidence shows that during this time Woodward purchased $50,000 worth of real estate for himself, and that immediately after each purchase the general bank account was much depleted, and sometimes overdrawn. The findings are, however, strangely silent upon these important matters. Still, there is a finding which contains a statement of an account from the last annual settlement made in January, 1884. This shows the receipts and expenditures of each year, and that since the year 1884 Woodward had, or should have had, constantly on hand a large sum of money belonging to the estate; and there is no finding that Woodward ever made any investments or loans for the estate. Indeed, it is not alleged that he did so in the answer. At the best, the answer only denies that he mingled the funds or used the money of the estate for his private purposes. True, the complaint does not charge distinctly that Woodward, as trustee, neglected to keep the funds invested so as to earn an income for the beneficiaries; but it is charged that he mingled the trust funds with his own, and used them for his private purposes. To show an honest execution of the trust, it was incumbent upon Woodward to show what he did with the money. In the absence of such a showing, I think we must conclude that he did not use them for the estate.

The will constitutes the executors trustees, and there was never any settlement of the administration, and distribution of the estate to the trustees. Annual accounts should have been rendered, and the estate managed as required of executors. As the administration was left open because of the trust, Woodward was, of course, responsible as trustee, and should have kept the money invested for his beneficiaries. As he did not do that, but mingled the funds with his own, and even, under the findings, must have occasionally drawn them out of the bank for his own private purposes, I think he was properly charged with compound interest. Civ. Code, § 2262; Estate of Cousins, 111 Cal. 445, 44 Pac. 182; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1076; In re Hilliard, 83 Cal. 427, 23 Pac. 393.

In the judgment, compound interest was charged up to the death of Woodward, and also against his estate up to the time of the entry of judgment. It is contended that it was error to allow compound interest since the death of Woodward. The complaint charges that all the property of the estate, including the money, upon the death of Woodward passed into the possession of the executrix of Woodward, "who continues to hold and use the same, and neglects and refuses to pay over said moneys, or account for the same," and, again, "has been and now is held by said Mary Woodward, as a constructive trust, to account for the same, the interest and profit thereof." Of course, Mrs. Woodward could not, as executrix of Woodward's estate, assume an active trust in favor of the estate of Bemmerly, nor could she make the estate of Woodward liable for her own personal tort. The recovery in this case is upon the theory that Woodward had mingled the money of the estate with his own, and that no funds came to the executrix bearing the earmarks of Bemmerly's estate. Under such circumstances, the estate of Bemmerly was required to present a claim to the executrix; and, under the law, the executrix could not pay the demand until it was allowed and payment authorized by the court. The executrix owed no duty to the beneficiaries of the trust to keep the money invested, and she could not pay until authorized. The estate was simply indebted in that amount. Under such circumstances, interest could not be charged. The judgment must therefore be modified so that interest will be charged only up to the death of Woodward.

The supplemental complaint avers that the claim for the amount due plaintiffs was duly presented to the defendant, as executrix of the estate of Woodward, within the time allowed by law for the presentation of claims, and that it was rejected. These allegations are admitted in the answer. Still the complaint itself shows that the suit was commenced before the claim had been presented and rejected. There was no plea in abatement, nor was any objection made on this account at the trial or before judgment. Although there is some controversy upon the subject, we will assume that the objection was made in the statement in the application for a new trial. Section 1493, Code Civ. Proc., provides that all claims arising upon contracts must be presented within the time limited; any claim not so presented is barred forever. Section 1498 enacts that, if rejected, suit must be brought within three months; and section 1500, that no holder of a claim shall maintain an action thereon, unless the claim is first presented, except upon mortgage liens.

It is contended that plaintiffs had no cause of action at the time that the suit was commenced, and such objection may be made at any time in the trial court, although it cannot be made for the first time in this court. It has been held, however, that this is a mere matter of abatement, which is waived unless pleaded. Formerly such pleas could only be interposed before a plea to the merit. Under our Code all defenses may be included in one answer, but, if a defense which is mere matter of abatement is not made by that time, it should be deemed waived. In the case of Hentsch v. Porter, 10 Cal. 555, it is said: "We think it clear that the failure to aver the presentment is not such a fatal objection to the complaint as to make judgment by default a nullity, or reviewable on appeal." And again: "In this case the objection comes too late. It must be presumed, in favor of sustaining the judgment of the district court, that proof was made of the disallowance of the claim of the administrator, which supplied the want of averment to that effect." See, also, Coleman v. Woodworth, 28 Cal. 568; Bank v. Howland, 42 Cal. 129; Drake v. Foster, 52 Cal. 225; Preston v. Knapp, 85 Cal. 559, 24 Pac. 811. In these last cases it is merely said that the objection cannot be made for the first time in this court, and Hentsch v. Porter is cited as authority. That was sufficient to dispose of those cases, but the rule was not so limited, nor do those cases suggest the reason for the rule. It is fully shown in Hentsch v. Porter. It is simply matter of abatement,—a defense which is not favored, and must be made by plea, and in proper time, or it is waived. If so waived, the court will be rarely justified in permitting the defense to be made later. In this case, if the defense had been promptly made, plaintiffs could have dismissed their suit and brought another. But if, after three months had elapsed after the claim was rejected, the point could be successfully urged, plaintiffs would have lost their right of action. If, however, the time for the presentation of claims had wholly elapsed before or after suit brought, and the claim had not been presented, it would have been a different matter. Then the claims would be forever barred, and it would be both the privilege and the duty of the executrix to urge the point. And she would be entitled, as matter of right, to file a supplemental answer, if the defense had accrued after the issues had been made up. It is clear that the defense was waived in this case.

The next point of importance urged is that the judgment as first entered was void, and the amendment made while the motion for a new trial was under consideration was wholly unauthorized, and therefore also void. Perhaps the objection is felo de se, for, if the first attempt to enter judgment was a total failure, there was, as matter of law, no judgment until the amendment, for the first time, made it valid. The point is that in the judgment, as first entered, it was decreed that "Albert M. Bemmerly and Nettie E. Vickroy do have and recover," while they could only recover, if at all, in their representative capacities. In the caption to the judgment the plaintiffs are described as "Heirs of and Administrators of the Estate," etc. This entitling of the case, which, so far as it has any significance, shows an impossible case, and which also afflicts the complaint, has bred this unnecessary trouble. Of course, no one could think for a minute that the heirs of Bemmerly and the administrators of his estate could join in such a complaint, although by special statute they are permitted to join in certain cases. The pleader probably had some doubt as to the proper parties, because of the additional trust imposed upon the executor by the will; but surely plaintiffs could not, in the same complaint and by the same allegations, allege rights which to a certain extent are inconsistent with each other. One theory implies that a distribution of the estate has been had; the other, that the estate has not been distributed. In the body of the complaint, however, it is plainly stated that plaintiffs sue in their representative character, and their appointment and qualification as administrators are set out, and these allegations are expressly admitted in the answer. The claim presented is alleged to have been presented by them in their representative capacity, and it is further averred that the estate has not been distributed. Under these circumstances, I think it plainly appears upon the face of the record that the entry of the judgment for the individual plaintiffs was a clerical mistake, and that the correction was proper at any time, and defendants are not aggrieved thereby. It does not follow that it was not a clerical error because the judgment is signed by the judge.

It seems to be admitted that it was error to compound the interest with the principal on July 10, 1897. This is relatively an unimportant matter, but can be corrected without a new trial.

If there was error in fixing the compensation of Woodward as trustee, in my judgment such error was to the advantage of defendant. It may well be doubted whether anything should have been allowed, considering the manifest abuse of his trust on the part of Woodward.

I think the partial grant of a new trial sufficiently defines the issues to be retried. Of course, if upon such retrial a new judgment is necessitated, it must be entered. It cannot be supposed that the court has directed a retrial of the issue without the power to determine the issue upon the evidence to be taken. The trial court is directed to modify the judgment in regard to the allowance of interest in accordance with this opinion, and further, should it be rendered necessary by the new trial ordered.

In re STEELE'S ESTATE. (L. A. 608.)
PERPETUITIES.

1. A will leaving property in trust to pay one-third of the income to testator's widow for life, to pay to each of his three minor children during the minority of each two-ninths of the annual income, to pay to each of them as they respectively attain majority one-ninth of the value of the property as appraised when the eldest of them attains majority, to pay a like amount to each of them as they respectively attain the age of 25 years, and to pay to each of them while between the age of majority and the age of 25 years one-ninth of the annual income, does not violate the law against perpetuities, as the express trusts may not, by any possibility, suspend the power of alienation for a period longer than the continuance of lives in being; there being several and distinct trusts as to each of the children, though they may fail by reason of the death of the children before distribution.

2. There can be no "accumulations" beyond minority, where the trust provides for payment of the income annually.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

In the matter of the estate of Charles A. Steele, deceased. Petition of W. M. Steele and others for a partial distribution was denied, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. P. James and F. R. Willis, for appellants. W. J. Hunsaker and N. P. Conrey, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This appeal is from an order denying appellants' petition for a partial distribution of said estate. The petitioners, W. M. Steele, Charles A. Steele, and Idella D. Steele (appellants here), are children and heirs at law of said testator, and who, by the terms of the will, were excluded from any participation in said estate. Their chief contention is that said will purports to vest said estate in a trustee for the benefit of the widow and certain other children of the testator, and that said trust is void under the provisions of the Civil Code against perpetuities. Said will was executed January 27, 1897. After directing the payment of debts, funeral expenses, etc., and making a special bequest to his wife of furniture and other articles held for home and personal use, it bequeathed and devised to George B. Shaffer, as trustee, all the residue of his estate, in trust, for the following purposes: "(a) To pay and keep paid out of said trust estate all taxes, assessments, and other necessary expenses and indebtedness incident to the management of the trust estate. (b) To sell, transfer, and convey, upon such terms as he may deem to be for the benefit of the estate, any of the property thereof, and to keep the estate in the form of improved income-bringing real property or well secured interest-bearing loans, giving preference to mortgages on improved realty. (c) To pay one-third of the net annual income in quarterly installments to my wife, Rose B. Wallace Steele, during the entire term of her natural life. (d) To pay to the guardian of the estate of my daughter, Viola A. Steele, during her minority, two-ninths of the net annual income of the trust estate. (e) To pay to the guardian of the estate of my daughter, Hazel A. Steele, during her minority, two-ninths of the net annual income of the trust estate. (f) To pay to the guardian of the estate of my son, Fred A. Steele, during his minority, two-ninths of the net annual income of the trust estate. (g) To pay to each of my said children, Viola, Hazel, and Fred, as they respectively attain their legal majority, a sum of money equal to one-ninth of the value of the trust estate, as appraised under authority of the proper court at the time when the eldest of said three children shall attain her majority. Instead of money, the said trustee shall have power to deliver to either of said children well-secured notes or bonds and mortgages, if the donee shall elect to accept the same. (h) To pay or deliver in like manner to each of said three children above named, as they shall respectively attain the age of twenty-five years, one-ninth of the value of the trust estate, as in like manner appraised at the time when the eldest of said three children shall attain the age of twenty-five years. (i) To pay to each of said three children above named, while they shall be respectively between the age of majority and the age of twenty-five years, one-ninth of the net annual income of the trust estate. (k) Upon the death of my said wife, Rose B. Wallace Steele, the portion of my estate not included in the foregoing provisions made for my three children above named shall be deemed to be included in, and together with and as being a part of, the said trust estate, for the exclusive use and benefit of said three children, Viola A., Hazel A., and Fred A. Steele, and shall, as to both income and principal, pass to the said three children above named equally, share and share alike, at the same times and in like manner and proportions as have been hereinabove directly provided respecting the two-thirds of the estate first given for the benefit of said three children." The will was admitted to probate in July, 1897, and Walter Lindley was duly appointed and qualified as executor on September 3, 1897. Said petition for partial distribution was filed January 13, 1898, and objections thereto were duly filed by the executor, Walter Lindley, the trustee, George B. Shaffer, and Viola A. Steele, Hazel A. Steele, and Frank A. Steele, named in the will as beneficiaries under said trust. Said beneficiaries, being minors, appeared by said G. B. Shaffer, their guardian. The objections filed to the petition were that it did not state facts sufficient to authorize a decree of partial distribution, and that petitioners were not interested in said estate. Upon the hearing, the court entered an order sustaining the objections, and denying said petition, and from that order the petitioners appeal.

The principal question is whether this will is void under the following provisions of the Civil Code relating to perpetuities:

"Sec. 715. The absolute power of alienation cannot be suspended, by any limitation or condition whatever, for a longer period than during the continuance of the lives of persons in being at the creation of the limitation or condition, except in the single case mentioned in section 772.

"Sec. 716. Every future interest is void in its creation which, by any possibility, may suspend the absolute power of alienation for a longer period than is prescribed in this chapter. Such power of alienation is suspended when there are no persons in being by whom an absolute interest in possession can be conveyed."

"Sec. 771. The suspension of all power to alienate the subject of a trust, other than a power to exchange it for other property to be held upon the same trust, or to sell it and reinvest the proceeds to be held upon the same trust, is a suspension of the power of alienation, within the meaning of section 715."

Where the trust is created by will, the death of the testator is deemed the time of the creation of the limitation. Civ. Code, § 749. "A perpetuity is any limitation or condition which may (not which will or must) take away or suspend the absolute power of alienation for a period beyond the continuance of lives in being. The absolute power of alienation is equivalent to the power of conveying an absolute fee." In re Walkerly's Estate, 108 Cal. 647, 41 Pac. 772. This is but a paraphrase of section 716, supra, which declares "void in its creation" every future interest which, "by any possibility, may suspend," etc. The statute does not permit us to wait and see whether events may not so transpire that in fact no perpetuity results; but if, under the terms of the deed or will creating the trust, when properly construed, the instrument, "by any possibility, may suspend" the absolute power of alienation beyond the continuance of lives in being, the instrument, whether a deed or will, is void, and no trust is created, nor any estate vested in the trustee. If the trust is valid, being an express trust, the beneficiaries take no estate or interest in the property, but may enforce the performance of the trust. Civ. Code, § 863. The petition in this case alleged that Viola, Hazel, and Fred, beneficiaries named in said will, were, at the date of filing said petition, all minors under the age of 16 years, and in this proceeding they all appeared by their guardian. Said petition was filed January 13, 1898. By the terms of the will, the trustee is directed to pay to the widow one-third of the net annual income during her natural life, and to the guardian of each of said three children, during the minority of each, two-ninths of the net annual income. Under item 3, subdivision (g), the trustee is directed to pay to each of said three children, as they respectively attain majority, one-ninth of the value of the trust property, the value to be ascertained by an appraisal "under authority of the proper court at the time when the eldest of said three children shall attain her majority." Under this provision, it is contended by appellants that no payment or distribution of the one-ninth of the corpus of the trust property could be made to any of the three children until the eldest child arrived at the age of majority, and that, if she should die before majority, there could be no distribution of the corpus of the trust, since there could be no distribution without appraisal, and no appraisal could then be made. To meet this contention, respondent insists that the will should be construed as if it provided that the appraisal should be made when the eldest surviving child attained majority. If appellants' contention is sound, the express trust created by the will would fail of its purpose, not because it was void in its creation, but because it became impossible of execution by the happening of a subsequent event, which, not having occurred, cannot be urged as a ground upon which the present invalidity of the trust can be predicated. Non constat that she may attain the age of 25 years, and both appraisements be made as contemplated by the will. These considerations make it apparent that we need not consider whether respondent's construction of the will is correct or not. It must be apparent that appellants' present rights depend upon the present invalidity of the will, and not upon future contingencies which are not within the prohibition of the statute. The will makes no disposition of the property for a period longer than the continuance of lives in being. If the three children should all live until the whole of the property is distributed to them, they would take an absolute title in fee, and could at once, or at any time thereafter, convey such absolute title at their pleasure, without any limitation or restriction whatever. If they should all die before any distribution is made, the express trust created by the will for their benefit would fail for the want of beneficiaries, and so as to all property not distributed if they should all die after partial distribution; and the same would be true as to the interest of any one of the beneficiaries in case of his death.

Appellants further contend, however, that the trust must continue until the eldest daughter arrives at majority; that, whether she lives or dies, the trust must continue for a definite time; that as she may die before her majority, and as the trust must continue until the date at which she would attain her majority, if living, there is a time when the trust may exist which is not bounded by a life in being, there being no provision in the will by which the share or interest of any one of the three shall inure to the benefit of the survivor or survivors. But the trust does not survive the death of the beneficiary, these trusts being several and distinct. If the language had been that an appraisal and distribution could not be made until the eldest child attained her majority, "or would attain her majority, if living," a definite time would be fixed, not dependent on a life or lives in being, before which there could be no distribution, and in such case the trust would be void. In Re Hendy's Estate, 118 Cal. 656, 50 Pac. 753, it was said: "But it matters not whether it be by express terms or by necessary construction that lives in being measure the duration of the trust. If it appear with certainty that the trust cannot longer continue, the law against perpetuities is not violated. Thus a trust to A. until he arrives at the age of forty years would not violate the law, for every trust necessarily ceases when there is no beneficiary, and in the case instanced it is obvious that A.'s life is the ultimate and determinative measure of duration. In no event can the trust continue longer than his life. Upon his death before reaching the age of forty years the trust determines for the lack of a beneficiary." See, also, Becker v. Becker, 13 App. Div. 342, 43 N. Y. Supp. 17. When distribution is made, and only to the extent it is made, the trust property vests in the beneficiaries; and hence as to all property not distributed to the beneficiaries, or to either of them, during their respective lives, the express trust ceases and determines. Upon the death of one of the children before distribution, as to all property not distributed, his or her share does not pass to or vest in the co-beneficiaries under the trust, for the reason that until distribution such share is not vested in the beneficiary, but in the trustee. Under the terms of the will, however, the trustee is made the residuary legatee, and all property which, under the express trust declared in the will, fails to become vested in the beneficiary by reason of his death before distribution, vests in the trustee as a resulting trust for the benefit of the heirs at law of the testator, the ultimate disposition thereof under the express trust having failed. In Packard v. Marshall, 138 Mass. 301, it is said: "When the purposes of a trust have failed, or have been completely performed, the trustees then hold the estate for the benefit of the heirs at law as a resulting trust, and are answerable to them for it upon proper proceedings,"—citing Easterbrooks v. Tillinghast, 5 Gray, 17; Ackroyd v. Smithson, 1 Brown, Ch. 503; Cox v. Parker, 22 Beav. 168. See, also, 1 Perry, Trusts (4th Ed.) § 160. A distinction should be taken between trusts which fail for want of beneficiaries and trusts attempted to be created by will, but which are void under the statute against perpetuities or other statutes, and therefore vest no estate in the alleged trustee, while, if the trust is valid when created, and afterwards fails for the want of a beneficiary, a trust results in favor of the heirs of the testator; but, as the heirs and trustee may at any time convey an absolute estate, the resulting trust is not within the statute against perpetuities. Whether this resulting trust would be for the benefit of the heirs generally, or for the benefit of the survivor or survivors of the three beneficiaries named in the will, is not considered or decided, our only purpose being to show that in no event is a perpetuity created. It is contended, however, that the will provides for an appraisal when the eldest child attains her majority, and that, if she should die before reaching majority, no appraisal could be made, nor any distribution, since the distribution depends upon the appraisal. The obvious intention of the testator was that an equal and just distribution of the trust property should be made. The provision directing an appraisal is an administrative provision, designed to secure that end, and to which the trustee might properly have resorted had it not been mentioned in the will, or which the court, upon the proper application of any party interested, would compel. If we are right in these conclusions, it is apparent that this provision of the will can, by no possibility, create a perpetuity, and it is for that purpose alone that it is here considered.

Appellants also contend that "accumulations beyond minority are void." But here there are no accumulations. Where the rents, dividends, or other income is treated by the trustee as capital, and he invests it, makes a new capital of the income derived therefrom, and invests that, and so on, such capital and accrued income constitute "accumulations." Here the entire net income is distributed annually. The uncertainties in the will referred to by appellants relate to the matters hereinbefore considered. We think it clear that the will is not void under the statute against perpetuities; that, if all of the three children should live until after all the several distributions are made, viz. at majority, at the age of 25, and upon the death of the widow, there would appear to be no uncertainty as to the disposition intended; that the only uncertainties arise out of contingencies that may never happen, and which can be considered here only for the purpose of determining whether the will is void; for, if void, the deceased died intestate as to the trust property, and petitioners are entitled to share in the estate; but, if not void, while the trust may possibly fail as to the whole or parts of the trust property for want of beneficiaries, that fact does not show any present right in the petitioners. I advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; PRINGLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

GATELY v. CAMPBELL et al. (S. F. 1,038.) (Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1899.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—LIABILITY FOR DEFECTS—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In the absence of a covenant, a landlord is not liable for injury to the tenant from a faulty construction or defective condition of the building existing at the time of the lease, but unknown to the landlord.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 1941, declaring that the lessor of a building intended for occupation of human beings must put it in a condition fit for occupation, and section 1942, declaring that, if the landlord does not do so, the tenant may vacate or expend a month's rent for repairs, the landlord is not liable for injury to the tenant from such lack of condition.

3. An instruction which, after reciting evidence, states that, if the jury "are satisfied this testimony is true," they can find for defendant; if not, they will find such damages as they think proper,—satisfies Code Civ. Proc. § 608, providing that, if the court state the testimony, it must inform the jury that they are the exclusive judges of all questions of fact.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Delia Gately against H. F. Campbell and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Oliver Ellsworth, for appellant. E. J. Pringle, Jr., for respondents.

COOPER, C. Action for damages for personal injuries. Verdict and judgment for defendants. Motion for new trial, and order denying same. Appeal from judgment and order.

The plaintiff rented rooms in a tenement house at 8 Parks Place, in the city and county of San Francisco, in January, 1893. It does not clearly appear who was the owner of the premises so leased to plaintiff, but the arrangements were made with one Mrs. Falls, to whom plaintiff paid the rent. On the 8th of September, 1893, plaintiff claims to have been severely injured by a fall caused by the floor or platform giving way under her feet. In the first count of the third amended complaint it is alleged that the injury was caused by reason of the breaking away of the floor, which was not originally safely constructed, and was never constructed so as to be safe for human occupation, which facts were well known to defendants, and were never known or discovered by the plaintiff until she was so injured. In the second count of said amended complaint it is alleged that some two or three weeks prior to September 8th, one day while passing over the floor, plaintiff thought she felt the floor "shake a little," and, for fear the same might give way, she notified the defendants thereof, and requested them to examine the same, and strengthen it if they found it necessary. Both counts of the said amended complaint are sworn to by plaintiff. There is no testimony in the record tending to support the second count, but, on the contrary, the plaintiff testified that there was nothing during her tenancy that would indicate that there was danger in living there or in passing out and walking over the floor from day to day; that the floor looked all right. Counsel for plaintiff, in his brief, says that the contention of the plaintiff is "that the platform and its supports were faultily and unsafely constructed, and that the latter were rotten and decayed at the inception of the tenancy, a fact known to defendants, but unknown to, and concealed from, plaintiff." He again says in his brief: "No evidence was introduced to prove the dilapidations to have occurred subsequent to the beginning of the tenancy." Therefore it is apparent that there was no evidence to prove the second count of the amended complaint, and it was abandoned by plaintiff. We will now examine the first count. There is no allegation in the complaint of any covenant in the lease as to repairs, nor of any fraudulent representation or concealment of the condition of the leased premises. The controlling question left in this case is whether or not the landlord, in the absence of fraud, concealment, or covenant in the lease, is liable to the tenant for an injury suffered by him during his occupancy by reason of the defective condition or faulty construction of the leased premises. At the common law, the lessor is not liable for such injury. Keates v. Earl of Cadogan, 10 O. B. 591; Howard v. Doolittle, 3 Duer, 464; Tayl. Landl. & Ten. §§ 175a, 382. And this court has often laid down the same rule. Brewster v. De Fremery, 33 Cal. 341; Van Every v. Ogg, 59 Cal. 565; Sieber v. Blanc, 76 Cal. 173, 18 Pac. 260; Willson v. Treadwell, 81 Cal. 58, 22 Pac. 304; Daley v. Quick, 99 Cal. 181, 33 Pac. 859. Counsel for plaintiff, in his brief, seems to concede the rule, but claims that the premises were defective and unsafe at the time they were leased to the plaintiff, which facts were known to defendants, but unknown to plaintiff. There is no testimony in this record to support such claim; but, if there were such testimony, the question was fairly left to the jury, under the instructions of the court. It is claimed that it is the duty of a landlord leasing a building for the occupation of human beings to put it in a condition for such occupation,—citing Civ. Code, § 1941, which reads as follows: "The lessor of a building intended for the occupation of human beings must, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, put it into a condition fit for such occupation, and repair all subsequent dilapidations thereof which render it untenable, except such as are mentioned in section nineteen hundred and twenty-nine." This contention is answered by the fact that there is no testimony in the record that the building, at the time it was leased to plaintiff, was not in a condition fit for the occupation of human beings. The plaintiff said in her testimony: "Did not notice any decay or dilapidation about the premises when first rented, nor anything that needed repairing." And again: "Mrs. Falls stated that she was looking after the house generally, and wanted to know if there was anything needed to be done." A further and conclusive answer to this contention is that the obligation imposed upon the landlord by section 1941 should be and is limited by the extent of the privilege conferred upon the tenant by section 1942, and the only consequence of a breach of the landlord's obligation is that the tenant may either vacate the premises or expend one month's rent for repairs. Civ. Code, § 1942; Van Every v. Ogg, 59 Cal. 565; Sieber v. Blanc, 76 Cal. 173, 18 Pac. 260. It follows that the instructions given to the jury by the learned judge of the court below were correct. Most of the criticism of plaintiff's counsel is directed at the following instruction given by the court: "As I understand it, the plaintiff does not claim that Mrs. Falls ever said, before the injury, that she knew of the danger, or that the porch was liable to fall down. It is also in evidence by the testimony that the plaintiff herself did not apprehend any danger from the condition of the place. Then, these two parties, Mr. and Mrs. Falls, have been called, and they have testified that they never knew anything about it until it occurred. If you are satisfied that that testimony is true, you can find a verdict in favor of the defendants; if not, you will find for such damages as you shall think proper to allow, bearing in mind that in a case of this kind the duty of proving notice and knowledge upon the part of the agents rests upon the plaintiff." It is admitted that the constitution gives judges the right to state the testimony and declare the law; but it is claimed that, under the provisions of section 608, Code Civ. Proc., "if the court state the testimony of the case it must inform the jury that they are the exclusive judges of all questions of fact." We think the court left it plain to the jury that they were the exclusive judges of the facts. It said: "If you are satisfied this testimony is true, you can find a verdict in favor of the defendants; if not, you will find for such damages as you shall think proper to allow."

In the case of Jones v. Chalfant (Cal.) 31 Pac. 257, the instruction, "If these facts all appear in your minds as I have stated them, then your verdict will be for defendant," was held not error. In a case where there is no conflict of testimony, and the plaintiff could not recover under the facts as shown by the testimony, the judge could even instruct the jury what their verdict should be. It is claimed that the court committed error in not giving the instructions requested by plaintiff numbered 1 and 2. We have carefully examined these instructions, and think the court committed no error in refusing them. The first one was correctly refused, among other reasons, because it is based upon a presumption of facts not in the record. There is no evidence that the defendants in this case had knowledge of any such defects in the building as would render it unsafe or dangerous. The second one relates to the rule as to giving notice to the landlord in case of defect or dilapidations, and, if the landlord fail to repair, the tenant may do so and deduct one month's rent, etc. The requested instruction was not based upon any testimony in the case, as we have before attempted to show, and it therefore was not error to refuse it; and, further, it was given substantially in the charge of the court. It seems to us that counsel is now precluded from claiming the refusal as error in the face of the following statement in his brief: "The charge of the trial court is an able exposition of the law governing the rights of a tenant as against a landlord for injuries resulting from dilapidations arising subsequent to the inception of the tenancy; but it is submitted, with all respect to the learned trial judge, that it is not relevant to the claims of plaintiff in this case, who asserts a cause of action for damages suffered by reason of the negligence and practical fraud of defendants in leasing premises known to them to be unsafe and unfit for human occupancy without putting the same in repair, and concealing the true state of affairs from the tenant." If the instruction of the court in regard to the law giving the rights of a tenant as against a landlord for injuries arising from dilapidations subsequent to the inception of the lease "is not relevant to the claims of plaintiff," we cannot see how the instruction offered by counsel would be relevant. The testimony supports the verdict, and we find no prejudicial error in the record. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

In re ADAMS' ESTATE. (Sac. 569.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 1, 1899.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—SETTING APART HOMESTEAD—VALUE—DISCRETION OF COURT—INSOLVENCY OF ESTATE.

1. It is no objection to an order creating a probate homestead that the homestead exceeded $5,000 in value.

2. The evidence showed that a homestead for life only, set apart to a widow with four minor children to support, and no means of her own, consisted of 215 acres of arable land, on which were situated the dwelling house, barn, out-houses, etc., together with about 85 acres adjoining, of little, if any, value. Held, that the court did not abuse its discretion in making the order setting apart such homestead.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1465, providing that, where no statutory homestead has been selected, the court must set apart a homestead for the use of the surviving husband or wife and the minor children, the insolvency of an estate does not prevent a court from setting apart a probate homestead.

4. It is not necessary for the court to find on all the issues raised by an answer where they are as to matters entirely immaterial to the determination of the petition.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county.

Petition by Elizabeth Adams, widow of D. Q. Adams, to have a homestead set apart from the estate of decedent. From orders and judgments setting apart a probate homestead, the Bank of Woodland, a creditor, appeals. Affirmed.

N. A. Hawkins and Craig & Hawkins, for appellant. R. L. Simpson and R. E. Hopkins, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by the Bank of Woodland, a creditor of the above-named estate, from an order setting apart a probate homestead to the widow and minor children. No person other than said appellant objects to the order. A great deal of immaterial matter is contained in the transcript and discussed in the briefs. There are really only two questions involved: First, had the court authority to set apart a homestead of greater value than $5,000? and, second, did the court abuse its discretion in making the order appealed from?

1. The value of the homestead, as found by the court, was $11,139.70, and appellant contends that the order was invalid, because the premises set apart were of greater value than $5,000; but this contention cannot be maintained. It has been definitely settled that a court may create a probate homestead exceeding $5,000 in value. In re Walkerly, 81 Cal. 579, 22 Pac. 888; Estate of Schmidt, 94 Cal. 334, 29 Pac. 714; In re Smith's Estate, 99 Cal. 449, 34 Pac. 77.

2. Considering all the facts in the case, which need not here be given in detail, there is no ground for holding that the court abused its discretion in making the order appealed from. The decedent, D. Q. Adams, died in 1890, leaving an estate of the appraised value of about $200,000, and an indebtedness of about $90,000. For some years after his death there was no doubt about the solvency of his estate. The property of the estate consisted mainly of land in Yolo and Fresno counties. There was one tract of land in Yolo county of 3,900 acres, on which was the family residence, and the homestead set apart by the court is on this tract, and consists of 215 acres of arable land, on which were situated the dwelling house, barn, outhouses, etc., together with about 85 acres adjoining, which consisted of gravelly creek bottom of very little, if any, value. The widow had four minor children to support. She had no means of her own. The homestead was set apart to her only for her life; and we think that the property thus set apart was no more than was reasonably sufficient for her own support and the maintenance and education of the four minor children. If the homestead had been applied for soon after the death of the decedent, no plausible objection could have been offered; but between that time and the date of the application, which was six years afterwards, the business of farming became unprofitable, and the value of the lands greatly depreciated, so that, when the order was made, it was, at least, doubtful if the assets of the estate would be sufficient to pay all of appellant's demands which remained unsatisfied. Appellant was a large creditor of the estate, and a great part of the indebtedness of the estate to it was secured by mortgages which were foreclosed, the appellant being the purchaser at the foreclosure sales. The appellant complains that the court did not make a sufficiently definite finding as to the insolvency of the estate at the time of the homestead order; the finding being that the remaining property, which is described, "if sold at public auction under the order of this court, would not pay in full the outstanding indebtedness of said estate and the charges and expenses of administration." If findings were necessary, and the question had arisen in a case where insolvency was a material and vital issue, the finding might well be assailed for want of directness. The insolvency of an estate does not prevent a court from setting apart a probate homestead. Section 1465 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which deals with the subject, is part of a chapter devoted exclusively to "the provision for the support of the family, and of the homestead," and provides that, where no statutory homestead has been selected, the court "must" set apart a homestead "for the use of the surviving husband or wife, and the minor children," and contains no limitation founded upon the insolvency of the estate. In Phelan v. Smith, 100 Cal. 165, 34 Pac. 669, this court said that among the objects of administration are: "(1) To support the family for a period; (2) to set apart a homestead to the family;" and that "setting apart a homestead is a part of the probate proceeding as much as is a family allowance." And in Keyes v. Cyrus, 100 Cal. 326, 34 Pac. 723, the court, speaking of section 1465, said: "The manifest object of this section is the support of the family, and to make provision for their support and maintenance. These demands of the family are deemed superior to those of heirs or creditors. Setting apart a homestead is a part of the probate proceedings as much as is a family allowance; 'it is a right bestowed by the beneficence of the law of this state for the benefit of the family.' In re Moore's Estate, 57 Cal. 442. A homestead may be set apart to the widow even though the estate be insolvent, and the property so set apart constitute the entire estate of the decedent." The question of solvency or insolvency is therefore immaterial, except only as it may go to the information of the court touching the condition of the estate; and the finding in question shows that the court was sufficiently informed on that subject.

The answer of the appellant to the petition for the homestead is quite lengthy, and contains some 14 different paragraphs; and one of the main contentions of appellant is that the court did not find on all the issues claimed to have been raised by the answer. It has never been definitely determined by this court that findings are necessary on the decision of a motion for a probate order like the one here in question, and the intimations have rather been that they are not necessary (Estate of Arguello, 85 Cal. 152, 24 Pac. 641; Miller v. Lux, 100 Cal. 613, 35 Pac. 345, 639; Estate of Sanderson, 74 Cal. 199, 15 Pac. 753); but, waiving that question, it is sufficient to say that the issues claimed to have been made by the answer to which it is contended there are no findings are of matters entirely immaterial to the determination of the petition for the homestead.

The finding of the value of the premises set apart for the homestead is fully supported by the evidence, for the opinion of certain witnesses as to value was to be considered in connection with certain facts which appeared in the testimony; and, at best, the value claimed by appellant to have been shown was only a few hundred dollars greater than that found by the court. We see no other material matters necessary to be specially noticed. The case was first tried, and judgment entered setting apart the homestead, and afterwards a new trial was granted on the one issue of the value of the premises, and a similar judgment was then again entered; and appellant appeals from both judgments, and from the order granting a new trial, on the ground that it should have embraced all the issues. What we have said applies to all these appeals. The judgments and orders appealed from are affirmed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. LOS ANGELES
CITY WATER CO. et al. (L. A. 655-658.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 3, 1899.)

On rehearing. Modified.

For former opinion, see 57 Pac. 210.

PER CURIAM. In the above-entitled cases the petition for rehearing is denied. In response to one suggestion in the petition, it is proper to say that, if the city of Los Angeles has any rights to the waters of the Los Angeles river as a riparian proprietor, such rights were not involved in these cases, and were not considered or determined by the decision. We also think, after further consideration, that what was said in the opinion about the general character of the ownership of the waters of the river by the city of Los Angeles to the point that it was only entitled to the use of the water when in a position to use it, and could not assert any rights of ownership in the water except when in such position, was unnecessary to the decision, and the same is hereby eliminated from the opinion. The water company is, substantially, in the position of a mortgagee in possession, having a lien on the property involved as security for the performance of the covenants of the city contained in the contract; and we see no reason, for the present, at least, why their lien and possession should be disturbed, or a receiver appointed.

PEOPLE v. FARLEY. (Cr. 494.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 2, 1899.)

HOMICIDE—EXPERT EVIDENCE—THREATS OF DECEASED—ADMISSIBILITY—SELF-DEFENSE.

1. Where the defense to a prosecution for homicide was that it was committed in self-defense while deceased was attacking accused with a knife, and it appears that the shot causing the death passed through deceased's upper arm and body near the shoulder, it is error to admit expert medical testimony on the part of the people that the arm through which the bullet passed must have been hanging down at the time; the matter not being a subject for expert evidence.

2. Expert medical evidence that when deceased was shot he could not have been standing erect is inadmissible on the part of the people, that fact not being the subject of expert testimony.

3. The fact that accused was at fault in bringing on the difficulty does not deprive him of the right of self-defense, where deceased persisted in attacking him after he had desisted.

4. In a prosecution for homicide, threats made by deceased at a prior unfixed time, not relating to any one in particular, are inadmissible.

5. Where the homicide was committed in the course of an altercation, and accused pleads self-defense, threats made by deceased against accused, not communicated to the latter, are admissible on the question as to which of the parties commenced the deadly affray.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county.

William Farley was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Reversed.

Bledsoe & Bledsoe, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Ford, for the People.

BEATTY, C. J. The defendant was accused, by information, of the crime of murder, and found guilty of manslaughter. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It appears from the evidence in the record that a quarrel had occurred between the defendant and the deceased early in the morning, in which the deceased was very insulting and abusive and wholly in the wrong. This quarrel was renewed after some interval of time, apparently by the fault of the deceased, and a fight ensued, in which the defendant was worsted. The parties being separated by the bystanders, the deceased continued to threaten and abuse the defendant, who thereupon borrowed a pistol from an acquaintance. Within half an hour after borrowing the pistol he again encountered the deceased. The evidence is conflicting as to what then occurred. According to the evidence of the defendant himself, the deceased assailed him with a foul epithet, and immediately attacked him with a pocketknife, which he had open in his hand. He says that he warned deceased that he had a pistol; that the deceased grasped his pistol with his left hand, and cut him with his knife; that he jerked the pistol away from deceased, and fired once, when the deceased turned away and passed into a store near which they were standing. In respect to these matters the defendant is partly corroborated and in part contradicted by his own witness, and they each contradicted themselves upon minor points. From all the testimony it seems pretty clear that but one shot was fired, and that the fatal bullet passed through the left arm of the deceased about five inches from the point of the shoulder, and thence directly through his body from left to right, making its exit at the right armpit. Death ensued in a few minutes, the deceased making no dying statement.

The first error assigned is the admission, over the objection of defendant, of the evidence of the surgeon performing the autopsy that the left arm of the deceased must have been hanging down by his side when the fatal shot was fired. The ruling of the court upon this point was erroneous (People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 181, 54 Pac. 833; People v. Smith, 93 Cal. 445, 29 Pac. 64; People v. Westlake, 62 Cal. 303), but can scarcely have been harmful. It was not introduced for the purpose of contradicting defendant's account of the struggle, for he had not then testified; and in point of fact it did not contradict him, for the fact that the arm of the deceased was hanging by his side when the shot was fired is not at all inconsistent with the statement of the defendant that a moment before deceased had been grasping his pistol with his left hand. Besides, it is perfectly evident that, although the witness stated in terms that the arm was hanging down, he only meant that the wounded upper arm must have been by the side of the body, in order that one bullet should pass directly through arm and chest, and this, it is conceded, must necessarily have been the case. If defendant or his counsel had desired to show that, although the upper arm was by the side of the body the forearm might have been extended, this could have been done by a single question on cross-examination. And, if there were no other error in the case, I should be reluctant to say that this particular ruling justified a reversal of the judgment. But this witness was further interrogated by a juror, and, replying to him, volunteered the opinion that when the deceased was shot he could not have been standing erect. There was no call for this opinion, and apparently no ground for it, and the court, on motion of defendant's counsel, struck it out; but the witness repeated it in a modified form, and it was not again stricken out. Although it seems to have been pretty thoroughly demolished on the cross-examination, it is not clear that it could not have prejudiced the case of the defendant, who testified that deceased at the moment he was shot was standing up and striking at him with his knife.

The court also erred in giving the following instruction: "The apprehension of danger to life or limb which justifies a man in taking the life of another must be an honest one, one that is well grounded, and must arise out of a reasonable cause; but a cause which originates in the fault of the person himself, in a quarrel which he has provoked, or in a danger which he has voluntarily brought upon himself, by his own misconduct, cannot be considered reasonable or sufficient in law to support a well-grounded apprehension of imminent danger to his person. Error of apprehension the law overlooks, when a man is called upon to act on appearances, but it does not overlook dishonesty of apprehension; hence a real or apparent necessity, brought about by the design, contrivance, or fault of the defendant, cannot be availed of as a defense for the commission of a crime." This instruction is copied from a portion of Justice McKee's opinion in People v. Westlake, supra, which was never concurred in by a majority of the court, and which was expressly disapproved in People v. Conkling, 111 Cal. 625, 44 Pac. 314, for reasons there stated, and upon grounds discussed in People v. Button, 106 Cal. 628, 39 Pac. 1073, and People v. Hecker, 109 Cal. 451, 42 Pac. 307.

The court did not err in striking out a portion of the testimony of the witness Case. The threats to which this testimony related were not only never communicated to the defendant, but they do not appear to have related to him. If they had been directed against the defendant, the fact that they were not communicated would not have rendered them irrelevant in a case like this, where the question was who commenced the deadly affray, but vague expressions of the character of those testified to, made at a time not specified and respecting persons not named, were clearly irrelevant.

As to the objection to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, that is answered by what is said in People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 171, 54 Pac. 833. For the errors above noticed, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded.

APPEAL AND ERROR—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS—WATER AND WATER COURSES—SURFACE WATERS—DIVERSION.

1. An objection that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, or, if it does, it is not the one to which the proofs were directed upon the trial, will not be heard for the first time on appeal, where the findings and judgment of the trial court are clearly supported by the evidence, and the case is correctly decided on the merits.

2. A landowner cannot protect his own land by turning the storm or surface water which would naturally flow thereon away from his own and onto the land of another, to the injury of the latter.

3. Testimony as to conversations with defendant regarding the matters in issue is admissible when offered in rebuttal and in explanation of defendant's own testimony on the same subject.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county.

Action by Thomas Cushing against Manuel S. Pires to enjoin defendant from interfering with the repairing of a certain culvert, and to restrain him from destroying the same, and for damages. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas C. Huxley, for appellant. Fitzgerald & Abbott, for respondent.

GRAY, C. This action was brought to enjoin defendant from interfering with the repairing of a certain culvert, and to restrain him from destroying or filling the same in with earth, and for damages. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff owned land adjoining defendant on the west. There was a county road some distance to the east of plaintiff's land. Plaintiff and defendant were accustomed to reach this road by means of a private road commencing at the northeast corner of defendant's land, and running thence east along the northern boundary of and on plaintiff's land out to said county road. One Reynolds owned a tract of land adjoining the lands of both plaintiff and defendant on the north. All these several tracts were composed of bottom lands near the Bay of San Francisco, nearly flat, but with a slight slope to the south of several feet to the mile. In the rainy season great quantities of water fall upon this land, and this water, as observed by witnesses, for upwards of 20 years has been accustomed to flow from the Reynolds land, through slight natural depressions, in a southerly direction across the private road referred to, and so on across defendant's land. Some three or four years before the trial, this private road was graded up slightly above the surface of the adjoining territory, and this grading left a gutter or ditch along the sides of the road, and had the effect to dam up the surface water, preventing it in some measure from flowing upon the land of defendant, and causing it to follow the road in a westerly direction, and flow upon the lands of plaintiff. To obviate this, and to permit the water to take its natural course across the lands of defendant, and to prevent its flowing upon his own lands in unnatural abundance, the plaintiff constructed a culvert on defendant's land across said private road at a point thereon very near to the northeast corner of his own land, where there was a natural depression through which the storm and surface waters had been accustomed to flow from the Reynolds tract upon and across defendant's land. In January, 1894, the defendant tore out this culvert, destroyed it, and filled in the depression where it had been, and thus prevented the water from flowing through it to his land, and caused a much greater amount of water to flow upon plaintiff's land than otherwise would have flowed there, and, as a result, plaintiff's growing crops were damaged, and his land was injured by the consequent erosion of the same. The strongest contention of appellant for reversal of the judgment and order appealed from is based on the ground of a defective complaint. The argument is that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, or, if it does state any cause of action, it is not the one to which the proofs were directed upon the trial. On an inspection of the record we cannot say that this argument is altogether without foundation. But we find that no such argument as this, and no objection of this nature, was at any time presented to the court in which the case was tried. There was no demurrer to the complaint, and no motion based upon a variance between the pleadings and proof, and to such evidence as might have been objected to on the ground that it was not pertinent to the case made by the pleadings no such objection was made. Had counsel made the objection he here urges, and presented his argument in support thereof at the trial with the same force and clearness as in his brief in this court, it would have resulted, probably, in an amendment of the complaint. He did not do this, but proceeded with the trial as if all the matters to which the evidence was directed were properly in issue. The findings and judgment were clearly supported by the evidence, and the case was decided correctly on the merits. It is the settled law of this state that a land owner cannot protect his own land to the injury of another's land by turning the storm or surface water which would naturally flow thereon away from his own and onto the lands of another. Ogburn v. Connor, 46 Cal. 346; McDaniel v. Cummings, 83 Cal. 515, 23 Pac. 795; Hicks v. Drew, 117 Cal. 305, 49 Pac. 189. While the complaint is not to be recommended as a precedent to be hereafter followed, yet in view of the fact that no objection, either as to its form or substance, was made in the court below, we think it sufficient to support the judgment based upon it. It is true that the objection that the complaint does not state a cause of action may be successfully made for the first time on appeal, but the appellate court will not be overzealous to find a defect in a complaint that the appellant himself failed to discover until the case had been decided against him on its merits. We think the defects in the complaint, as well as the variance complained of, are of a nature to be waived by failure to call them to the attention of the trial court by proper objections, and that defendant should not be heard to urge those objections for the first time after judgment. Hill v. Haskin, 51 Cal. 175; Eversdon v. Mayhew, 85 Cal. 1, 21 Pac. 431, and 24 Pac. 382; Knox v. Higby, 76 Cal. 264, 18 Pac. 381; Dikeman v. Norrie, 36 Cal. 94; Bell v. Knowles, 45 Cal. 195.

There was no error in permitting plaintiff to testify as to the conversations with defendant about raising the road and putting in culverts. This was proper in rebuttal and explanation of defendant's testimony on the same subject. For the foregoing reasons, we advise that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

SMITH v. SMITH. (Sac. 453.) 1

(Supreme Court of California. June 5, 1899.)

DIVORCE—PLEADING—EXTREME CRUELTY—SUFFICIENCY OF ALLEGATION—DIVISION OF HOMESTEAD.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 94, declaring that extreme cruelty, as a ground for divorce, may consist either of the infliction of grievous bodily injury, or grievous mental suffering, an allegation that "during the last two years defendant has treated plaintiff in a cruel and inhuman manner," that defendant has applied the coarsest epithets to her (naming them), and has accused her of a want of chastity, states no cause of action.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 3, relating to divorce, declaring that, if a homestead has been selected from the community property, it may, in the discretion of the court, be divided, or be sold and the proceeds divided, the trial court may award an undivided two-thirds to the wife.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. G. Swinnerton and Budd & Thompson, for appellant. Elliott & Elliott, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action for divorce. Plaintiff having died pending the appeal, her heirs at law have been substituted as parties plaintiff, and the litigation continued, certain property rights being involved. The complaint attempts to allege two grounds of divorce, namely, willful neglect and extreme cruelty. A general demurrer to both causes of action was overruled, and, upon issue made, judgment went for plaintiff, the court finding in her favor upon both counts. The property involved consists of a homestead upon community, an undivided two-thirds of which was awarded to plaintiff, and the remaining one-third to defendant. The complaint states no cause of action for extreme cruelty. The pleading in this regard alleges that "during the last two years defendant has treated plaintiff in a cruel and inhuman manner," that defendant has applied the coarsest epithets to her (naming them), and has accused her of a want of chastity. By section 94 of the Civil Code, extreme cruelty may consist either of the infliction of grievous bodily injury, or grievous mental suffering, upon the other party to the marriage. Here there is no allegation of either. Grievous bodily injury, or grievous mental suffering, is the ultimate fact, and should be alleged. There is no attempt whatever to allege bodily injury, and the probative facts alleged in no degree establish grievous mental suffering. The law is so recognized and declared in all the recent cases. Andrews v. Andrews, 120 Cal. 187, 52 Pac. 298; Fleming v. Fleming, 95 Cal. 430, 30 Pac. 566; Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171, 30 Pac. 298. Calling a woman vile names and accusing her of unchastity may inflict upon her grievous mental suffering, and it may not. It depends entirely upon the particular woman. Such treatment of one woman might inflict upon her vital wounds, while the same treatment of another woman would not leave a mark. It is said in Barnes v. Barnes, supra: "Whether in any given case there has been inflicted this grievous mental suffering is a pure question of fact, to be deduced from all the circumstances of each particular case, keeping always in view the intelligence, apparent refinement, and delicacy of sentiment of the complaining party." Hence an allegation of these evidentiary facts falls far short of hitting the target, when the object aimed at is a good cause of action. We attach no importance whatever to the declaration that the defendant treated plaintiff in a cruel and inhuman manner. Indeed, the trial court closed its eyes to this allegation, and made no finding upon it.

The cause of action for willful neglect is sufficiently stated, and the evidence in the record is sufficient to support the finding of fact in that behalf. Upon this cause of action, and upon the findings and judgment made and entered therein, the court had the power to deal with the property as was done. The property here involved is a homestead created upon the community property. By virtue of section 146 of the Civil Code (subdivision 3), the trial court may divide the community homestead between the parties. Its discretion in such matter is of the widest, and there is no ground in this case upon which to disturb that discretion. We do not understand that the community homestead necessarily should be divided in severalty.

There are various technical objections made to the rulings of the court. Even conceding that they may be raised upon an appeal from a judgment decreeing a divorce, where the original plaintiff has died since the appeal was taken (see Kirschner v. Dietrich, 110 Cal. 502, 42 Pac. 1064; Downer v. Howard, 44 Wis. 82), still these assignments of error do not contain sufficient merit to demand a reversal of the judgment. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

DINGLEY v. McDONALD et al. (S. F. 1,412.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 6, 1899.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—DELEGATION OF POWERS—ACTION BY SUBAGENT—POWER TO SUE—RATIFICATION AFTER SUIT—EFFECT—EVIDENCE.

1. The cashier of a bank, authorized by the directors to collect a claim, consulted an attorney. Subsequently he wrote him that, acting under the opinion of the directors, he had ordered the papers turned over to him, and requested that he act without consulting the bank further. Held, that such attorney became the special agent of the bank, with general power for the collection of the claim, and not merely the agent of the cashier.

2. A special agent, with general power for the collection of a claim, cannot delegate his authority by assignment so as to invest his assignee with power to sue thereon, as Civ. Code, § 2349, provides that an agent can delegate his authority, when not specially authorized, when the act to be done is purely mechanical, and the power to bring a suit implies the power to control it, and is more than a mechanical act.

3. Where an agent for the collection of a claim, without any authority to delegate his power, assigns it to another to sue thereon, a ratification by his principal of such act after the commencement of the suit is not equivalent to a precedent authorization as to defendant, since the principal could not by his act take away from defendant a defense he had at the commencement of the action.

4. Under Civ. Code, § 2349, providing that an agent may delegate his authority to another when it is the usage of the place to do so, in an action by the assignee of an agent the court will not assume that it was the usage of agents in the locality where the suit is brought to assign claims for collection, but it must be proved.

5. Where the assignee of an agent, who had no power to delegate his authority for the collection of a claim, sues thereon, a contention by plaintiff that defendant cannot suffer injury from a judgment, as it will protect him from a second action by the principal, is unavailable to enable him to continue the suit, since, until the principal ratifies the agent's act, defendant continues liable.

6. An agent with plenary power to collect a claim cannot transfer it to a third person, without consent of his principal, and invest him with such title as will enable him to sue thereon.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Charles L. Dingley, Jr., against R. H. McDonald and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant J. M. McDonald appeals. Reversed.

Sawyer & Burnett, for appellant. H. A. Powell and W. A. Dow, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to recover judgment against defendants, as stockholders of the Pacific Bank, upon its indebtedness to the Exchange National Bank of Spokane (referred to hereafter as the "Spokane Bank"), plaintiff's assignor. Several causes of action were set forth in the complaint, but one of which is here on appeal. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from the order denying motion for a new trial, defendant J. M. McDonald appeals.

Appellant contends that the assignment of the claim to plaintiff was without authority, and that, as he had no interest in the claim at the commencement of the action, he cannot recover. The complaint was filed May 18, 1896. The court found that on that day the Spokane Bank "assigned and set over to plaintiff, for the purpose of collection, all its claim and demand against said Pacific Bank, * * * and all right of action for said sum, and plaintiff is now the owner and holder thereof." This finding is challenged as not supported by the evidence. It seems that several of the creditors of the Pacific Bank made assignments of their claims in one instrument to plaintiff. This instrument on behalf of the Spokane Bank was executed in the following terms: "Exchange National Bank, by W. H. Chickering, Its Atty." A document was admitted in evidence showing that on February 20, 1897, the Spokane Bank passed a resolution confirming and ratifying said assignment by said Chickering "and all proceedings thereunder." Defendant objected on the ground that it was executed after the commencement of the action. The evidence showed that the claim was in the form of an open account between the two banks, leaving the balance (after some payments since the failure of the Pacific Bank) as found by the court; that plaintiff had no interest in it, beyond expenses and commissions of collection, and that he gave no consideration for the assignment, but "it was merely for the purpose of collection." On June 24, 1893, the board of directors of the Spokane Bank held a meeting, at which the minutes of the board show the following proceedings: "Question of our claim against the Pacific Bank of San Francisco was taken up. E. J. Dyer, cashier, was instructed to go to San Francisco and see what the condition of our claim is, and to take all necessary steps that he may deem best for this bank, both now and in the future." Objection was made to admitting this action of the board on the ground that it conferred no authority upon the cashier to delegate his authority to a third person to assign the claim. On April 7, 1896, Cashier Dyer wrote W. H. Chickering, Esq., of San Francisco, as follows: "Your kind favor of 3d at hand. Acting under the opinion of the board of directors I wired you to-day as per inclosed copy. I have also wired the Anglo to turn the matter over to you. * * * Any action by you will be quite satisfactory to us." The telegram was as follows: "Have instructed bank to turn Pacific papers over to you. Will you investigate them, and act as you deem best, without consulting us further?" This was introduced over defendant's objection that it "did not authorize Mr. Chickering to make said assignments." Mr. Chickering testified that he was Mr. Dyer's attorney in an estate matter here, but received no compensation for his services in this matter. He testified: "I cannot exactly say I had any authority to act for the Bank of Spokane. If I did, it was in writing." Later in the trial he produced the above letter and telegram, which, together with the ratification of his acts, constitute his only authority. He testified: "The assignment was made for the purpose of bringing an action against the stockholders of the Pacific Bank on the claim for the benefit of the Exchange National Bank. I wrote to the bank that I did not think they were warranted in bringing an independent suit for this amount, and that it were better to sue with others, and save expense." When he so wrote, does not appear.

If we were to assume that Dyer was acting upon the authority given him in 1893, the question to be decided would not be different, and, as we view the matter, would be less favorable to plaintiff. In the latter case we would have an attempted substitution of Mr. Chickering by Mr. Dyer, without the latter being "specially authorized" to make such substitution. Civ. Code, § 2349, subd. 4. We think it fairly appears that the cashier spoke for the bank, and had authority to do so. It is as though the bank had placed in Mr. Chickering's hands the matter of its claim against defendant, with authority to act as he (Mr. Chickering) deemed best without further consulting the bank. He became a special agent of the bank (Id. § 2297), with general powers with respect to collecting the claim, the subject of his agency. As the agent of the bank, acting with authority from it, and not by delegation, we think he undoubtedly could have brought the suit in the name of the bank, and perhaps, under the broad terms of the power, could have made a compromise settlement. He did neither of these things, but undertook to delegate his authority to plaintiff by assigning the claim to him. Id. § 2349, provides as follows: "An agent, unless specially forbidden by his principal to do so, can delegate his powers to another person in any of the following cases, and in no others: (1) When the act to be done is purely mechanical; * * * (3) when it is the usage of the place to delegate such powers; or (4) when such delegation is specially authorized by the principal." It is not, and cannot be, contended that Mr. Chickering was specially authorized to delegate his authority; nor can we regard the act to be done by the plaintiff as "purely mechanical." The acts contemplated by the statute as purely mechanical are such as occur where the delegation carries with it no discretionary authority, which cannot be said to be true of the acts to be performed by a plaintiff in an action. The power to bring the suit implies the power to control it when brought, and this involves discretion. Furthermore, we cannot agree with respondent that the subsequent ratification was equivalent to a precedent authorization under section 2307, Civ. Code. That is true as between the principal, the bank, and the agent, Chickering, and the plaintiff, the subagent, but it is not necessarily so as to the defendant. In Wittenbrock v. Bellmer, 57 Cal. 12, the president of a bank was authorized to accept payment of a note and mortgage, but, instead, he sold and assigned the note to Wittenbrock, who brought the suit. Some time thereafter the bank ratified the sale and assignment. It was held that the bank could not thus take away from the defendant the defense he had at the commencement of the action, to wit, that plaintiff, Wittenbrock, was not legally invested with title, and was not then the owner of the claim. Respondent contends that the case here is clearly distinguishable from that case, because there the president undertook to sell the claim, while here the authorized agent of the bank undertook only to assign for collection. We are unable to make this distinction available to plaintiff. Section 2349, as we have seen, gives to the agent authority to delegate the "power when it is the usage of the place to delegate such power." The facts do not bring the case within the rule in Greig v. Riordan, 99 Cal. 316, 33 Pac. 913. No usage was shown for agents to assign claims for collection, and we cannot assume that any such usage exists in San Francisco, where the suit was brought.

It is urged that, because defendant was ultimately protected from a second action by the Spokane Bank, he cannot suffer injury by this judgment, as he clearly is at least once liable. But that was the situation in Wittenbrock v. Bellmer, supra. So, here, until the Spokane Bank ratified the acts of Chickering, defendant was liable to the bank, if Chickering had no authority to assign the claim to plaintiff.

Both parties rely upon Malloye v. Coubrough, 96 Cal. 649, 31 Pac. 622. In that case a foreign judgment held by Abel, Rey & Co., in London, was confided to an agent by letter of attorney, with authority to bring any suits or proceedings and prosecute the same as he might think fit; to institute any proceedings in insolvency, or for the liquidation of the affairs and estate of the said Henry Coubrough; "and for all and any of the purposes aforesaid to use our names, and generally to act in and about the premises as fully and effectually as we ourselves could do if personally present and acting therein." The power contained no general clause authorizing the attorney to do anything necessary or convenient in the collection of the judgment. The agent assigned the judgment to plaintiff for the purpose of suing thereon. The court said that the power "confines the authority to the institution and maintenance of suits, actions, and proceedings to that end. The general language at the conclusion is limited to the premises, which defines what may be done. All these could have been done in the name of Abel, Rey & Co. Therefore an assignee was not necessary in order to take any of the steps * * * contemplated as possibly necessary or convenient. * * * Had the letter of attorney authorized the agent to adopt any measure he might deem expedient, or had it been necessary to substitute an assignee for the purpose of maintaining any action or proceeding which might be thought advisable, perhaps the construction contended for should prevail. But, under the circumstances, I think the language cannot be so extended." Respondent claims that the facts here present just such authority as was in the mind of the court as described in the latter part of the opinion above quoted. The difficulty we find in applying what is there said is that the assignment conferred discretionary powers upon plaintiff, and was therefore in violation of section 2349, Civ. Code, for the reasons already stated. So far as the record discloses, Mr. Chickering had no control of the case. Plaintiff brought the action, and the attorneys appearing are his attorneys. The general power given Mr. Chickering was based upon the special trust and confidence reposed in his personal ability and integrity, and the rule is that such power, in the absence of authority, express or implied, cannot be redelegated by the agent so as to bind the principal. 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 972; Story, Ag. § 14 et seq.; Mechem, Ag. §§ 405, 406. The books give exceptions to the rule, but these exceptions are now brought into and enumerated in section 2349, supra, and are the only exceptions. But aside from any question of delegated authority by an agent, and assuming that Mr. Chickering had plenary power to collect the demand, we do not think he could transfer it to a third person, and thus invest a stranger to the bank with the title and control. There are cases where some present imperative necessity or where usage has justified the courts, in the particular cases, in implying a power to assign as incident to the power to collect. Story, Ag. § 14, and notes. But the evidence presents no such case here. The principle of the decision in Malloye v. Coubrough, we think, should govern this case. The judgment and order should be reversed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed.

WILLIAMS v. COOPER. (Sac. 535.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 6, 1899.)

JUDGMENT — RES JUDICATA — MORTGAGES — SUIT TO FORECLOSE — PARTIES — EJECTMENT — EVIDENCE.

1. A mortgagee, who, as agent for the mortgagor, participates in the defense of an action of ejectment by a tax-title claimant against the mortgagor, involving the validity of the tax title, by employing and paying counsel to conduct the defense, does not thereby make himself such a party to the action that he is bound by the judgment.

2. The holder of a tax deed is not a necessary party to a suit to foreclose a mortgage, since the tax lien, if valid, whether it antedates the mortgage or not, is superior to the mortgage lien.

3. A mortgagee who has not been made a party to a suit involving the validity of a tax deed upon the mortgaged premises is not bound by a judgment in favor of the tax-title claimant.

4. In ejectment by a mortgagee, claiming under sheriff's deed on foreclosure, against a tax-title claimant, whose tax deed had been held good in a prior action by him against the mortgagor, the defendant cannot prove his title, as against the plaintiff, by putting in evidence the judgment in the prior action, to which the mortgagee was not a party, although he participated in the defense, as the mortgagor's agent, by employing and paying counsel to conduct it.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county.

Ejectment by W. H. Williams against H. M. Cooper. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. B. & Geo. H. Mastick and E. A. Bridgford, for appellant. Edwin Sigfried and Thos. Rutledge, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Ejectment to recover possession of certain lots in the town of Williams, in the county of Colusa. Said action was tried by the court without a jury. The plaintiff had judgment upon the findings, and the defendant appeals therefrom, and from an order denying a new trial.

The complaint is in the usual form, and not verified. The answer denied each and every allegation of the complaint, and for a second defense alleged, in substance, that in 1890 William Miller, being then the owner of the demanded premises, mortgaged them to the plaintiff; that said premises were afterwards sold by the tax collector of Central irrigation district for an assessment which became delinquent December 31, 1889; that defendant, Cooper, became the purchaser at said sale, and received the tax collector's deed therefor on March 26, 1891; that on May 25, 1891, Cooper, claiming title under said tax deed, and relying solely thereon, brought an action of ejectment against said Miller and against his tenants, Long, Kidd, and Peters; that Williams, the plaintiff here, for the protection of his interest as mortgagee, openly took substantial control of the defense of said action, with the consent of the defendants therein, employed counsel, and conducted the defense in that court and in the supreme court, and paid the costs and expenses of said defense; that on August 6, 1892, this defendant (Cooper) obtained judgment in the superior court in said action that he had a good and valid title under said tax deed, and was entitled to the possession of said premises; that said judgment was affirmed by the supreme court on June 6, 1896, and this defendant was put in possession under a writ issued upon said judgment; that thereafter said Williams commenced an action against said Miller to foreclose his said mortgage, obtained a decree that said lots were sold by the sheriff thereunder, and, after obtaining the sheriff's deed, commenced this action; that said deed constitutes plaintiff's only claim of title, and defendant pleads his said judgment in bar of this action. The findings of the court were in accordance with the allegations of said second defense, except as to the participation and control of Williams in the defense of the said action of Cooper v. Miller (Cal.) 45 Pac. 325; and in relation thereto it found, in substance, that Williams' only participation or control of the defense was as agent for said Miller. Upon the trial, Cooper did not offer or introduce his said tax deed in evidence, but put in evidence the judgment roll in his said action of ejectment against Miller, and certain evidence tending to sustain his allegation that Williams conducted the defense of that action, and had such interest in and relation thereto as that he became bound and concluded by said judgment.

Appellant's first proposition is "that Williams, in effect, made himself a party defendant to the action of Cooper v. Miller, and is bound by the judgment therein."

1. As we have seen, the court found that Williams' participation in the trial of Cooper v. Miller was as the agent of Miller, and not in the protection of his interest as mortgagee; but appellant contends that this finding is not justified by the evidence. Williams at that time had no title to the property, and was not in possession, and was therefore not a necessary or proper party defendant to the action of ejectment. That he had such an interest as would have authorized him to intervene in that action may be conceded, but he was not bound to do so. Williams had been the agent of Miller in the collection of rents, payment of taxes and insurance, etc., and a portion of the rents was from time to time applied upon the mortgage he held upon the property. There was also evidence tending to show that he employed counsel to defend the action on the part of the tenants, and, to induce them to continue paying the rents to him, promised to protect them from a repayment to Cooper. He testified, however, that all that he did was as the agent of Miller, who was absent. It would serve no useful purpose to rehearse the evidence upon this point at greater length; for, conceding that the evidence was sufficient to justify a finding the other way, it was clearly sufficient to support the finding made by the trial court, and therefore we cannot disturb it.

2. Appellant's second contention is that the judgment, sale, and deed in the foreclosure case of Williams v. Miller do not make out a title as against appellant, he not having been made a party to that action. Cooper, however, was not a necessary party in Williams' suit to foreclose his mortgage. The record shows that the tax for which the property was sold by the tax collector was delinquent before the mortgage was executed by Miller to Williams; but whether Cooper's tax title related back to the date when the tax lien first attached, or to the date of its delinquency, or the date of the sale, is immaterial, since the tax lien, whether it antedated the mortgage or not, was, if valid, superior to the mortgage, and it is not necessary to make a prior or superior lienholder a party to the action to foreclose an inferior mortgage lien. Here, however, Cooper's claim was adverse and paramount to that of the mortgagor, and he denied the efficacy of the mortgage as a lien on his title, and therefore it was not necessary to join him as a co-defendant with the mortgagor. "Such an adverse claim to the land in opposition to the mortgage cannot be tried in the equitable action to foreclose." McComb v. Spangler, 71 Cal. 418, 423, 12 Pac. 347; City and County of San Francisco v. Lawton, 18 Cal. 474; Ord v. Bartlett, 83 Cal. 430, 23 Pac. 705; Emeric v. Alvarado, 90 Cal. 470, 27 Pac. 356; Cody v. Bean, 93 Cal. 578, 29 Pac. 223; Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 608, 29 Pac. 220. Nor did the foreclosure sale or sheriff's deed to Williams in any way affect Cooper's title under his tax deed; but as Williams was not a party to the ejectment suit of Cooper v. Miller, in which Cooper's tax title was adjudged to be valid, he was not bound by that judgment, and Cooper's title, as against Williams, could not be proved by the production of the judgment against Miller. Upon the question of the validity of the tax title, Williams was entitled to his day in court. It is quite true, as held in the New York cases cited by appellant, that the foreclosure did not divest Cooper of his title. Had he produced his tax deed upon the trial of this case, and shown that it was valid, if its validity was attacked he must have prevailed in this action; but as he did not produce his deed, but relied upon a judgment by which Williams was not bound, he necessarily failed to show title in himself.

Appellant cites Cohen v. Solomon, 66 Fed. 411, and Mendenhall v. Hall, 134 U. S. 559, 10 Sup. Ct. 616, and remarks concerning them, "So it is clearly held by these cases that the holder of the tax title is a necessary and proper party, if his rights are to be rendered subject to the mortgage." But appellant had already shown—that we fully concede—that the foreclosure does not affect the tax title; meaning, of course, unless the tax title was in fact litigated therein. But I do not think that the above cases cited by appellant are authority for the proposition that, in cases such as the one at bar, the holder of the tax title is a necessary party; but, if it were otherwise, it would be dangerous, in the absence of legislative direction, to reverse a doctrine so long and distinctly adhered to by this court. But I do not think those cases decide that the holder of the tax title is a necessary party to the foreclosure case (unless under exceptional circumstances), but that he may be made a party, and the tax title litigated therein. In the first of these cases, after the foreclosure proceedings were commenced in the federal court, the holder of the tax title brought suit in the state court to quiet his title under the tax deed. By supplemental bill he was brought into the federal court,—which had first obtained jurisdiction of the res,—and compelled to litigate his title in the foreclosure case. This, under the circumstances, was necessary to avoid a conflict of jurisdiction, and the court based its action upon that ground. In Mendenhall v. Hall the holder of the tax title was made a party to the foreclosure case upon an allegation in the bill that the mortgagor and the holder of the tax title colluded to defeat the mortgage by suffering the taxes to become delinquent, and thus creating a title free from the mortgage; thus presenting a question of equitable cognizance, which could be properly litigated in the foreclosure suit, since, if the collusion were shown, it would be immaterial whether the tax deed was otherwise valid or not.

No other questions are made or discussed. I advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

ings of fact of the court below, did not have that effect.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, expressly forbidding the impeachment of a witness "by evidence of particular wrongful acts," the fact that one witness had written an immoral book, and another had read it, cannot be shown to impeach their credibility.

3. Testimony of a father and stepmother as to the pure surroundings and education of their daughter is not contradicted by evidence that she had once read an immoral book, written by her stepmother, and is incompetent on an issue as to her marriage to a decedent, there being nothing to show that the decedent knew that there was such a book in existence.

4. Declarations of a father and stepmother that their daughter, who was a member of their family, was engaged to be married to a decedent at the time of his death, is incompetent on an issue as to whether or not they were in fact married at that time, there being no evidence of a conspiracy.

5. Voluntary declarations of a decedent, made a few weeks prior to his death, that he was a widower, that he had dropsy, catarrh, and symptoms of Bright's disease, and was impotent, are incompetent on an issue as to whether he was married when they were made, as they are no part of the res gestæ, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1850, making a declaration which forms part of a transaction which is itself the fact in dispute, or evidence of that fact, admissible as part of the transaction.

6. Declarations of a decedent, made a few weeks before his death, that he was a widower, are inadmissible in opposition to a claim that he was married at that time, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1852, providing that the declaration of a member of a family, who is a decedent, is admissible as evidence of common reputation, where, in cases of pedigree, such reputation is admissible.

7. On an issue as to whether a decedent was married to a person claiming to be his widow, evidence of her specific acts of immorality prior to the alleged marriage are inadmissible.

8. Where the declarations of a decedent as to his physical condition are inadmissible, expert testimony, based upon such declarations, must be rejected.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

In the matter of the estate of Charles A. James, deceased. From a decree of distribution, and from an order denying a new trial, Laura Milen James and Milen James, also called Theodore Milen James, appeal. Reversed.

W. H. H. Hart and Geo. W. Fox (Aylett R. Cotton, of counsel), for appellants. Geo. D. Shadburne, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. The appellants, claiming to be the widow and son of Dr. Charles James, deceased, appeal from a decree of distribution made and entered in the matter of his estate, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. Dr. James died leaving quite a large property, and Laura Milen James now claims to be his widow, and Theodore Milen James, the infant son of Laura, claims, by guardian, to be his son. The marriage relation relied upon is commonly called a "contract marriage," and is evidenced by an agreement in writing purporting to be signed by both parties named therein. The lower court, after an extended trial, found as a fact that there never was a marriage between Dr. James and Laura Milen, and that her infant son was not his son.

It is first contended upon the part of the respondents that there is sufficient evidence in the record, which came before the court without objection, to support the findings of fact, and that, therefore, even conceding the admission of evidence under objection which should have been denied admission, still a new trial for the aforesaid reasons should not be ordered. This position cannot be sustained. If improper evidence under objection has been admitted, it is impossible for this court to say how much weight and influence it had in the mind of the trial court in framing its findings of fact. The improperly admitted evidence may have been all-powerful to that effect. As far as this court knows, it may have been that particular evidence which turned the scale, and lost the case to the appellants. This must, of necessity, be the rule wherever improper evidence has been admitted, which, upon its face, tends in any degree to affect the final conclusion of the court. Counsel for appellants present an elaborate brief, wherein they discuss the claimed errors of law committed by the trial court in the admission of evidence. Counsel for respondents present an elaborate reply brief, wherein they discuss at great length the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, and devote but little time and space to the discussion of the alleged errors of law relied upon by the other side. It would have been more satisfactory to this court if they had devoted more labor to the questions of law raised by appellants in their brief.

Before passing to an examination of the merits of the motion for a new trial, let us look at the parties directly and indirectly connected with this litigation, their situation and relations. Dr. Charles James, 60 years of age, was the owner of a large apartment house, situated upon Howard street, in the city of San Francisco. Dr. Milen, a traveling vendor of drugs; his second wife, Jessie Milen; his daughter by his first wife, and her husband (Mr. and Mrs. Dickman); and Laura Milen, his unmarried daughter, sister to Mrs. Dickman, and 19 years of age,—rented rooms of Dr. James in his apartment house on December 13, 1894. Prior to this event the family of Dr. Milen were strangers to Dr. James. Little time was devoted to the courtship, for the contract of marriage between Laura Milen and Dr. James is dated January 6, 1895, and according to the testimony of Laura it was executed at that date, and the marriage relations thereupon immediately assumed. Dr. James died at his rooms in this house January 28, 1895, after a very short illness. An infant,—Theodore Milen,—joint defendant and appellant with his mother, Laura, was born to her September 16, 1895.

During the examination of Dr. Milen he identified a book entitled "Was He to Blame?" as written by his wife, Mrs. Jessie Milen.

This book was highly immoral, and was introduced in evidence under objection. This evidence was thereafter followed by respondents with evidence that Laura Milen had read the book, and also the additional evidence that it had been subsequently suppressed by the Society for the Suppression of Vice. As evidence tending to besmirch the character of the author, and also that of the daughter, these facts were well calculated to serve that end. And in serving that end it necessarily had the effect of weakening the credibility of these two witnesses,—the two most important witnesses to the fact of marriage. It therefore goes without saying that it was prejudicial to the appellants' side of the case. To support the admissibility of this evidence upon the ground that it tends to weaken or impeach the credibility of these two aforesaid witnesses, no authority can be cited. The book was a separate, distinct, independent piece of evidence, and all authorities agree that independent, specific acts of immorality may not be affirmatively shown to impeach a witness. It has been declared by this court that such acts may not even be shown upon the cross-examination of the witness himself; and even those cases which go to the length of holding that such an examination of the witness may be gone into upon cross-examination still declare that the answer of the witness is final and conclusive, and its truthfulness beyond all attack by independent evidence. We cite numerous cases to support the foregoing propositions: Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 633, 22 Pac. 26, 131; Hinkle v. Railroad Co., 55 Cal. 629; People v. Hamblin, 68 Cal. 101, 8 Pac. 687; People v. Elster (Cal.) 3 Pac. 884; Evans v. De Lay, 81 Cal. 105, 22 Pac. 408; People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 180, 31 Pac. 45; People v. Un Dong, 106 Cal. 88, 39 Pac. 12; People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 462, 34 Pac. 1078; Jones v. Duchow, 87 Cal. 109, 23 Pac. 371, and 25 Pac. 256; Pyle v. Piercy, 122 Cal. 383, 55 Pac. 141; People v. Silva, 121 Cal. 668, 54 Pac. 146; Code Civ. Proc. § 2051. This section of the Code expressly forbids the impeachment of a witness "by evidence of particular wrongful acts." Respondents' counsel claim that this evidence was offered to contradict the testimony of Dr. and Mrs. Milen as to the pure surroundings and education of their daughter Laura. All the testimony of Dr. Milen in chief upon this point is as follows: "I have bestowed all I could in the way of care over her books and education. I have not been able to provide all the books I have wished for them at home. I do not know that I ever gave my wife any instructions about the moral culture of my children. I considered that she was competent to care for them in that respect, so I did not consider it necessary to leave any instructions." Mrs. Milen gave no testimony whatever on the subject. Respondents claim that there was neither a marriage between this man and woman, nor meretricious relations, and that the whole thing was without any semblance of truth, and was a corrupt scheme, pure, and simple, concocted after the old man's death, by which to secure the possession of his property. Aside from the question of impeachment, which we have already considered, this evidence is wholly inadmissible from any standpoint. The fact that the stepmother wrote an immoral book, and that appellant, the daughter, read it, shed no light upon the all-important issue in the case, namely, marriage or no marriage. There is nothing in the record to indicate that Dr. James, prior to his death, had any knowledge as to the authorship of the book, or that Laura had read it, or that there was such a book. Therefore, as in any way bearing upon the question of marriage, this evidence failed to reach the mark. It does not even contradict the testimony of her father which we have quoted above.

The trial court admitted in evidence the declarations of Mrs. Milen and Mr. and Mrs. Dickman, made after the death of Dr. James, to the butcher, the baker, and the coal dealer, to the effect that Laura was engaged to be married to the doctor at the time of his death. This evidence was not offered for impeachment purposes, for no foundation had been laid for it when the respective witnesses were testifying upon the stand; but, upon the contrary, it was offered and received as independent and affirmative evidence tending to show the nonexistence of a marriage between the parties. Under well-settled rules of law, the evidence was objectionable. It was hearsay of the purest character, and does not come within any of the exceptions recognizing the admissibility of that character of evidence. These appellants could not be bound to the extent of a hair by the declarations of third parties. It is claimed by respondents that these witnesses were members of the Milen family, and that declarations of any member of the family are admissible as part of the res gestæ. This claim, as presenting a rule of evidence, is untenable. What third parties may say as to the character of a past occurrence, or as to the actual happening or nonhappening of an occurrence, will not be stamped by the law as res gestæ. The fact that these parties may all be said to have been members of the Milen family gives no additional support to respondents' position. Declarations of members of a family, who are not parties to the litigation, as to matters similar to those before us, are no more admissible than the declarations of strangers. The rule of law as to the admissibility of declarations of certain described persons, when those declarations bear upon matters of pedigree and kindred subjects, cannot be invoked here, for the reason that the parties making the declarations are neither deceased nor beyond the jurisdiction of the court. People v. Mayne, 118 Cal. 516, 50 Pac. 654. It is also claimed that these witnesses were co-conspirators with the appellant Laura, and that as such conspirators their declarations were admissible. There is not the slightest evidence in the record of a conspiracy between these parties, and the admission of the evidence upon that ground cannot be justified. As to the declarations of Laura, the appellant, they were admissible against her, at least.

Declarations made by the deceased, Dr. James, within a few weeks prior to his death, and within the time within which the appellant Laura claims she was his wife, were admitted in evidence under objection. These declarations were testified to by various neighbors and friends of the doctor, and covered a wide field. The most important ones were to the effect that he was a widower, that he had dropsy, catarrh, and symptoms of Bright's disease, and that he was impotent. We are satisfied that the rules of evidence forbid the introduction of this kind of evidence. It is not res gestæ; neither does it belong to that class of hearsay which the law recognizes as competent and admissible evidence. This evidence is not res gestæ. Section 1850 of the Code of Civil Procedure fairly covers those cases where declarations form part of the res gestæ, and here we have no such case. That section provides: "Where, also, the declaration, act or omission forms part of a transaction, which is itself the fact in dispute, or evidence of that fact, such declaration, act or omission is evidence, as part of the transaction." These declarations are no part of a transaction. They are substantive, independent statements of the existence of certain facts. The unsworn statement of Dr. James that he had Bright's disease, or dropsy, or catarrh, cannot be held to prove that fact. If such were the law, a man being dead, the flood gates for perjured testimony would be raised to their fullest extent. These declarations of James as to his various bodily afflictions were in no sense those of a patient to his physician. Neither were they those involuntary and spasmodic exclamations of an injured man as to his physical pains, made at the time of the injury. These declarations of the deceased were not involuntary exclamations. They were made deliberately and calmly, and necessarily covered the health of the deceased for a past period of time. The true rule upon this question is stated in Roosa v. Loan Co., 132 Mass. 439: "When the bodily or mental feelings of the party are to be proved, his exclamations or expressions indicating present pain or malady are competent evidence; and in Bacon v. Inhabitants of Charlton, 7 Cush. 581, 586, where this rule is stated, it was said by the court: 'Such evidence, however, is not to be extended beyond the necessity on which the rule is founded. Anything in the nature of narration or statement is to be carefully excluded, and the testimony is to be confined strictly to such complaints, exclamations, and expressions as usually and naturally accompany and furnish evidence of a present existing pain or malady.'" We find analogous principles discussed in many cases upon contest of the probate of wills, where contestants have claimed the testator never signed the instrument, or that he signed it under duress or menace. In such cases it has always been held that the declarations of the testator as to menace or duress, or as to the fact of his signature, are hearsay, and cannot be received in evidence. If the issue is will or no will, and the testator's declarations may not be received to indicate the truth, how may the declarations of Dr. James be received upon the issue of marriage or no marriage, or potency or impotency? The cases appear entirely similar in principle. Such declarations are held to be "mere hearsay evidence, which, by reason of the death of the party whose statement is offered, can never be explained or contradicted by him." Griffith v. Diffenderfer, 50 Md. 480. One of the important questions in Boylan v. Meeker, 28 N. J. Law, 276, bore upon the matter of the forgery of a will, and the declarations of the alleged testator to the effect that he had never made a will were rejected as hearsay evidence. In the case of In re Calkins' Estate, 112 Cal. 300, 44 Pac. 577, in speaking as to the declarations of a testatrix, a contest of the probate of her will being the matter in litigation, this court said: "But to the extent that they purported to be declarations of the acts of others or of her own acts, they were but matters of hearsay merely, whose truth rested in the veracity of the utterer, and upon which there was no opportunity of cross-examination, or of explanation by the party who had uttered them, and were not entitled to any weight by the jury, and cannot be considered for the purpose of sustaining their verdict."

Section 1852 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "The declaration, act, or omission of a member of a family who is a decedent, or out of the jurisdiction, is also admissible as evidence of common reputation, in cases where, on questions of pedigree, such reputation is admissible." It is now contended that the declarations of Dr. James that he was not married are admissible under the provisions of the foregoing section. But this cannot be so, for the reason that such declarations must come from a member of a family; and the whole case of respondents rests upon the claim that James was not a member of the Milen family. He was not a member of Laura Milen's family unless he was her husband, and that is the sole point involved in this litigation. Pearson v. Pearson, 46 Cal. 622, is much relied upon to support the admissibility of these declarations. But that was a case coming directly within the provisions of the section quoted, and the declarations were admitted by virtue of the law there declared. The declarations were there made by the testator in his will, to the effect that certain parties therein named were his wife and his children. These declarations comprised all the evidence upon the question, and were held by this court sufficient to prove the facts embodied therein. The entire opinion of the court concedes that the testator was a member of the family comprised in part of the parties named in the will. The admissibility of pedigree evidence by declarations has for its only basis the close and intimate relations existing between the declarant and the party to whom the declarations pertain. The declarations, to be admissible, must not only be made by a deceased member of the family, but they must be made of and concerning a member of the same family. Here we have nothing of the kind. If a family relation be assumed to have existed between this man and this woman sufficient to justify the admission of his declarations, after death, as to the marriage relation existing between them, then the respondents' whole case falls to the ground; for there was no family relation between these two people unless it was that of husband and wife. There is no pretense of any other.

Evidence came from one Lewis, under objection, to the effect that some years prior to the date of the alleged marriage the appellant Laura had allowed herself to be fondled by him. Evidence of Mrs. Zollinger was also introduced, tending to show that appellant Laura had slept with a man at her house upon a certain night, some weeks prior to the alleged marriage. Nearly all that has been said as to the admissibility in evidence of the book entitled "Was He to Blame?" is entirely applicable here. These matters could not have been inquired into upon the cross-examination of the appellant Laura. Much less may they be proven as affirmative, independent evidence tending to blacken her character, and thus impeach her credibility as a witness. Upon matters of impeachment she has the same rights as any other witness. In the Sharon Case, supra, it was held that questions calling for such evidence could not be addressed to the witness upon cross-examination. Specific acts of immorality cannot be proven to impeach a witness. We have already cited an army of cases to that effect. Even conceding the evidence of these two witnesses to be true, yet it in no way tends to prove that these parties did not enter into a marriage contract, and thereafter live together as husband and wife.

Aside from the declarations of the deceased, James, there is no evidence that he was afflicted with any sort or kind of disease prior to his death. Those declarations have been held inadmissible. It therefore follows that all the expert evidence of medical gentlemen based upon his physical condition as declared by himself must be rejected. This necessarily follows, for there is no proper evidence in the record upon which to base expert medical testimony. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

(S. F. 1,609.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. June 1, 1899.)

DIVORCE—HOMESTEAD—CLAIM OF THIRD PERSON—ALIMONY—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER—COSTS.

1. In an action for divorce, and to set aside a conveyance of land owned by her husband, made to deprive plaintiff of her homestead rights, a decree which cancels the deed, and decrees that plaintiff have judgment for a certain sum in lieu of her homestead rights, and makes such judgment a lien on the land, is erroneous, in so far as it annuls the deed from the husband to his co-defendants, other than for the purpose of subjecting it to the lien of the judgment, as, between the parties thereto, such conveyance is valid.

2. In an action to subject land to a wife's claim of homestead, evidence that S., one of the husband's co-defendants, prior to her marriage, at considerable cost, erected a building on a part of a lot, subsequently occupied by her and her husband as a homestead, pursuant to an agreement with the husband whereby he was to have an interest in the property to the extent of the amounts so expended; that he was to receive one-half of the net income of the property until he was paid; that he recorded the agreement, and she, before her marriage, knew of the arrangement; that he took no mortgage on or deed of the property, nor did he reserve any right to remove the building; that he collected rents, and took out insurance policies in his own name; that he has a claim for an unpaid balance; and that plaintiff filed a homestead claim on the whole lot,—will warrant a decree that he has no interest in the property paramount to the wife's homestead rights, but such decree will not affect his right to enforce his claim against the husband.

3. In an action for divorce by a wife, the court has a right to award her an amount in lieu of an interest in the homestead and a monthly allowance which was theretofore granted to her, and make such amount a lien on the premises claimed as a homestead, under Civ. Code, § 139, providing that, where a divorce is granted for an offense on the part of the husband, the court may compel him to make provision for the support of the wife, and further providing that it may from time to time modify its orders, and section 146, subd. 4, providing that, if a homestead has been selected from the separate property of either, it shall be assigned to the former owner of such property, subject to the power of the court to assign it to the innocent party for a limited time.

4. Evidence that the husband has failed to pay alimony pursuant to orders of the court, and that he has attempted to dispose of his property for the purpose of preventing the wife from getting any part of it, authorizes the appointment of a receiver on her application, and after notice to him, under Civ. Code, § 140, which provides that the court may enforce the payment of alimony by the appointment of a receiver.

5. On appeal, in a suit for divorce, where there is nothing in the transcript to show that the trial court acted on its own motion, or without notice, in the appointment of a receiver, it will be presumed that it acted upon due application and notice; and, if such is not the case, it is appellant's duty to show it by his statement or bill of exceptions.

6. It is error to allow the wife, in a suit for divorce, costs of a prior appeal on a second trial of the action resulting in her favor, where the appeal resulted in favor of the husband.

7. A wife in a suit for divorce is, after the determination of an appeal in her favor, entitled to interest on amounts awarded her for suit money and alimony on the trial below from the date of the decree awarding the suit money, and the date when the alimony became due.

8. A wife is not entitled to interest on sums awarded in her favor as costs upon the first trial of an action for divorce, when the action was reversed after the first trial on appeal by the husband.

9. A husband is entitled to have deducted from the costs allowed to a wife on the first trial of an action for divorce the amount awarded to him as costs on a successful appeal from the decree in the first action, after a second trial resulting in her favor.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action for divorce by Caroline Huellmantel against Bernard Huellmantel and others. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Modified.

A. Morganthal, for appellants. M. Cooney, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Divorce. The case was here on appeal once before, and was remanded with directions that "all that part of the judgment which undertakes to determine and dispose of the real property described in the complaint is reversed, and as to all that part of the judgment the order denying a new trial is reversed and a new trial is ordered." The decree granting plaintiff a divorce and alimony and counsel fees, and the order refusing new trial as to this part of the decree, were affirmed. 117 Cal. 407, 49 Pac. 574. At the time of his marriage with plaintiff, defendant Huellmantel was the owner of a certain lot of land in the city of San Francisco. Upon the front part of this lot there is a three-story building, which had generally been rented to tenants, and on the rear part of the lot there is a smaller house, in which the husband and wife resided. After the marriage, to wit, on April 6, 1889, plaintiff filed a homestead claim upon the whole lot. Defendants Francis and Rosalia Steffen claim ownership of the lot under deed from defendant Huellmantel dated February 14, 1891. Plaintiff alleges in the amended complaint, and the court found, that this deed was fraudulent, and was given to defeat plaintiff's homestead right. Defendant Scholten alleges in his answer that in 1876, at defendant Huellmantel's request, he erected, at a cost to him of $4,800, the building situated on the front portion of said lot, and also made other improvements aggregating in value $1,200, and also loaned defendant Huellmantel in that same year $600 in money; that on August 23, 1877, to secure the payment of these several amounts, defendant Huellmantel entered into a written agreement with said Scholten whereby the latter had an interest in said property to the extent of said sums due from said Huellmantel, and that by this agreement Scholten was entitled to receive one-half of the net income of said property until said indebtedness of said Huellmantel was paid. This agreement was recorded on January 22, 1878. Scholten claims that there is due him for rents and unpaid portions of said indebtedness, and for interest, the sum of $8,600. By stipulation of the parties the cause was tried upon the evidence contained in the former transcript relating to the property described in the complaint, and upon such further evidence as either party might introduce. The decree annuls and cancels the Steffens deed, and adjudges that neither one of the Steffens has any interest in the property. It also adjudges that plaintiff recover the sums following: $730 from defendant Huellmantel, the amount due under the former orders and decree of the court as alimony, "with interest thereon in the sum of fifty-three dollars,"—in all, $783. "That plaintiff recover from the defendant Huellmantel * * * $1,000 permanent alimony, in full of all future claims upon defendant Huellmantel for support, in lieu of her claim and right of homestead;" from defendant Huellmantel to recover the further sum of $650, counsel fees awarded under former orders, "with eighty dollars interest thereon to date of this decree," amounting in all to $730; from defendant Huellmantel, the Steffens, and Scholten, $118 costs allowed on the former trial, with $20 interest to date of this decree,—in all, $138; from these last-named defendants $478 referee's fees and costs in said action, including interest (not stated separately) to date of this decree; from these same defendants all the costs in the action since the entry of the former decree in April, 1895; from defendant Huellmantel, $234, "costs incurred by her, and charged against her upon the appeal of the defendants to the supreme court." The decree adjudges that plaintiff has a lien upon the premises for all the foregoing amounts, and that none of the defendants except Huellmantel has any interest in said premises, and they are entitled to no relief in the action, orders the sale of the property at public auction, and appoints a receiver to take possession of the property and collect rents and profits thereof, to conduct the sale of the property, receive the proceeds, and pay the several amounts above awarded to plaintiff. Defendants Huellmantel, the Steffens and Scholten appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying motion for a new trial.

1. Appellants claim that the rights of the defendants the Steffens under their deed of February 14, 1891, were determined by the first appeal, and must be deemed to be the law of the case. The court did determine upon the evidence as it then stood what these rights appeared to be, but the court directed that "all that part of the judgment which undertakes to determine or dispose of the real property described in the complaint is reversed, and as to all that part of the judgment the order denying a new trial is reversed, and a new trial ordered." The effect of this decision was to remand the whole question of property rights to be retried. In the first appeal it was found that the deed to the Steffens was fraudulent and void, and it is again so found upon substantially the same—certainly as strong—evidence favorable to the validity of the deed. It was held here then that "the deed was not void, as between appellant Huellmantel and the Steffens, as to the land not a homestead." The former decree ordered the Steffens to reconvey to appellant Huellmantel, and this was held error. The last decree does not order reconveyance, but the court found as conclusion of law that the Steffens "have no right, title, or interest in or to said property, or any part thereof," and the decree adjudges that the deed "be and is hereby canceled, * * * and the said grantees therein named have not now, and shall not have or claim or take, any right * * * by virtue of said deed," and "that neither of the defendants, except the defendant Huellmantel, has any interest in said property, and they are not entitled to any relief in this action." There is no ground for this portion of the decree, so far as it affects the Steffens. Neither appellant Huellmantel nor the Steffens object to the validity of the conveyance from the former to the latter, and we do not think the court could do more than make the interest of the Steffens subject to the lien of plaintiff's judgment, and this much the evidence fully justifies. It was so held before, and the rights of the Steffens remain the same as between them and appellant Huellmantel.

2. The court decreed that Scholten has no interest in the property, and "that his claim is without merit, and that he has no lien on the said real estate or any part thereof." The evidence shows that Scholten built, at the cost to him of $4,800, the front building on the premises in 1876-77, pursuant to the contract pleaded by him, and that for many years he collected one-half the rents of the building to be applied under the contract, and took out insurance policies, loss payable to himself; that plaintiff knew of his claim before she married defendant; and that he still has a claim for an unpaid balance, which defendant Huellmantel does not dispute. Scholten took no mortgage upon or deed to the property as security, and his agreement is, in effect, merely an evidence of Huellmantel's indebtedness to him. It appeared by the evidence that the building erected by Scholten became part of the realty, and no right to remove it was reserved to Scholten. We think that the findings and decree as to Scholten's interest in the property were warranted by the evidence, so far as the agreement affected the rights of the plaintiff, but they must not be regarded as in any way concluding Scholten in the future, should he undertake to enforce his claim of Huellmantel's indebtedness to him. As between them, their mutual rights were not litigated in this action.

3. The court in the former appeal held that the homestead could not be set apart absolutely to plaintiff, but only for a limited period, the property being the separate estate of the husband. Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 4.

The lower court in the last trial found that a homestead had been duly declared by plaintiff. The twenty-third finding of fact is as follows: "That, besides the amounts referred to, the court finds that the sum of one thousand dollars is a reasonable amount to be allowed and awarded to the plaintiff as and for permanent alimony, in lieu of homestead and all other claims upon defendant." The court at the first trial awarded $15 per month, payable monthly, as permanent alimony, which judgment of award was affirmed on the first appeal. At the last trial the court found that no part of this had been paid, and that it amounted at the date of the last decree to $730, for which judgment is given, with interest of $53. The fifth paragraph of the last decree is as follows: "That the plaintiff have and recover from the defendant Huellmantel, and she is hereby awarded, the additional sum of one thousand dollars ($1,000) permanent alimony, in full of all future claims upon the defendant Huellmantel for support, and in lieu of her claim and right of homestead." The effect of the decree is to leave the title to the property in defendant Huellmantel, freed from the homestead, although the court did not directly and explicitly assign it to the former owner, as section 146 directs the court to do if not assigned for a limited period to the innocent party. Burkett v. Burkett, 78 Cal. 310, 20 Pac. 715. It is quite clear that the court awarded this additional permanent alimony to plaintiff in the place of the continuing allowance of $15 per month allowed in the first decree, and instead of any interest in the homestead. This we think the court could do, under section 139, Civ. Code. The court was not compelled to assign the homestead to plaintiff for a limited period.

4. It is objected that the court, by the decree, and upon its own motion, appointed a receiver, and directed him to take possession of the property, collect the rents and profits, and proceed to sell the property and pay the several sums adjudged to be due the plaintiff. The authority on which the decree rests is section 140, Civ. Code. The evidence showed that defendant Huellmantel has never paid any part of any of the sums awarded plaintiff by the first decree, and that defendant has enjoyed the use and rentals of the property since this action was begun in June, 1894. The evidence also tends to show that defendant Huellmantel conveyed the property to his daughter by a former wife and to his son-in-law, the Steffens, without consideration, to "prevent his wife from getting any part or an interest in it." At the time the deed was made to the Steffens there was trouble in the family, and plaintiff had left her husband. We think that the purpose for which the receiver was appointed was such as is contemplated by the Code. Petaluma Sav. Bank v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 488, 44 Pac. 177. The question, however, remains,—whether the receiver was properly appointed. A receiver ought not to be appointed except upon the clearest proofs of its propriety, nor without the application of some one of the parties, and generally not without notice. Such appointment is allowable under certain circumstances ex parte, upon proper showing. High, Rec. § 111 et seq. But the cases are exceptional. There is nothing in the transcript to show that the court acted on its own motion, and without the application of plaintiff or notice to defendants. In support of the judgment, we must presume that the court acted upon due application, and after notice to defendants. If such was not the fact, it was the duty of defendants to so show by their statement, or by bill of exceptions.

5. Error is assigned as to certain sums awarded as costs, and as to interest allowed thereon, and as to interest allowed on alimony and counsel fees awarded at the first trial. We find it impossible to reconcile the findings and decree upon all these matters, and to make them conform to the situation at the going down of the remittitur on the first appeal. Costs were awarded to appellants on that appeal, but these costs thus allowed included only the costs on the appeal, and did not include the costs at the first trial. The decree, however, includes these costs on appeal which were awarded defendants, and judgment is given against Huellmantel for them. This was error. Plaintiff is entitled to recover interest at 7 per cent. per annum, without compounding, upon the sums awarded by the first decree as follows: (1) Upon the allowance for attorney's fees as originally made, from the date of the decree; (2) upon the installments allowed as alimony from the date of each, as they accrued,—interest to be computed to date of last decree, but in no case interest upon interest. No interest should be allowed on the costs of the former trial, and there should be deducted therefrom the costs in this court on the first appeal. All other items of cost attend the trial, and should form a part of the final decree, including referee's fees, which are part of the costs, and should not carry interest. The first, second, and eleventh paragraphs of the decree should be modified by striking out those parts purporting to cancel and annul the deeds therein referred to, and by providing that the said parties have not any right to or claim upon the premises superior to the lien of plaintiff thereon as in the decree declared, and that their, and each of their, rights and interests, are subordinate to the lien of plaintiff, and her right to have the property sold to pay the several sums found to be due her by the decree. The cause should be remanded, with directions to modify the decree in accordance with this opinion, and when so modified to stand affirmed as of the date when entered. The defendants the Steffens should recover their costs of appeal, and plaintiff should recover all other costs of appeal.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the cause is remanded, with directions to modify the decree in accordance with this opinion, and when so modified to stand affirmed as of the date when entered; the defendants the Steffens to recover their costs of appeals, and plaintiff to recover all other costs of appeal.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. POMEROY et al. (L. A. 419).¹

(Supreme Court of California. June 3, 1899.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—PLEADING—INSTRUCTIONS—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—COSTS—WATERS—RESERVOIR—PERCOLATING WATERS—SUBTERRANEAN WATERS.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1247, authorizing the court in condemnation proceedings to determine all adverse and conflicting claims to the property, a city may in the same action assert its claim to an interest in the property, and condemn the outstanding interest of others.

2. A complaint by a city showed that the object of the proceeding was to condemn all the estate and interest of defendants in certain land described; alleging the interest to be the fee, subject only to the city's ownership of the exclusive right to the use of all the waters of a river flowing through it. Held, on demurrer, that the complaint sufficiently described the property sought to be condemned.

3. Where, by stipulation, all issues were tried to the court, but the question of damages, the court's action in not filing his findings as to the extent of the interest to be condemned until after the verdict was not error; correct instructions based thereon having been given to the jury.

4. A city sought to condemn lands to construct head works for a water system, and its plan was to build a subsurface dam across the outlet to a valley whose subsoil was saturated with water, and draw the water off by means of tunnels and lateral galleries. Held, that this would comprise a reservoir, for which the fee might be taken as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 1239.

5. The evidence being conflicting as to the necessity of taking the whole tract sought to be condemned, the finding of the trial court could not be disturbed.

6. All the waters of San Fernando Valley flow out through a narrow pass either on or beneath the surface, and at ordinary stages the water on the surface and that beneath are in intimate contact, and flowing in the same direction,—on the surface at the rate of 2 or 3 feet per second, and underground at 14 to 17 miles per annum. On a tract near the pass sought to be condemned, the surface flow gradually increased, indicating that the underground water is forced to the surface as it approaches the narrow outlet. Held to support a finding that the subsurface flow was a part of the surface stream, and was not percolating waters, and hence the right of the owner of the tract thereto was governed by the law of riparian ownership, and not of percolating waters.

7. A charge that the mere fact that some of the subterranean water forming part of the stream on lands sought to be condemned might be lost before reaching the surface would not entitle the owner to an amount of such water on his lands, equal to or less than that lost, if it would diminish the supply of a lower owner, was harmless, since, if the water was part of the stream, it could not be diverted, whether it would ever come to the surface or not.

8. Where water passes through the voids of any loose, permeable material, filling or partially obstructing the channel of a stream, it is still a part of the stream. If it all sinks below the surface, the whole stream is subterranean. If a part sinks, and the remainder is on the surface, that which is invisible is as much a part of the stream as the surface flow.

9. A charge that if there is a river bottom filled to considerable depth with sand, gravel, or other porous material, over which a stream runs on the surface, and through and in which the water moves underground, enough of it rising to supply the surface stream, and through a larger space in the porous material, but in the same general direction as the surface stream, and in connection with it, and in a course and within a space reasonably well defined, then such underground portion would be a part of the water course, is not a charge on questions of fact; it being a question of law as to what a subterranean stream must be in order to make it a part of the surface stream.

10. Where the boundaries of a channel and the existence and course of an underground stream were unknown and undefined, except so far as they could be inferred, but there was a great amount of evidence to support an inference that the channel was bounded and defined by the sloping sides of parallel ranges of hills meeting underground, and there was a subsurface flow corresponding with the surface flow, the court properly submitted the question whether the subsurface flow was a part of the stream; and the question was not affected by the fact that the subsurface stream forced its way through sand and gravel and boulders.

11. It is not error to refuse requested instructions given in the court's charge.

12. The pueblo right to water of a stream includes the right to take all the water that is reasonably necessary to give an ample supply for the use of its inhabitants, and for all municipal purposes for which the city may require water, including sewers, artificial lakes, irrigation of public parks, etc. This right is measured by the necessity, and, if the needs increase in the future, the right will expand to include them; and this, though the population of the city is not confined to the original pueblo limits.

13. The fact that under the Spanish régime a pueblo was for a time, owing to a decrease in population, deprived of its ayuntamiento, did not extinguish the pueblo, or impair its rights to the waters of an adjacent river.

14. A party cannot allege error in instructions given in form and substance as requested by him.

15. Code Civ. Proc. § 1249, making the "actual value" at date of summons the measure of compensation in condemnation proceedings, means the actual market value, and would not include additional elements of intrinsic value not known at that time.

16. Where a charge lays down a correct rule, applicable to the case, but there is no evidence on which to base it, it is harmless.

17. In determining the value in condemnation proceedings of percolating waters as distinguished from a water course, it is competent to consider whether the owner might not at any time be deprived of them by the exercise by others of the same right in their lands as claimed by him with respect to his own.

18. Where a city adopted its engineer's report, recommending in general outline a plan of a water system, and also a resolution directing its attorney to commence condemnation proceedings as soon as the ordinance providing for the system should be signed, and, after suit brought, the ordinance was published, and orders and resolutions were adopted providing for carrying out the proposed plan, it could not be said that the suit was commenced without authority, pursuant to a plan not formally adopted.

19. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 274, as amended by St. 1880, p. 54, requiring a party ordering the reporter to transcribe any portion of the testimony to pay the fees therefor, the costs of a transcription should not be taxed as costs where the parties arranged with the reporter, out of court, to furnish each a copy thereof at an agreed price.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by the city of Los Angeles against A. E. Pomeroy and J. D. Hooker. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John S. Chapman, R. H. F. Variel, and John G. North, for appellants. W. E. Dunn and Lee & Scott, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a proceeding to condemn "all the estate, right, title, and interest" of the defendants in and to a tract of land embracing about 315 acres, for the purpose of enabling the plaintiff—a municipal corporation—to construct and maintain thereon the "head works" of its projected system for supplying water to its inhabitants for private and municipal purposes. The defendants, appealing from a decree of condemnation and from an order overruling their motion for a new trial, not only allege numerous errors in the rulings of the superior court, but challenge the correctness of its findings of fact in many important particulars. With respect to these disputed facts, it will be necessary to state the various contentions of the parties in discussing the particular legal questions to which they give rise; and, passing them over for the present, we will, in this connection, only attempt to set forth the more general aspect of the case, as to which there is no substantial disagreement.

The city of Los Angeles, at the date of the commencement of this action, June 8, 1893, contained a population of about 70,000 souls, and covered an area of about 20,000 acres. At the date of the trial, in March, 1896, the population was upward of 75,000, having increased to that number from less than 12,000 in 1880. This rapid growth of the city promises to continue, and the only source of water supply for its inhabitants and for municipal purposes is the Los Angeles river, which flows through the city from north to south. The principal source of the river above the city is the San Fernando valley. This valley, embracing a watershed of from 450 to 490 square miles, is almost completely inclosed by considerable ranges of mountains, rising in places to an elevation of over 6,000 feet. The most important of these ranges is the San Fernando, which bounds the interior valley on the north. On the south and west it is bounded by the Cahuenga range, which at its northwestern extremity unites with the San Fernando. On the east the Verdugo hills are connected with the San Fernando range on the north, and, extending towards the south, leave a comparatively narrow outlet to the valley between their southern extremity and the eastern prolongation of the Cahuenga range. Through this outlet at the southeastern corner of the interior basin the Los Angeles river issues, flowing in an eastern direction parallel and close to the northern base of the Cahuenga range, until, having passed that obstruction, it turns to the south, and flows through the city to the Pacific Ocean. The interior of the San Fernando valley is a plain composed of detritus washed from the mountain sides, and having a moderate slope from the San Fernando range on the north towards the Cahuenga range on the south, and from the west towards the east. This portion of the valley—that is to say, the portion composed of material not in place, detritus washed from the mountain sides—which, for convenience, may be called the valley proper, extends about 24 miles from east to west, and is about 12 miles wide at its widest part, embracing an area of about 180 square miles. Its material is composed of boulders, gravel, sand, and occasional masses of clay. The rainfall within the watershed of the valley is variable. When it is abundant, and the loose, porous material composing the valley proper is thoroughly saturated, the streams issuing from the rocky cañons of the mountains flow over the surface to the outlet of the valley, and pass off as flood water down the channel of the Los Angeles river. But this surface flow does not continue for any great length of time, and under ordinary conditions the mountain streams sink in the sand within a short distance of the mouths of the cañons, and no water appears upon the surface until it shows itself again in the Los Angeles river, where it takes its rise a short distance north of the Cahuenga range, on the southern side of the valley proper. The land which the city seeks to condemn lies at the base of the Cahuenga range, in the narrow outlet of the valley. It is almost 2 miles in length from east to west, and averages a quarter of a mile in width. At its eastern end it is about a mile west of the point where the Verdugo hills make their closest approach to the Cahuenga range, the width of the valley proper at this point being about 2 miles. Where the land lies the width is from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 miles. The surface of the river where it flows out of the land in question at its eastern end has an elevation above the sea level of about 460 feet, and is 200 feet higher than the main portion of the city of Los Angeles. In ordinary seasons, after the flood waters have run off and the river has assumed its normal condition, the water rises to the surface at some distance west of the land sought to be condemned, and increases rapidly in volume as it flows towards the east. There is considerable difference between the estimates of different witnesses, but it may be said, in general terms, in this connection, where strict accuracy is not important, that the surface flow of the river where it enters the tract in question is about 1,200 inches, miners' measure, and that its volume is about doubled by the accessions it receives in passing through the tract. These accessions are of the character that would naturally be expected from the topography of the valley, and the nature of the soil under and adjacent to the surface stream. The whole country on either side of the stream is found to be completely saturated with water; the plane of saturation near the open channel being slightly higher than the surface of the river, and gradually rising in proportion to the distance from the stream. From the sides and bottom of the visible stream the water percolates or trickles or gushes, according to the nature of the soil,—whether fine and comparatively compact, or coarse and gravelly and more loose and porous. The plan of the city for utilizing the land which it seeks to condemn is to drive a tunnel through it from east to west, a few feet below the bed of the river, and to extend filtration galleries north and south from the tunnel in such number and at such places as may be found best adapted to securing an ample supply of water. The plan also embraces a submerged dam and collecting chambers or reservoirs, but the main feature is the tunnel, with its lateral galleries, from which the water, draining and filtering out of the saturated soil, is to be delivered to the main supply pipe of the city, and thence to its distributing system.

The principal points of controversy between the parties are: First, as to the existence of a well-defined subterranean stream, by which the waters, or a large portion of the waters, resulting from the rainfall within the watershed of the San Fernando valley, are carried off through the pass between the Cahuenga range and the Verdugo hills; and, second, as to the rights of the city of Los Angeles, as successor to the Mexican pueblo, in the waters of the Los Angeles river. The claim of the plaintiff is that the city has certain extensive rights in the stream, over and above those of ordinary riparian owners, and that the stream itself consists, not only of the visible surface flow of the river, but of the large subterranean flow slowly passing through the boulders, gravel, and sand under and adjacent to the river. Both of these claims are disputed by the defendants, and out of this controversy arise most of the points to be considered in disposing of the appeal. As to the rights of the city as successor to the pueblo, the allegation of the amended complaint is that ever since its organization the city has been the owner in fee simple of the exclusive right to the use of all the waters of said river, from its source to the southern boundary of the city, in trust for the public purposes of supplying the inhabitants of said city with water for domestic uses, and of supplying water for the irrigation of the irrigable lands embraced in the four square leagues of the pueblo, and for other municipal uses. And it is alleged that the defendants own the land sought to be condemned, subject to this right of the city to the waters of the stream. These allegations are denied by the defendants, and, in view of the issue thus made, the defendants, before the commencement of the trial, moved the court to stay the proceedings in the action until the determination of certain other suits then pending between the city and the defendants, in which the question as to their respective rights in the waters of the river was involved. The defendants also moved to strike out the allegations of the complaint setting up the claim of the city to the waters of the stream, contending that the city could not maintain a proceeding to condemn lands while asserting title in itself to that which constituted their chief value. These motions were denied by the superior court, and the exceptions to the rulings thereon give rise to the first point discussed in the briefs. Before taking up this point, however, it may be well to state the manner in which, by consent of the parties, the case was tried. It was stipulated that the court, sitting without a jury, should hear the evidence of the parties for the purpose of determining: First, whether the use to which the property was to be applied was one authorized by law, and the taking necessary; second, whether the proposed plan was compatible with the greatest public good and least private injury; and, third, what was the nature and extent of the plaintiff's interest in the waters of the river, —and these things being determined, that a jury should be impaneled to assess the amount of compensation to be awarded to the defendants for the interest condemned. In accordance with this stipulation, the court heard evidence bearing upon the three points mentioned, and at its close called a jury, before whom the trial proceeded upon the question of damages. During the progress of the jury trial the court made an oral announcement of its conclusions upon the issues submitted to its decision, but no formal findings were filed until after the jury rendered their verdict. The court, however, in charging the jury, instructed them as to those matters so far as it deemed such instructions necessary.

The consent of defendants to this mode of trying the various issues in the case was, however, given with an express reservation of their objection that the court had no jurisdiction in this proceeding to try any question of title in the plaintiff to the waters of the river, and they now contend that the superior court erred in refusing to stay the trial of the cause until the respective rights of the parties had been determined in other pending suits; and this upon the ground that a proceeding for condemnation is not one in which adverse claims of title can be adjudicated. This contention is rested upon the proposition that the proceeding, being statutory and special, must be strictly pursued, and, since the statute makes no express provision for litigating a claim by the plaintiff to an interest in the property sought to be condemned, the court has no power to determine such claim, at least when contested by the defendant. But we think the statute does not require so strict a construction. The superior court is invested with a general jurisdiction of all special proceedings not otherwise provided for, and, in conducting such special proceedings, exercises its usual and ordinary powers in disposing of the issues which are necessarily involved. Among the matters which may be involved in any proceeding to condemn private property for a public use are adverse claims to the compensation to be awarded. In such proceedings the complaint must contain the names of all owners and claimants of the property, if known (Code Civ. Proc. § 1244); and all persons claiming any interest in the property, or damages, though not named, may appear and defend (Id. § 1246). And the court has power "to hear and determine all adverse and conflicting claims to the property sought to be condemned, and to the damages therefor." Id. § 1247. These propositions are, of course, conceded by the appellants, but they contend that the right to set up and litigate adverse claims is confined by the very words of the statute to those who are defendants. It is true, the express provision above quoted from section 1247 applies only to the conflicting claims of those who are made, or who make themselves, defendants in the proceeding, but this is only because the interests of the defendants alone are to be condemned. The statute does not contemplate the condemnation of an interest which the plaintiff already has, or the payment of any damages, except to compensate those whose property is to be taken away; and therefore the plaintiff can have no concern in the determination of "adverse or conflicting claims to the property sought to be condemned and the damages therefor." But, although this provision of the statute has no direct bearing on the question here presented, it contains an express legislative recognition of the entire competency of the court to try and determine adverse claims to the property in a proceeding to condemn.

The question, however, which we have to decide, is this: Can a plaintiff, who is already the owner of an interest in land, secure the condemnation of outstanding interests in a case which in other respects is a proper one for condemnation? This is an important question, for it is apparent that such cases may frequently arise. Private property suitable and necessary for some lawful public use is often owned in shares by different persons, or subject to liens or servitudes; and the owner of a share or an easement, or holder of a lien, may be the proper agent of the state for the exercise of its power of eminent domain. In such case it is certainly desirable that the law should supply a convenient procedure by which he could secure exclusive control and ownership of the property upon payment of the value of the outstanding shares, or of the whole, less the amount secured by lien, or as diminished by the existing servitudes. The defendants do not seem to contest the proposition that our statute is adequate to the exigencies of such a case, but they contend that, when the interest asserted by the plaintiff is disputed, the proceeding to condemn must be held in suspense until, in a separate action, the respective interests of the parties are judicially determined. But why the necessity of such circuitry of action? Both branches of the controversy would in any event be tried and determined in the same forum, and there seems to be no good reason why they may not be litigated in one action. Even if the adverse claim of the plaintiff were first determined in an action to quiet title, its subsequent assertion in a proceeding to condemn—whether admitted or contested—would be just as foreign to any express provision of the statute as if his right had never been determined. It follows, therefore, that the argument that the court can do nothing in these proceedings, except that which is in terms authorized by the statute, proves too much. It would not only debar the plaintiff from proceeding before his title had been adjudicated, but would debar him always. We see no reason for holding that a plaintiff is debarred from proceeding in such a case, nor can we see that the trial of all the issues in one action is attended with any special inconvenience. In whatever mode the plaintiff's interest in the property might be determined,—whether in a separate action, or preliminarily in the proceeding to condemn, as was done in this case,—the same consequences would follow; that is to say, the jury called to try the question of damages would require instructions as to the nature and quantity of outstanding interest remaining in the defendants, upon which to base an estimate of the damages, and the defendant would have the same remedy in case of erroneous instructions in either case. Considerations of convenience, therefore, do not seem to sustain the contention of appellants on this point. On the contrary, it would seem that very great public inconvenience might ensue if a plaintiff, asserting an interest in property which he seeks to subject to a public use, were obliged in every instance to prosecute to final judgment an action to quiet his title before he could proceed to condemn. And, if he can commence the proceeding to condemn before his interest has been adjudicated, it does not seem that a denial of his interest should stop the proceeding; for it is in the same court in which that issue must be tried in any event, and to try it when it is first made is only to do that which is necessarily incident to a proceeding clearly authorized, and express authority to do anything always implies the power to do that which is necessarily incidental.

If the views above expressed are in themselves reasonable, and if they embody a proper construction of the statute, they ought to prevail, even if opposed to previous decisions of this court; for no vested right can be violated or impaired by freeing a statutory remedy from inconvenient and burdensome restrictions imposed by a mistaken construction of the law. We are satisfied, however, that there is nothing decided in any of the cases referred to by counsel for appellants which is at all inconsistent with our conclusions. In Railroad Co. v. Moffatt, 7 Cal. 577, it was held, construing an act of 1853, that the commissioners appointed to assess the value of the property had nothing to do with the settlement of adverse claims, and that the persons in possession of the land condemned for a railroad were entitled to the whole assessed value of the land, as against third parties out of possession but claiming a superior title. This may have been a correct construction of the act of 1853, but the question here is different, and the law is materially different. In Spring Valley Water Works v. City of San Francisco, 22 Cal. 434, the act of 1853 was again construed, and it was again held that the commissioners appointed under that act to assess the value of the property condemned had nothing to do with adverse claims of ownership. That is a matter, it was said, to be determined by the court or judge before whom the proceeding was conducted, thus implying at least that the court could do what in the former case it was held it could not do. Wilcox v. City of Oakland, 49 Cal. 29, contains a dictum in line with the decisions in the two cases last cited to the effect that the commissioners appointed to assess damages have no authority to try questions of title as between adverse claimants—a proposition having no relation to the point in dispute here. In City of San Jose v. Freyschlag, 56 Cal. 8, which was a proceeding to condemn land for a street, the complaint alleged that the defendants were in possession and were the only owners and claimants of the land, and the answer set up the same fact. The jury, however, while assessing the damages at three hundred dollars, added a finding that defendants had dedicated the land for a street, and the court, adopting this finding, condemned the land, and awarded the defendants one dime by way of compensation. This judgment was reversed upon the sole and obvious ground that it was in conflict with the pleadings and based upon a finding without the issues, the court remarking obiter that if the plaintiff had alleged the fact of dedication it would have alleged itself out of court, because it would thus have shown the existence, by virtue of the dedication, of the only right it could have acquired by the proceeding to condemn.

City of San Jose v. Reed, 65 Cal. 242, 3 Pac. 806, was in all material respects the same as San Jose v. Freyschlag, and was decided the same way. The correctness of these decisions, and of the dictum, added to the first must be conceded, but they are not in point. The pleadings in this case distinctly allege that the defendants have a certain interest in the lands to be condemned, but not the whole interest; they show, in other words, that there is something to be condemned, and what that something is, and clearly make the issue which the court is to try. San Francisco & A. Water Co. v. Alameda Water Co., 36 Cal. 639, was a suit by one water company to enjoin a rival corporation from carrying on a proceeding to condemn water rights as to which the plaintiff asserted a preferential right of condemnation. It was held that the action was well brought in the district court, because the existing statute had not empowered the county court to try the question of preferential right between two corporations seeking to condemn the same property. This was no doubt a correct construction of the act of 1858, but our present statute is different (Code Civ. Proc. § 1247), and, if the question were the same, it would require to be differently decided, but it is in fact a very different question. In Water Co. v. Baker, 95 Cal. 269, 30 Pac. 537, it was held upon special demurrer that the complaint was bad for uncertainty in the description of the interest sought to be condemned. The plaintiffs in that case endeavored to excuse the admitted uncertainty in the description of the water rights which they sought to condemn upon the ground that they could not know the extent of such rights, and that it was therefore the duty of defendants to set out a certain description of what they claimed. Replying to this contention, the writer of the opinion said that it necessarily implied the further contention that the defendants would be subsequently estopped from asserting any rights which they neglected to set out,—a contention which he held could not be allowed, because this proceeding (to condemn) cannot thus be converted into an action to quiet title. This single expression in the opinion is all that appears to have any bearing upon the question here, and its bearing is only apparent, for, considered with reference to the point to be decided and in connection with what precedes and follows, it evidently means nothing more than this: That the plaintiff cannot in the proceeding to condemn, as he can in an action to quiet title, throw upon the defendant the burden of pleading the particular rights to be litigated, under penalty of forfeiting all that he does not expressly claim, or, in other words, that the rule of pleading in these cases requires the plaintiff to set out an accurate and intelligible description of the property, or the particular interest in the property, which, even in case of default, must be valued before it is condemned. We are in entire accord with this doctrine, and we think the plaintiff here has fully satisfied its demands. It has given an accurate description of what it seeks to condemn, and ought to pay for, before it takes possession. It claims an interest in the property, or an easement which it says diminishes the estate and interest of defendants, and all this is set out in order that the court and jury may know precisely what is to be considered in estimating the damages. We cannot, in the time at our disposal, undertake to review the numerous citations from the text writers and the decisions of other courts to which we have been referred by counsel. They undoubtedly contain expressions which in some instances are in conflict with the views above expressed, but we find nothing fairly and fully decided which cannot be reconciled with the conclusion we have reached, that the superior court did not err in overruling the motions to stay the proceedings and strike out.

2. The appellants contend in the next place that the superior court erred in overruling their several demurrers to the complaint as amended. The ground of the demurrers upon which they insist in their argument here is that the last amended complaint contains no certain description of the property which the plaintiff seeks to condemn, and they cite the case of Water Co. v. Baker, supra, in support of this contention. We do not think the cases are at all parallel. In the Aliso Case the description was in the last degree vague and uncertain, but here the complaint shows that the object of the proceeding is to condemn all the estate and interest of the defendants in 315 acres of land, which interest is alleged to be a fee-simple estate, subject only to the asserted ownership by the city of the exclusive right to the use of all the waters of the river from its source to the southern boundary of the city in trust, etc. If the interest claimed by the city is set forth with reasonable certainty, it necessarily follows that the interest to be condemned is equally certain, and we see no difficulty in determining from the complaint what the city claims. It asserts a right to the use of all the waters of the Los Angeles river flowing through these lands, paramount to and exclusive of any and all riparian rights in the owners of the lands. A great part of the argument of counsel for appellants is devoted to the question whether in fact and in law the city has any such right as she asserts, but this part of the argument seems to be out of place in considering the sufficiency of the complaint. The fact that the claim of the city has not been or cannot be established does not prove that it has not been clearly stated, and that is the only matter to be considered in ruling upon the demurrer.

3. The next proposition of appellants is stated in these terms: "If the court had any power to determine these questions at all in this action, it was error not to determine those issues before submitting the cause to the jury." To speak of submitting this cause to the jury is an inaccuracy which tends to confusion. By agreement of the parties only one issue in the cause was submitted to the jury, viz. the question of damages. All other issues were tried by the court, and it was of no importance in what order they were decided, except in so far as a determination of one point was necessary as a basis for the determination of another. Undoubtedly it was necessary that the jury should be correctly instructed as to the quantity and extent of the estate and interest of the defendants in the land, in order that they might correctly estimate its value; and since, from the nature of the rights in controversy, and the agreement of the parties, that point was to be decided by the court, it was necessary that the jury should be informed, before retiring to consider of their verdict, what the conclusion of the court was, but that conclusion could be stated as well before as after the filing of formal findings of fact and conclusions of law. These were an essential preliminary to the judgment, but not to the instructions to the jury, and, if the instructions actually given were correct and full, the fact that findings had not been previously filed is of no consequence. Whether the conclusions of the court upon this point were sound, and whether the jury were correctly instructed, are points to be considered in another connection.

4. The next contention of appellants is that there is no authority in law for the condemnation of these 315 acres in fee simple for the purposes for which the property is sought to be condemned. An ordinance of the city of Los Angeles approved on the 8th day of June, 1893, is attached to, and made a part of, the complaint. By its first section it ordained that it was necessary that the land in controversy "be acquired by condemnation for the purposes of constructing head works for a water system." It will be seen that the purpose to which the land was to be devoted was not very definitely stated in the ordinance, but the amended complaint filed herein is somewhat more explicit, and shows with reasonable clearness what the plan of the city is. The land is found to be saturated with water to within a few feet of the surface. It is proposed to construct a subsurface dam at the lower end of the tract. A subsurface dam, of course, would not have the effect of flooding the surface permanently, but it would permanently raise the plane of saturation. This being done, it is next proposed to tap this heavily saturated bed of sand and gravel by means of a tunnel connected with lateral galleries, through which the water will be drained off and conducted to the supply pipes. In other words, the land is to be used as a reservoir, such as essentially it is, and none the less so because the water does not rise and stand above the surface. The evidence in the case shows that from one-fifth to one-third of the entire bulk of the material filling the valley below the plane of saturation is water. The land in its natural state, therefore, is a reservoir, and a subsurface dam is to be constructed in order to make it better serve the purposes of a reservoir. Such being the use to which it is to be devoted, the fee simple may be taken. Code Civ. Proc. § 1239; St. 1891, p. 102. As to the necessity of taking the whole 315 acres the evidence is conflicting, and the finding of the superior court cannot be disturbed. The evidence introduced by the plaintiff showed that, in view of the rapid increase of the population of the city, the probable necessity of extending additional lateral galleries to obtain a larger flow of water, and to conform to changes in the channel of the surface stream, and the necessity of excluding live stock from the land to prevent contamination of the water, it was necessary that the city should have the exclusive ownership and control of the whole tract.

5. Appellants next contend that the amount awarded by the jury as compensation for the tract condemned was not justified by the evidence. The jury found that the value of the defendants' interest in the 315-acre tract was $23,000, and that their remaining land would be damaged $2,000, by the severance of the smaller parcel. Appellants concede that the evidence sustains this verdict, if the value of the land for agricultural purposes is alone to be considered; but they claim that it is of enormously greater value, by reason of the great quantity of water percolating in the soil, which they contend they have a right to collect and convey away to other lands for sale. This claim of ownership of percolating waters is met by a claim on the part of the plaintiff that what the defendants call "percolating waters" are as truly a part of the Los Angeles river as the visible surface stream, and out of this contention arise the most important questions in the case. There seems to be no substantial conflict in the evidence and no radical difference between the parties as to the character of the subsurface flow in the tract condemned. It is agreed that all the waters of the San Fernando valley, except what is lost by evaporation or consumed in plant life, flow out through the narrow pass between the eastern extremity of the Cahuenga range and the Verdugo hills, either on or beneath the surface; and there is abundant testimony to warrant the conclusion that at ordinary stages of the river the water flowing on the surface and that which is beneath the surface are in intimate contact, and moving in the same direction. The land condemned is situated a short distance west of the narrow outlet of the valley, but the conditions, though differing slightly in degree, are substantially the same. The valley is somewhat wider, but there also the water on the surface and that beneath the surface are in contact, and all flowing in the direction of the outlet,—on the surface at the rate of 2 or 3 feet per second, underground at an estimated rate of from 14 to 17 miles per annum. It appears, also, as stated above, that the Los Angeles river first appears as a surface stream a few miles west of the tract condemned, and gradually increases in volume as it flows to the east. The fact of this gradual increase in the surface flow of the river, taken in connection with the other facts above detailed, would seem to warrant the inference that the waters of the San Fernando valley, in seeking an outlet to the ocean, flow under the surface as far as they can find room to pass through the boulders, sand, and gravel which fill the space between the hills on either side, and gradually rise above the surface as the valley narrows and leaves less and less room for passage underneath. Much the larger portion of an extremely bulky record is filled with the evidence of expert witnesses in regard to the topography of the San Fernando valley, the material composing the valley proper, the amount of rainfall, measurements of surface flow, and a great variety of matters bearing upon this question of a subterranean stream. A careful study of this testimony, which, though conflicting upon many important points, is in reference to the larger and more general aspects of the case quite harmonious, convinces us that it is sufficient to sustain a finding in favor of the existence of a subterranean stream, if the law with respect to subterranean streams was correctly laid down in the charge of the court to the jury. There can be little doubt, we think, that the jury, under the instructions of the court, found that the subsurface flow in those lands was a part of the Los Angeles river, and governed by the law of riparian ownership, or by a pueblo right still more favorable to the plaintiff. If this was the finding, and if it was made under correct instructions, it cannot be said that the award of compensation is unsustained by the evidence; for, aside from the water flowing in the subterranean portion of the stream, as defined by the instructions, there is no evidence to prove the existence of any considerable quantity of percolating water in the tract condemned, and the same evidence which shows an inconsiderable quantity of such water tends strongly to prove that it could all be intercepted or drained by the owners of the adjoining lands before reaching the land taken. That is to say, if the defendants have the right to tunnel or trench their lands below the plane of saturation for the purpose of draining off water which has not yet reached to surface or subsurface stream, their neighbors on the north have the same right; and, since only a very small portion of the 315-acre tract is higher than the bed of the stream, the percolating waters which they could drain without interference with the stream would be too inconsiderable in amount, and their right too precarious, to add materially to the value of the land. Our conclusion on this point is that the verdict must stand, if the jury were correctly instructed, and this brings us to the consideration of the most important questions involved in the case.

6. A great many exceptions were taken to different instructions given by the court, and it is now insisted by appellants that the entire charge was in substance erroneous, and that the court erred in refusing to give the instructions requested by them, because they presented the law correctly, while the instructions actually given did not present it correctly. In view of the great number of exceptions to the charge,—on account not only of what it contains, but of what it does not contain,—there seems to be no more convenient method of presenting the points to be considered in this connection than by quoting very extensively from the record. The court charged the jury as follows:

"(1) Gentlemen of the Jury: This is an action whereby the plaintiff seeks to condemn for public use all the right, title, interest, and estate of the defendants in the lands described in the complaint. The land is situated in and on each side of the Los Angeles river, several miles above, and north of, the city of Los Angeles. The questions arising in the case involving the right of the plaintiff to condemn the property, and the nature and extent of the defendants' estate and interest in the land to be taken, have been determined by the court. The only question you are to decide is the amount of compensation which the defendants are entitled to before their estate and interest in the land can be taken as proposed.

"(2) This compensation is to be composed of two parts or elements: First, the value of the interest and estate of the defendants in the land described in the complaint; second, the amount of the damages which will accrue to the other land of the defendants, which is part of the same parcel as the land to be taken, by reason of the severance of the land to be condemned, and the construction of the works thereon as proposed by the plaintiff. For the purpose of assessing this compensation and damages, the right is deemed to have accrued at the date of the summons, which is June 27, 1893; and the actual value at that date is the measure of value for all property taken, and the basis of damages for all property injuriously affected.

"(3) The defendants' estate in the lands in controversy is an estate in fee simple, but it is subject to the right of the city of Los Angeles in the waters of the Los Angeles river. This river flows through the land to be condemned. If the city of Los Angeles had no interest in the river waters, then the defendants would have all the rights of riparian proprietors in those waters. As it is, their rights as riparian proprietors are impaired and diminished to the extent that the rights of the city affect those rights.

"(4) The city of Los Angeles is situated on the river below these lands, and is the owner of the right to take from the Los Angeles river all the water that is reasonably necessary to give an ample supply for the use of its inhabitants, and for all municipal uses and purposes for which the city may require water. This right is measured by the necessity, and, if the needs increase in the future, the right will expand to include all that the needs require. This right of the city is paramount and superior to the rights of the defendants in the waters of the river.

"(5) The defendants therefore have no right to so use or divert the water of the river as to diminish the same so that it will not furnish the amount needed for the supply of the city aforesaid, and, in determining the value of the land to be taken, this fact must be considered; and the value of the land for which defendants are entitled to compensation is its value, subject to the above-stated right of the city.

"(6) After the wants of the city are supplied, however, the defendants have the right to use the water of the river on their lands for any and every purpose which does not interfere with the equal rights or injure the lands of other riparian proprietors along the river above and below this land. These rights include a reasonable use of water of the river on the land for irrigation, domestic purposes, watering stock, or other lawful purpose; also, to obtain power by means of the fall of the stream on the land, returning the water to the stream before it leaves the land; also, the benefit of having the water flow in its accustomed manner through the land. The right to use the water to irrigate the land through which it runs is subject to the condition that other riparian owners along the stream have the same right, and, if the water is not sufficient for all, neither has a right to use more than his reasonable share. All these rights are incident to the land, because the river borders on the land; and they are not mere appurtenances, but are part and parcel of the land itself.

"(7) In exercising this riparian right the defendants have no right to carry any of the waters of the Los Angeles river off of their riparian land for use on land not riparian, nor can they sell it for use on land not riparian; and all surplus waters must be turned back into the stream.

"(8) Rights in a subterranean water course or stream are governed by the same rules as a surface stream of water; and the only rights that the defendants, as owners of the lands sought to be condemned, would have in any subterranean water course flowing through their lands down to and through the lands of others (whether said stream flowed on such lower lands above the surface, or beneath the surface of the ground), would be to make the same, but no other, use that they would be entitled to make had such waters flowed on the surface.

"(9) A riparian proprietor is not entitled to divert, for any purpose except for purposes for which he is entitled to make use of on his riparian lands as specified in these instructions, any portion of the waters of a water course or stream, whether surface or subterranean; and he cannot by any indirect means make such diversion where he would not have been authorized to do so directly. Therefore a riparian proprietor cannot, by sinking tunnels or making other excavations under the sides or underneath the bed of such water course, draw away for use on non-riparian lands any of the waters flowing in such water course, although said excavations may not directly touch said stream. If, for instance, the water of stream percolates into the banks or bed thereof to a considerable but limited distance, and such percolating water is stationary or has very little motion, said riparian proprietor would have no right to make an excavation so as to draw off said percolating water, if the effect would be to cause any of the running waters of said stream to leave the same in order to fill up the voids left in the banks or bed from which said percolating waters were drawn by such excavation, any more than if said excavation was made so as to tap said stream directly.

"(10) The mere fact that some of the subterranean water forming part of the stream on the lands sought to be condemned may be lost before reaching the point where the same would have gone into and made up part of the surface or subterranean stream of the Los Angeles river would not give the defendants the right to divert an amount of said subterranean waters in said lands equal to or less than the amount so lost, if such diversion would have the effect of diminishing the waters, surface or subterranean, of the said river at any point above the south line of the pueblo lands of the city of Los Angeles.

"(11) Whatever additional market value the land may have had by reason of these rights and advantages, so far as they do not interfere with or impair the rights of the city aforesaid, this value the defendants are entitled to, as a part of the value of the land, before it can be taken; and this value you must include in your estimate of the value of the land sought to be condemned.

"(12) In addition to these rights and benefits arising from the flow of the river through this land, the defendants are the absolute owners of all such water as may be present in the soil of this land, and which does not constitute a part of the water of the river. This is usually called 'percolating water.' There is, however, no magic in the word 'percolating'; and the fact that any witness may apply that word, or refuse to apply it, to any particular class of waters of which he may speak, is not conclusive of the question whether or not such water does or does not form part of the river. That question is to be determined by you from a consideration of the facts proven. The right and ownership of the defendants in this class of waters is distinct from, and much greater than, their right to the waters of the stream. As to the waters of the stream, they have a right only to the use of it on this land, and they do not own its corpus, or its body, or the very water itself; and they have no right to take it away from the land and use it on other lands, or to sell or dispose of it for use on other lands or at other places. But as to this other water, if any there is in this land, not a part of the stream, they are the absolute owners of it, to the same extent and as fully as they own the soil or the rocks or timber on the land. Therefore, if by any means they can separate this water from the land, they have an absolute right to the water thus separated, and may conduct it away and sell or dispose of it anywhere as they see fit, subject only to the limitation that they may not excavate or do anything on the land for the mere purpose of intercepting such water, and preventing same from flowing into the stream or water course on the land of another, and without intending to make any beneficial use of it themselves. Whatever additional market value this land may have had by reason of the presence therein of water of this class, or by reason of the feasibility of separating it from the land, or of using it on the land, or of conducting it to some other place for use or sale, or of the great market value of such water for such purposes, or by reason of all these things combined, or by reason of any other lawful benefit or advantage which this water gives, this additional market value inures to the benefit of the defendants, and is a part of the compensation to which they are entitled in this case, as the value of the land to be condemned.

"(13) It will be necessary, therefore, for you to determine what waters upon or in this land are a part of the waters of the stream, and what waters are not of the waters of the stream. This question is a question of fact, to be determined by you from the evidence, under the instructions of the court.

"(14) The Los Angeles river is composed of its main stream and any branches it may have, whether surface or subterranean.

"(15) While a water course must have a bed and banks or sides, yet such bed may consist of any material which keeps the waters from penetrating below a certain depth, and such banks or sides may consist of any material which has the effect of confining the waters within circumscribed limits.

"(16) It does not always follow that water which does not flow on the surface in a visible stream is for that reason not a water course, or not a part of the water of a stream which does at some place run on the surface; nor need it flow in a defined channel underground, as a solid body of moving water of any particular dimensions, in order to constitute a water course. If you find from the evidence that there is a bed or a river bottom filled to a considerable depth with sand, gravel, or other porous material, meandering over which a stream runs on the surface, and through and in which the water moves underground, enough of it rising to the surface to supply the surface stream, and the other portions of the underground water moving with a much less velocity than the surface stream, and through a wider or larger space in and through the interstices of the porous material, but in the same general direction as the surface stream, and in connection with it, and in a course and within a space reasonably well defined,—the conditions being such that the existence and general direction of the body of water moving underground can be determined with reasonable accuracy,—then that portion of the water thus moving underground should be considered as a part of the water course, as well as that part which flows over the surface. If such water course exists, it is immaterial, so far as the water course is concerned, from or through what lands the waters flow in reaching the channel, or whether they reach the same by percolation or by clearly-defined streams.

"(17) So, also, if you find that the water coming down on the surface in the streams known as the 'Tejunga,' 'Little Tejunga,' and 'Pacoima' creeks, in the northeastern portion of the watershed, is discharged on the plain known as the 'San Fernando Basin,' and there sinks in the sand, washes and flows down southwardly underground through sand, gravel, or other material easily permeable by water, and along the courses and its channels which have been made by the streams of water from these same creeks flowing on the surface, but which channels were long ago filled up with this porous material; that these waters now flow in these channels beneath the surface to the land in controversy; that on this land there is a range of hills extending easterly and westerly, so as to change the course of these underground channels, and combine or collect the water into one general body of water, and force the same to turn and move eastwardly in a similar channel through these lands, and on down along the general course of the Los Angeles river; that upon arriving at this land a portion of the water rises to the surface, and flows above-ground as the Los Angeles river, and the remainder flows underground along in the same general direction, and in connection with the surface stream, in porous material formerly deposited by the same stream in its bed,—then all this body of water, both above and below the ground, should be deemed a part of the same stream from its sources to its outlet.

"(18) If the jury find that on the lands sought to be condemned there is situated the river bottom of the Los Angeles river, extending the whole length of said land, and occupying nearly the whole thereof, and containing all of the subterranean waters of said land, and filled to a considerable depth with permeable material, consisting of loam, sand, gravel, and boulders, mixed together, and interspersed with irregular and broken strata, masses, or pockets of clay, and cemented sand or gravel, lying in place substantially as deposited by the forces of nature, and that as the same lies in place the natural voids or interstices of such material generally throughout the whole of said river bottom are equal to from one-fifth to one-third of the entire mass; and that the subterranean waters in said lands enter the same chiefly from the north and partly from the west sides thereof, from lands composed of substantially the same materials as the lands sought to be condemned, said waters so entering under pressure caused by gravity; and that the south boundary of said river bottom is formed of an impermeable dike of rock known as the 'Cahuenga Hills,' and said waters entering from said north side are prevented from continuing their flow to the south and are dammed up by said wall of rock, and that all of the subterranean waters in said river bottom are thereby forced to fill all of the said interstices and void places in the material of which said river bottom is composed, to a height in some places equal to, and in some places greater than, the level of the surface stream of the river; and that there are no impenetrable and continuous barriers extending through the said mass in said river bottom in any direction so as to interrupt and prevent the substantial continuity and contact of all of said subterranean waters; and that some of said subterranean waters, to the amount of about one thousand miners' inches constant flow, measured under a four-inch pressure, being so brought to the surface, enter into and form part of the surface stream of the Los Angeles river on said lands, so that the amount of said surface flow at the point where the same leaves said land on the east is increased by about one thousand inches over the amount of its surface flow at the point where it enters said land on the west; and that the remainder of said subterranean waters move underground to the east, although with a varying velocity, and much slower than the said surface stream, but in the same general direction with it, off of the lands sought to be condemned, and still continuing in and through the river bottom of the Los Angeles river, which is composed of like permeable material as aforesaid, and bounded and confined on the southerly, as it turns to the south, on the westerly side thereof by the same continuous dike of rock, said waters still maintaining their substantial continuity; and that part of said waters rise from time to time as they flow in said river bottom and feed the surface flow of said river, and the remainder of said waters continue to move underground in said river bottom as aforesaid, and that said waters continue to move in that manner for several miles after leaving the lands sought to be condemned, and until said river bottom enters within the limits of the city of Los Angeles, crossing its northern boundary,—then the jury must find that all of the subterranean waters contained in the land sought to be condemned are a part of the waters of the Los Angeles river.

"(19) On the other hand, the law is that innumerable little streams finding their way through the soil, or seeping or percolating through the material of which it is composed, do not become water courses simply because the amount, when exposed, is visible. A water course must consist of beds, banks, or sides, and water, and the water must be flowing in a channel or course more or less defined. It is not necessary that the water should flow continually, or at all times of the year; but neither is a mere swale, in which extraordinary freshets flow, sufficient to answer the definition. To maintain the right to a water course or brook, it must be made to appear that the water usually flows in a certain direction and in a regular channel, with banks or sides, though it need not to be in a straight line. Waters, whether under or above ground, having no certain general course or definite limits, such as those merely percolating through the strata of the earth and those diffused over its surface, are not water courses, and are not subject to the rules of law applicable to water courses. To entitle an underground stream to the consideration of the law, it is necessary that it be a water course, in the proper sense of the term. Percolations which spread themselves in every direction through the earth do not constitute water courses. Water moving by force of gravity in a valley or basin of wide extent,—say, twenty-four by twelve miles at the extreme extent,—and moving generally through the hole or through a large portion of the basin, along through the natural voids or interstices of the earth, composed of alluvial or other deposit lying throughout the entire basin, and made up of loam, sand, gravel, and boulders, mixed together, and interspersed with irregular and broken strata or masses of clay or cemented sand and gravel, and lying in place as originally deposited by the forces of nature, do not constitute a water course, but are a part of the land, and belong to the owner of land as fully as any other constituent part of it.

"(20) If you find from the evidence that the lands sought to be condemned are situated at the lower portion of, and form a part of, the San Fernando basin or watershed, near or at its outlet, and that said basin is about twenty-four miles long and about twelve miles wide at the widest point, and that said outlet is from two thousand feet to three miles wide, and bounded and defined on the southern side by the rock of the Cahuenga range, and on its northern side by a similar rock of the Verdugo hills, and that the earth of which the basin is generally composed, including said outlet and the land sought to be condemned, is an alluvial or other deposit made up of loam, sand, gravel, and boulders, mixed together, and interspersed with broken or irregular strata or masses of clay or cemented sand and gravel, and lying in place as originally deposited by the forces of nature, and that as the same lies in place the natural voids or interstices of such earth generally throughout the basin, including the defendants' lands and said outlet, are equal to from one-fifth to one-third of the bulk of the entire mass, and that such entire deposit lies upon a grade or slope towards and through the outlet of such basin, and that all the water falling in the watershed of such basin, which is not lost in storm, run off, or by evaporation, or in supporting plant life, or held immovable in the ground, sinks into the earth composing such basin, and thence by force of gravity moves down through such voids or natural interstices of the earth throughout the greater portion of the entire mass to the outlet of the basin, through which it passes, without forming anywhere in the mass any definite course or channel in which it can be ascertained with reasonable accuracy that such water is moving in greater quantities or with greater velocity than in other places, so as to be concentrated in a stream either above or below ground, then such waters so moving through such outlet, or through or in defendants' land in the natural voids or interstices of the earth, do not constitute a subterranean flowing stream or water course, but they belong to the owner of the soil in which they may be found, and the portion of them which may be found in the land of the defendants is the property of the defendants. But if such water does collect underground and flow in certain courses or channels through coarse, permeable material therein, where the existence and general course of the flowing or moving body of water can be easily determined, then the water so moving in such channels would constitute a water course, although not visible on the surface, and although the space through which the channel extends may be largely filled with the material through which the water flows. The burden of proving that waters moving in the ground are flowing in a natural water course or in a defined channel, or are a part of a stream, is upon the plaintiff in this action. The presumption is that they are not part of a stream or water course, nor flowing in a definite channel.

"(21) A stream which flows along and in a natural channel, at some places flowing on the surface, and at some places sinking in porous material which has been deposited in and has filled the channel, and there passing down along in the same channel underground, and again rising to the surface and flowing as a surface stream, is no less a stream or water course at the points where it flows under the surface than at the places where it runs on the surface. And, if part of the water remains moving underground at the places where the surface stream flows, all of the water, both above and below the surface, constitutes the stream. And if at places the channel widens very much, and is filled with gravel, sand, or other porous material, in which the water spreads so as to fill the voids of the porous material, forming the semblance of an underground lake or reservoir, with no water appearing on the surface therein, but with the water passing on beneath the ground down the widened channel, and afterwards reappearing below as a surface stream, then the water would be as much a part of the stream while it was contained in such underground lake or widened channel as while it was flowing on the surface. And, on the other hand, water which has not formed part of such stream, and is not moving in such underground channel, but comes from surface water, or from rains and floods sinking into the ground and passing through the soil by gravitation, having no general direction, although it may eventually find its way into some stream or water course and materially add to the water thereof, yet while so passing through the ground it is not a stream or water course, but is part of the soil, and is the property of the owner thereof.

"(22) In determining the actual value of the land taken, you are to take into consideration all of those factors which enter into and make up its value: The altitude of the tract; the capability of taking to the city of Los Angeles, and to the country east and west of it, by gravity, the waters which may be collected on said land, without taking the waters of the natural stream; the amount of water which can thus be collected; the fact that the land sought to be condemned is so situated as to constitute the best place along the Los Angeles river for obtaining a water supply, and conducting the same either to the city or other tracts east and west of it; the needs of water in different places within the reach of this tract of land, and of the water which may be thus collected thereon. All are circumstances to be considered by you in determining its actual value.

"(23) If the jury believe from the evidence that the subterranean waters in the land sought to be condemned are percolating without any definite channel, and that the same are not a subterranean water course or stream; and if they believe that such waters come onto said lands from the lands of others above, or pass from the lands sought to be condemned down to the lands of others lying below, and that such upper proprietors could, by the construction of tunnels or other works, cut off or divert said waters, or some part thereof, from the lands sought to be condemned, or that such lower proprietors could construct tunnels or other works on the lands lying below the lands sought to be condemned, which would have the effect of draining or depriving the lands sought to be condemned of their subterranean waters, to the extent that the owners of the land sought to be condemned could not make a practical use thereof, or of some part of said waters,—then the jury are instructed that such upper and lower proprietors would have the same rights so to appropriate said waters on their lands as the defendants would have on the lands sought to be condemned; and the jury must take those facts into consideration so far as they diminish or destroy the value of the rights of the defendants to said waters, or such portion thereof as could be so diverted or drained so as to deprive defendants of the practical use thereof."

We will now take up the specific objections of the defendants to these instructions in the order in which they are stated. The first is to instruction No. 10. It might be a sufficient answer to the objection now urged in the argument to say that it is not one of the objections stated at the trial, and specified in the exception then taken. But, waiving that point, it seems clear to us that, unless the entire theory of the instructions in regard to underground streams and percolating waters is wrong, this instruction is right, or at least is harmless. The fault found with it is that it denies the right of defendants to divert any part of the underflow on their lands, whether the water diverted would ever reach the surface stream or not. But the instruction is limited to subterranean water which is a part of the stream, as in other instructions defined; and, if it is a part of the stream, it cannot be diverted, whether it would come to the surface or not. It belongs to the stream, and must flow on to the lower riparian proprietor. His right to the subsurface portion of the stream is identical with his right to the surface flow, and is entitled to the same protection. As to the criticism that the instruction is meaningless, it must be admitted that it does not clearly explain itself. But the respondent points out that it refers to a claim made by defendants that a large portion of the subsurface flow was somehow lost from the stream between their land and the city, and therefore they could divert an equal or smaller quantity without injury. If such a claim was made, the instruction was perhaps necessary. If it was not made, the instruction was harmless.

Counsel next criticise instruction No. 12, complaining that it confounds percolating waters and waters of the stream in such a manner as to render the court's view of the law absolutely unascertainable, and to give the jury to understand that, notwithstanding water may be percolating, it may still be a part of the stream. We think the meaning of this instruction is entirely clear, and that the only question is as to its soundness in point of law. The court certainly did intend in this instruction, and in many others, to tell the jury that water passing through the voids of any loose, permeable material filling or partially obstructing the channel of a stream is still water of the stream. If it all sinks beneath the surface, the whole stream is subterranean. If a part sinks, and the remainder flows upon the surface, that which is invisible is as much a part of the stream as the surface flow. The difference between counsel and the superior court at this point seems to be that to them all water passing through sand, gravel, and boulders is percolating water, and the mere fact of percolation is inconsistent with the idea of a stream, while to the court there is no such inconsistency when the material through which the water forces itself fills a well-defined channel, with impervious sides and bed, through which a considerable body of water flows from its source to its resting place. If this view of the court is correct, the instruction is neither erroneous nor obscure.

The quotations made by counsel from instructions Nos. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and their criticisms thereon, are all directed to the proposition that the court understood, and intended the jury to understand, that nothing is essential to the constitution of a subterranean stream, except that the general direction of the flow of the water is discoverable; that in this sense the whole San Fernando valley is a subterranean stream, and the jury might as well have been instructed in terms to find that there was in this land no percolating water, the property of the defendants. We do not think the instructions referred to, taken by themselves, necessarily bear this construction; and certainly when considered in connection with those numbered 19 and 20, and others, it clearly appears that the court was not giving, or intending to give, a definition which would make the whole San Fernando basin a subterranean stream. The instructions, taken all together are applicable, in their definition of a subterranean stream, exclusively to the comparatively narrow outlet of the valley between the Cahuenga range and the Verdugo hills, where all agree that the entire rainfall of the valley passes out, partly on and partly beneath the surface, between the rocky and comparatively impervious mountain sides on either hand. It is true, this pass, on the surface, is from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in width, and that in it borings have been made over 100 feet in depth before encountering bed rock; but here is not only water moving in a definite direction, but also sides and bed to the channel in which it is moving, and these, also, are comprehended in the court's definition of a subterranean stream. Another objection to these instructions, particularly to No. 16, is that they charge the jury upon questions of fact. We cannot see that these instructions are at all objectionable upon this ground. What a subterranean stream must be in order to bring it within the law of riparian rights is a question of law, and the entire scope of these instructions includes nothing but a statement of the facts which the jury must find from the evidence in order to determine whether there is a subterranean stream, and, if so, how much of the water in the land is part of that stream. This is in no wise a transgression of the province of the court. Another objection to several of these instructions is that there was no evidence upon which to base them. We think, however, that there is not only some evidence, but very substantial evidence, contained in the record, tending to prove every material portion of the various hypotheses stated in the instructions.

Before proceeding to a consideration of the numerous exceptions of the appellants to the rulings of the superior court upon the instructions requested by them, it will be convenient to first dispose of the main question in the case, viz. the proper definition of a subterranean stream. There is no dispute between the parties, and no conflict in the authorities, as to the proposition that subterranean streams flowing through known and definite channels are governed by the same rules that apply to surface streams. The cases in which this and cognate questions have been raised and decided are innumerable, and it would be an endless task to review or even to name them. No case involving directly the rights of parties in subterranean streams has been decided in this court, but the law, as applicable to the present case, is well epitomized in section 48 of Kinney on Irrigation, as follows: "Subterranean or underground water courses are, as their names indicate, those water currents that flow under the surface of the earth. A large portion of the great plains and valleys of the mountainous regions of the West is underlaid by a stratum of water-bearing sand and gravel, and fed by the water from the mountain drainage. This water-bearing stratum is of great thickness. The water is moving freely through it, is practically inexhaustible, and, if it can be brought to the surface, will irrigate a large portion of the country overlying it. In and near the mountains many streams have a bed which was originally a rocky cañon, but has been filled up with bowlders and coarse gravel. In this debris a large portion or all of the water sinks from sight, to reappear only when some rocky reef crosses the channel and forces the water to the surface. The movement of this water through the porous gravel, owing to the declivity of the stream, is often quite rapid, and a considerable volume may thus pass down the channel hidden from sight. These water courses are divided into two distinct classes,—those whose channels are known or defined, and those unknown and undefined. It is necessary to bear this distinction in mind in our discussion, as they are governed by entirely different principles of law. And in this connection it will be well to say that the word 'defined' means a contracted and bounded channel, though the course of the stream may be undefined by human knowledge; and the word 'known' refers to knowledge of the course of the stream by reasonable inference. Regarding the laws governing these two classes, it must be known that if underground currents of water flow in well-defined and known channels, the course of which can be distinctly traced, they are governed by the same rules of law that govern streams flowing upon the surface of the earth. The owner of land under which a stream flows can therefore maintain an action for the diversion of it, if such diversion takes place under the same circumstances as would enable him to recover if the stream had been wholly above ground. But for this purpose the underground water must flow in known and well-defined channels, so as to constitute regular and constant streams, in order that the riparian owner or appropriator may invoke the same rules as are applied to surface streams, or otherwise the presumption will be that they have their sources in the ordinary percolations through the soil. This rule practically disposes of the second class of subterranean waters,—those whose channels are unknown and undefined,—although there are undoubtedly a great many underground streams whose waters flow in confined channels, but whose courses are not known; and, following the above rule, these are all classed with percolating waters." The point to be specially noted here is the meaning ascribed to the words "defined" and "known." "Defined" means a contracted and bounded channel, though the course of the stream may be undefined by human knowledge; and the word 'known' refers to knowledge of the course of the stream by reasonable inference." In this case the boundaries of the channel and the existence and course of the underground stream were unknown and undefined, except so far as they could be inferred; but there was a great amount of evidence from which a reasonable inference could be drawn that the channel was bounded and defined by the sloping sides of the Cahuenga and Verdugo hills meeting underground, and that there was a subsurface flow corresponding with the surface flow from west to east out through the gap. Without any excavation beneath the surface, or other test or experiment, all this could be inferred from the topography of the country, the amount of rainfall, and the gradually augmenting volume of the surface stream in its approach to the narrowest point in the pass. And the court was certainly justified in submitting to the jury the question whether the subsurface flow was a part of the stream, unless the mere fact that it was forcing its way through sand and gravel and bowlders deprived it of the character of a stream. Upon this point we are satisfied that the view of the superior court was the reasonable and just view, and not opposed to anything that has ever been decided in this court.

This is in fact the pioneer case of its kind, so far as this court is concerned. There have been cases here in which injunctions were sought to prevent owners of land from digging or trenching or tunneling in their own premises, upon the ground that they were cutting off the subterranean sources of springs and streams; and they have been uniformly decided in accordance with the accepted doctrine as to rights in percolating waters,—the doctrine which defendants contend is applicable here. Those most nearly in point and most relied on are Hanson v. McCue, 43 Cal. 178; Railroad Co. v. Dufour, 95 Cal. 615, 30 Pac. 783; and Gould v. Eaton, 111 Cal. 639, 44 Pac. 319. But in none of these cases was there any evidence comparable to the evidence here of an underground stream. Gould v. Eaton comes nearer to this case than either of the others, but in that case it was found by the lower court that the portion of the water as to which there was any controversy was merely feeding the stream by percolation. And even in that case, which went as far as any case has ever gone in favor of the doctrine that percolating waters are a part of the soil, and belong to the owner of the land, it was conceded, if not decided, that no water can be abstracted from a surface stream by tunneling beneath it, notwithstanding the water must pass from stream to tunnel by percolation, or filtration through the soil. In this case there is a great amount of evidence tending to prove that the defendants could not take any material quantity of water out of their land without abstracting an equivalent amount from the surface stream; the reason being that the water of the surface stream would necessarily sink into the loose, porous material underneath, to fill the voids occasioned by the drawing off of the water from below. This, however, is a matter involved in another aspect of the case, the present inquiry relating exclusively to the proper definition of a "subterranean stream." Upon this point we hold that the instructions of the court contain a sound and correct statement of the law as it applies and ought to apply to streams of the character of the Los Angeles river. To hold otherwise would be destructive of rights long supposed to be certain and assured. Upon the doctrine contended for by defendants, the whole of the Los Angeles river could be diverted from the city, and the sole water supply of a community of over 100,000 people completely cut off; for it is not alone the defendants who own water-bearing lands in the San Fernando valley, and, if they can abstract and convey to distant points the water in the land sought to be condemned, others can do the same thing. There would be nothing to prevent the driving of tunnels through the Cahuenga range at a dozen points, and tapping the water below the level of the surface stream in such a manner that, by extending filtration galleries in sufficient number, the whole flow of the river could be abstracted. Once concede that the defendants may draw off the subsurface flow, or any part of it, the same privilege must be conceded to others; and the man or the corporation that can put in the largest tunnel at the lowest level will get the lion's share, while the inhabitants of Los Angeles will get none. The doctrine, therefore, while ruinous to those who have built up a populous and prosperous city upon the faith that they were secure of a supply of water for domestic and municipal purposes, would afford no security to the defendants, or to any one in their situation; for what they could take from the city others could take from them.

We come now to consider the instructions asked by defendants, and refused by the court. There was no error in refusing instructions 15, 16, 17, and 18, for they had been given substantially in the charge of the court. Instruction No. 19 was refused as misleading. We do not see how the jury could have been misled by this instruction as requested, but it, like the others, had been given in substance, and without any improper qualification, and therefore it was not prejudicial error to refuse it. The instructions 20 to 25, inclusive, were all properly refused upon the grounds stated by the court. They all related to percolating waters and subterranean streams, and, so far as correct, had been given in substance. Instruction 31 had been given in substance, and its refusal is justified upon that ground. No. 32 was not law. Nos. 34 and 35 were given in a modified form in instructions Nos. 19 and 20, above quoted. These modifications were certainly proper, and probably necessary to prevent misunderstanding. No. 36 was properly refused as containing the propositions which the modifications just referred to were designed to exclude. It declared that the question of percolating waters or running streams is not affected by the fact that the subsurface flow has a definite direction corresponding with that of the surface flow, etc. These facts do very materially affect the question in this case, and would deserve serious consideration in any case. Instruction No. 33, requested by defendants, contains a sound proposition, viz. that no act of the legislature of California can diminish or change the rights of the defendants in these lands derived from their predecessors, the Mexican and Spanish grantees. But this was a question with which the jury had nothing to do. The court had determined the rights of plaintiff as successor to the pueblo, and had instructed the jury what those rights were. Whether its instructions on this point were correct is a matter to be considered when we come to those instructions; but, whether correct or incorrect, they necessarily controlled the verdict of the jury, to the exclusion of all questions as to the effect of the acts of the legislature.

7. We come now to another series of instructions given and refused, relating to the rights of the plaintiff as successor to the pueblo. It must be borne in mind that this was one of the issues in the case which by agreement of the parties was tried by the court. The instructions given to the jury on this point are therefore to be regarded as embodying the findings and conclusions of the court upon that particular issue, and treated accordingly; the only question being whether the decision of the court as to the extent of the city's right in the waters of the river is sustained by the evidence. Instructions 3 to 6, above quoted, embody the views of the court as stated to the jury, and it is claimed that they are erroneous in several particulars. It is still more strongly insisted that the court erred in refusing instructions 12, 13, and 14 requested by defendants, which read as follows:

"(12) The rights of the ancient pueblo of Los Angeles, whatever they may have been, were not attempted to be granted by the legislature to the city of Los Angeles, except to the extent of four square miles, and could not, under any circumstances, have extended beyond four square leagues.

"(13) The use to which the pueblo was authorized to apply the water was such purposes as appertained to the Spanish pueblo, under the civilization of those times; and it did not extend to the cultivation and irrigation of parks, or the creation and maintenance of artificial lakes therein, or supplying waters for an outfall sewer.

"(14) The said pueblo of Los Angeles had no paramount rights to the use of the waters for any purpose, as against those grantees of the Mexican government under whom the defendants here claim; but the raising of stock and tilling the land granted by the Mexican government to these grantees were as much parts of the policy of the Spanish and Mexican government as the founding of pueblos and promoting the progress of those towns. And rights to the use of water by the grantees of these ranchos for domestic uses and stock and agricultural purposes were protected by the laws and policies of those governments, as well as the interests of inhabitants of towns."

In discussing this branch of the case it will not be necessary to take up seriatim the particular exceptions reserved by the defendants to the giving and refusal of these various instructions. It will be sufficient to consider a few general propositions to which they give rise.

The pueblo of Los Angeles embraced 4 square leagues (something more than 17,000 acres) of land. The city of Los Angeles, as originally incorporated, embraced the same area; but by successive amendments to its charter its area has been about doubled by the addition of lands outside of, but contiguous to, the original pueblo. Within the city several parks have been laid out, in which there are artificial lakes of considerable size, with lawns and shrubberies requiring irrigation. An outfall sewer has been constructed, through which the sewage of the whole city is carried to the Pacific Ocean, requiring a large amount of water. The population of the city exceeds 100,000, and it is rapidly increasing. The defendants hold their lands as successors to several Spanish and Mexican grantees, under patents from the United States based upon the original grants. They claim that, even conceding the rights of the pueblo and the city's succession to those rights (a concession which they make only for the purposes of the argument on this point), they are still, by virtue of their ownership of the lands in question, entitled to the exercise of full riparian rights, except so far, and so far only, as those rights are impaired by the paramount rights of the pueblo as they existed before the change of flag, and without any legislative addition thereto. This claim, we think, is clearly just. The legislature of California could grant nothing to the city of Los Angeles which belonged to others; and the rights of the city, as successor to the pueblo, in the lands of riparian proprietors holding under Mexican and Spanish grants, cannot exceed the rights of the pueblo itself. This being so, the facts above detailed regarding the growth and extension of the city, and the municipal uses to which it is applying the water drawn from the river, give rise to the questions upon which the charge of the court and the instructions requested by the defendants so radically differ. By instruction No. 4, above quoted, I understand the court to have charged the jury that the defendants had no right, as owners of these lands, to take any water from the river for irrigation, watering stock, or even for domestic purposes, if by so doing they would deprive the inhabitants of the present or future city of Los Angeles of an ample supply for all domestic and municipal purposes. I think this instruction is erroneous. If the paramount right of the city is only the right of the old pueblo to which it succeeded, I cannot see how such right covers the requirements of that large portion of the present city outside of the four leagues constituting the pueblo. The inhabitants of that limited territory, to whatever number they may increase, enjoy the full pueblo right, but beyond that territory the right does not extend. The city, of course, has the power to provide water for all its inhabitants and for all public purposes throughout its extended limits; but if, in order to supply the territory outside of the pueblo boundaries, it finds itself compelled to encroach upon the riparian rights of landowners along the river, it ought to pay for those rights, the same as for any other private property taken for a public use. This is not the same proposition involved in the case of Vernon Irrigation Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 106 Cal. 237, 39 Pac. 762, but it is governed by the same principle, and that case is authority, if authority were required, for my conclusion upon this point. As to the public purposes for which the city may use water in the exercise of its paramount right, the question is not of such easy solution. The view of the defendants is set forth in the instructions requested by them, numbered 13 and 14, supra. No. 14 I think erroneous, because it denies to the pueblo any paramount right for any purpose. And No. 13, I think, is also erroneous, in limiting too strictly the purposes for which the city, as successor to the pueblo, has a paramount right to the use of the water of the river. It is certain that irrigation of the pueblo lands was one of the purposes for which the pueblo could take the water, and the fact that some of those lands have been converted into ornamental parks does not impair the right to irrigate them. An outfall sewer is something which I suppose was never contemplated in the foundation of a Spanish or Mexican pueblo, but this was because the modern system of water supply for domestic purposes and modern methods of house drainage were then unknown. These improvements have made an outfall sewer necessary for the health and convenience of the inhabitants of Los Angeles, and since the water was granted or dedicated as much for the health and convenience of the pueblo as for any other purpose, and since it has been practically settled that the pueblo right expands with the increasing needs of the inhabitants, the right to drain the city by means of an outfall sewer, and to keep the sewer in a state of efficiency by the necessary flushing, must be held to be fairly within the pueblo right. But the maintenance of artificial lakes, by which undoubtedly a large quantity of water is lost through absorption and evaporation, never was necessary for the support or health or convenience of the inhabitants of a pueblo, however much it might have contributed to their pleasure, and I know of no principle upon which their right to use the waters of a river for such a purpose could have been deemed paramount to the ordinary rights of riparian proprietors. It was not only the policy of the Spanish and Mexican authorities to foster the growth of the pueblos, but also to encourage the raising of stock and other rural industries to which the use of water for domestic purposes, the watering of stock, and irrigation were essential; and it is not to be believed that in the primitive condition of society in those times, when the settlement of the country and the support of its inhabitants was the primary consideration, the most favored pueblo would have been allowed to consume in the maintenance of ornamental fountains and artificial lakes water necessary to the sustenance of an essential branch of industry.

8. But the appellants go still further, and contend that when the land in controversy was granted to their predecessors there was no pueblo of Los Angeles, and consequently no pueblo right to which any of their rights could be subordinated. This contention is based upon certain executive orders of departmental officials made in pursuance of a Mexican law of 1837, by which the pueblos containing less than a certain minimum of population were deprived of their ayuntamientos. Under this law the ayuntamiento of Los Angeles was abolished or suspended for a time. But we do not understand that the pueblo was extinguished, or its rights to the waters of the river at all impaired, by the abolition of the ayuntamiento. The only result was that its affairs were administered by a prefect, or other officer appointed by the central authority, instead of by a local council. This question, however, ought to be considered closed by the previous decisions of this court in the Vernon Irrigation Company's Case and others. All of the laws and public documents upon which its solution depends are within the judicial cognizance of the courts, and whether they were actually noticed, or not, in previous decisions, they must be deemed to have been considered and allowed their due weight. The question is one of law, rather than of fact, and its decision in one case is a precedent in others.

9. Another series of the instructions given and refused deals with the measure of compensation applicable generally in condemnation suits. Of the instructions above quoted, those numbered 2, 11, 22, and 23 relate to this matter. Exceptions were taken to these instructions, and also to each of the following:

"(25) In determining the actual value at the date of the summons, you are not to take, as the measure of that value, what an owner could realize at a forced sale, but the price he could obtain after reasonable and ample time, such as would ordinarily be taken by an owner to make sale of like property; and in making that estimate you should consider the use for which the property is suitable, having regard to the existing business or wants of the community, or such as might have been reasonably expected in the immediate future. You will also consider the fitness of this land for agriculture, and its value for that purpose, and for fruit or stockraising, for the timber growing on it, as well as the water which may be in the soil, not a part of the river; and from these and all other uses to which the property may be put, from which profit may be derived, and from all the evidence on the subject, you will determine its actual market value at that date.

"(26) The market value of the land is not necessarily the value of the land in its present or prospective use to the owner, nor is it the value which it would be to the city as a location for head works, nor the sum which the city must be compelled to give for it by reason of the necessity it may be under to obtain it, nor is it the sum that could be derived from the land for any special purpose for which it may be suitable. All these things, if shown by the evidence, may be considered as bearing on the question, but only so far as it may appear that they affect the actual market value at the date of the summons, and the thing you are to determine is such actual market value at the date stated.

"(27) Although you may believe from the evidence that by reason of things done, discovered, or ascertained since June 27, 1893, it now appears that the land was then more valuable for any purpose or use than it was then known to be, yet you cannot consider such additional value unless you believe also that these things were sufficiently known or obvious in June, 1893, to affect the market value at that time, and did so affect it.

"(28) If the jury find that any of the underground waters of the lands sought to be condemned are not a part of the waters of the Los Angeles river, they can consider that fact in fixing compensation only so far as it tended, if at all, to affect the actual market value of the land at the date of issuing the summons; disregarding any acts done upon the lands, or information acquired concerning said waters, since said date.

"(29) You are entitled to consider the evidence regarding the quantity of subterranean waters in the lands in question, and their value, only in arriving at a just determination of the market value of the lands sought to be condemned on the 27th day of June, 1893. Wherefore, if you believe that said waters did not give said lands an additional market value at that date, or that if an additional market value were given, but the same did not equal the real value of said waters, then you must place on said lands a valuation equal only to the market value which they then had, including such additional market value which said waters gave to said lands, irrespective of the true value of said waters. If, for instance, said lands could not have been sold in the market on said date (the owners having had abundant time to find a purchaser, such as would generally be taken by an owner trying to sell like property) for more than a certain sum, then you must not find the value of said lands to be greater than said sum, although in fact you may believe that the waters in said lands made them worth more than that sum."

One of the objections to these instructions which the appellants urge in the argument here is directed against the charge, repeated in several places, that the value of the property at the date of the summons must control. The hardships of this rule, when applied to a case in which so long a time elapses between the issuance of summons and the trial of the cause as happened in this instance, are strongly stated by counsel; and their argument against the constitutionality of this feature of the statute would not be undeserving of consideration, if they were in a position to urge it. But the fact is, this portion of the charge was given in form and in substance as they requested it in the instructions proposed by themselves, and they cannot, therefore, claim that the court erred in allowing it.

Another objection is that the court confuses "actual value," which is the true measure of compensation (Const. art. 1, § 14, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1249), with "market value" and "actual market value" in such a way that the different instructions are either self-contradictory or unmeaning. We do not think the instructions are self-contradictory, and their meaning we take to be this: "Actual value" is the measure of compensation, but "market value" is the criterion of actual value, and the definition of market value is given in the instructions numbered 25, 26, etc. If, then, these instructions lay down a correct rule for ascertaining actual value, the charge as a whole is not erroneous. In most respects the charge is sustained by previous decisions of this court. Town Co. v. Neale, 78 Cal. 63, 20 Pac. 372; Waterworks v. Drinkhouse, 92 Cal. 528, 28 Pac. 681. But there is one objection strongly urged in this case which was not involved, and could not have been considered, in any case formerly decided here. In several of these instructions the jury are told, in effect, that in estimating the value of these lands they must not take into consideration any fact discovered since the summons was issued. In other words, to use the illustration put by appellants, if a gold mine worth millions of dollars had been discovered in this land the day after the issuance of summons, the city could take the land by paying its value for agricultural purposes. This conclusion, it is true, follows logically from the proposition that market value at the date of the summons is to control, and that is the idea upon which the instructions are based. But I think this is a mistaken idea. The thing to be ascertained is not market value, but actual value (Code Civ. Proc. § 1249); and the only reason why market value is taken as the criterion of compensation in ordinary cases is because it is in such cases the true measure of actual value,—the only practical test. But, in a case where discoveries made after the issuance of summons demonstrate that the actual intrinsic value of the land at that date was greater than its market value,—in other words, when it appears that market value is no criterion of actual value,—those discoveries should be taken into consideration. As such discoveries were claimed in this case, I think the court erred in giving and refusing the instructions referred to.

10. The giving of instruction 9 is complained of upon the ground that there was no evidence upon which to base it. Unless we have greatly misunderstood the defendants' position, the instruction meets one of their claims to percolating waters; but, if they do not claim the right to undermine the surface stream and draw off its waters, the instruction did them no harm. It stated the law correctly. And so, also, does instruction 23 lay down a correct rule, clearly applicable to the case. The point for the jury to determine was the value given to these lands by percolating waters not a part of the stream,—waters which the owners of the land had a right to convey to a distance for sale. In considering the value of such waters, it was certainly material to consider at the same time whether the defendants might not at any moment be wholly deprived of them by the exercise on the part of others of the same right in their lands claimed by defendants with respect to their own. Instruction No. 29 requested by defendants, and refused by the court, has so remote an application to the questions to be decided by the jury that its refusal cannot be deemed an error. Instruction No. 33 requested by defendants was properly refused, because it related in great part to the issues to be determined by the court. Instructions 34, 35, and 36 requested by the defendants were given in a modified form, and the modifications were proper.

11. A great many exceptions were taken to rulings of the court on objections to testimony and documentary evidence. Some of the questions raised by these exceptions have been practically decided in discussing other points. As to the rest, it is sufficient to say that, although some evidence was admitted that does not appear to have been clearly relevant, it could not have been prejudicial. The evidence actually admitted without objection took a wide range, and the most of the objections were to questions asked of expert witnesses on cross-examination. In respect to such questions the court is necessarily invested with a large discretion. In this case some objections were sustained that might have been overruled without error, and some were overruled that might have been sustained; but we cannot see that the court abused its discretion in any instance, or that it would have made an appreciable difference in the result if the ruling had been the reverse of what it was.

12. It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury or the findings of the court. Since the conclusions above stated involve a retrial of the issue submitted to the jury, I deem it unnecessary to notice the first branch of this proposition, and my remarks will be confined to the second. Does the evidence sustain the findings upon the issues tried by the court? I think that there is substantial evidence to sustain every finding that is material. The taking of the 315 acres may not have been shown to be absolutely and certainly essential for the supply of the present needs of the city; but in view of the rapid increase of its population and its probable increase in the future, in view of the possible necessity of enlarging the number and of changing the location of the filtration galleries in order to insure an ample supply of water at all times and for every emergency, the court was justified in finding that it was a wise and prudent measure to secure the entire tract. And there was evidence to sustain the finding that, unless the city had the exclusive control of the surface, there was at least a possible danger that the water supply might be polluted by stock herded or pastured there. This, however, is not very material, because it bears only upon the question of taking a fee-simple estate, and the right to take such estate rests securely upon the fact that the land is taken for a reservoir. The third finding, which relates to the paramount right of the city as successor to the pueblo, is sustained by the evidence, except in so far as it carries the meaning of those portions of the instructions above considered which are pronounced erroneous. The evidence does not show any formal adoption by the city, prior to the commencement of the action, of the detailed plan of these head works alleged in the complaint, but it does show a previous adoption of engineer's report, recommending, in general outline, and in all essentials, the plan here set forth in detail. It shows, also, by a series of resolutions and orders of the council, a fixed purpose on the part of the city to own and control its own system of water supply, and a resolution of the council directing the city attorney to commence this proceeding as soon as the ordinance of June 8, 1893, should be signed by the mayor. This probably accounts for the rather precipitate action of the city attorney in filing the complaint the same day that the ordinance was passed, and before its publication. This, however, would have been but an irregularity in the absence of the resolution. The object of publishing laws and ordinances before they take effect is to warn those who are to be bound by their provisions. In a case like this, where an ordinance has been duly passed and an order for its publication has been duly made, the act of an officer obeying its directions, in anticipation of its publication, is at least ratified and made good when the publication is complete. Moreover, in this particular class of cases the action is not commenced until the summons is issued. Code Civ. Proc. § 1243; Railway Co. v. Porter, 74 Cal. 261, 15 Pac. 774. It appears, also, that since the commencement of the action it has been followed by other orders and resolutions of the council providing means for carrying out the proposed plan, and complying with the terms of the judgment sought. In view of all these facts, the objection that the action was commenced without authority, in pursuance of a plan not formally adopted, seems too purely technical to be regarded. Other specifications under this head relate to findings of facts merely probative, included in the issue submitted to the jury, and need not be further considered.

13. At the beginning of the trial of this action the parties made an arrangement with the official reporter, out of court, in pursuance of which he furnished each of them a daily transcript of his notes at an agreed rate of compensation. The cost of defendants' copy was $767.45, and this sum they included in their bill of costs. On motion to retax, the item was stricken out by the court. This is assigned as error, and section 274 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1885, is cited in support of the assignment. But this amendment has been held unconstitutional (Smith v. Strother, 68 Cal. 194, 8 Pac. 852), and the case is governed by section 274, as amended in 1880, and construed in Barkly

v. Copeland, 86 Cal. 493, 25 Pac. 3. The court did not err in this ruling.

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, I think the judgment and order of the superior court should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial as to the single issue of compensation and damages,—the issue, that is to say, which was submitted to the jury on the former trial.

TEMPLE, J. I concur in the views expressed by the Chief Justice, except as to that part of the opinion in which certain rulings made by the trial court are declared erroneous.

1. The first has regard to the time when the property is to be valued. The statute declares that the right to the property shall be deemed to accrue at the date of the summons, "and its actual value at that date shall be the measure of compensation." The Chief Justice concedes that ordinarily market value is the true measure and the only practical test of the actual value; still, "in a case where discoveries made after the issuance of summons demonstrate that the actual intrinsic value of the land at that date was greater than its market value,—in other words, when it appears that market value is no criterion of actual value,—those discoveries should be taken into consideration." Such discoveries are claimed in this case. Code Civ. Proc. § 1249. It is said, if a gold mine worth millions of dollars had been discovered in this land the day after summons was issued, the city could take the land by paying its value for agricultural purposes. The supposition is an impossible one. A gold mine of the known actual value of millions could not be so discovered. The phrase "actual value" is here used in opposition to the phrase "market value." It is difficult to give any meaning to it when so used, but in regard to a gold mine it must have reference to the amount which could be taken out of it over and above the cost of extraction. This could not be known until the mine was worked out, and therefore whenever it was valued necessarily the value could not be the actual intrinsic value, as defined, but would necessarily be its market value. So the proposed value only changes the statutory date at which the right of the city is deemed to accrue, and when the value is to be estimated. It is contended that the right must be deemed to have accrued and the valuation be made after other elements of value have been discovered. The phrase "actual value" is sometimes used in contradistinction to "market value," to indicate that property is valued too high to make it a good investment. If the market value of the land was $100 per acre, it would not be permissible to show that the real or actual value was less, and that the market value was inflated. The owner could get the market value, and less would not make him whole. The government can take private property for its uses at any time, conditioned only that the public shall compensate the owner,—that it shall pay what it is worth when taken. This value must be the market or exchange value, for there can be no other. Value, which determines the price at which the owner must sell, must be the exchange or market value, and "actual value" means "actual market value."

2. It is said the paramount right of the city to the water of the river does not extend to water required for residents in that part of the city which is not within the boundaries of the pueblo, and that the court erred in charging the jury, in substance, that all riparian rights were subordinate to the right of the inhabitants of the present and future city to the use of water for all domestic and municipal purposes. It is argued that the city has succeeded to the rights of the old pueblo, and its rights cannot exceed the rights of the pueblo itself. If so, I do not see how the city can take water, even for that portion of the city which is within the ancient boundaries, for uses which were not only unknown to the inhabitants of the pueblo, but which, owing to the plan of the settlement, could not have been thought of as possible uses. Relatively only a small portion of the territory was devoted to building lots. Provision was made for agricultural and pastoral pursuits, and large portions of the territory were laid out in montes (wood lots) dehesas (commons for cattle), ejidos (places for threshing grain, and recreation), and many other tracts were kept for the community. But this was a plan for a primitive village, to aid and encourage the settlement of the country. The sites for pueblos were carefully chosen in pursuance of the royal regulations of Spain, whose policy was that the government should determine where towns and cities should be built. Unquestionably it was contemplated and hoped that at least some of them would so prosper as to outgrow the simple form of the rural village. It is in the nature of things that this might happen, and when it did, and the communal lands were required for house lots, we must presume that under Mexican or Spanish rule they could be so converted, and that, when the population increased so as to overflow the limits of the pueblo, such extension could be legally accomplished. Had this happened under Mexican rule, can it be doubted that the right vested in the pueblo would have been construed to be for the benefit of the population, however great the increase would be? I cannot see why the interpretation of the original grant should be more narrow than of a title acquired by condemnation. If the city should now in this proceeding purchase the riparian rights for the use of the city, must it do so again whenever its present limits may be enlarged?

Suppose in 1850 the little city then existing had condemned for its use all riparian rights, and had no other right to the water. The extent of a taking by condemnation is always limited to the necessity which justifies it.

That which is not used still belongs to the owner. The title to water would not be acquired, but only the use; and as against the riparian owners, in such a case, the city could not have taken water not needed by the city and its inhabitants. In 1850 the city contained only a small population, and its corporate limits were less even than the pueblo limit. In the supposed case, could the land-owners now contend that the larger city could not, under the right acquired in the condemnation proceedings, supply the inhabitants of the additional territory? As to such a claim I think there would be but one opinion, and that would be that in the condemnation proceedings all possibilities as to the future growth and requirements of the city were taken into consideration.

3. I have never been able to see anything in the objections to the outfall sewer. It seems to me, if the city cannot maintain this, it cannot be a city at all, and retain the water rights of the pueblo.

4. The last matter of difference relates to water used in the ponds and artificial lakes. The real objection to this seems to be that it looks like extravagance or waste. We feel that, where water is so precious, it should not be used for mere matters of taste and fancy, while those who need it for useful purposes go without. In the forum of morals this may be so, but the needs of a city are understood to include such uses, as well as for the supply of absolute necessities. It would be intolerable to invest in outside authority a right to superintend and limit such uses. While, therefore, I am not prepared to say that the discretion of the municipal authorities could not under any circumstances be interfered with, I do not see how we can do so here. It is clearly a municipal use which is familiar in municipal history. The judgment and order are affirmed.

In re SCOTT'S ESTATE et al.
(S. F. 1,821.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 6, 1899.)

WILLS — PROBATE — APPEAL — NOTICE OF APPEAL — SERVICE ON LEGATEES — DISMISSAL — TIME OF APPEAL — STIPULATION.

1. Contestants to the probate of a will gave notice of a motion for a new trial, and prepared a statement to be used therewith, which was presented to the court for settlement, and, when notice of a motion to dismiss the appeal for failure to file the transcript within 40 days after perfecting the appeal was given, proceedings were still pending for a settlement of the statement. Held, that under court rule 2 appellant was entitled to 40 days after the settlement of the statement within which to file his transcript.

2. On motion to dismiss the appeal the court's settling such statement must be assumed to be within its jurisdiction, as, if error was committed in considering it, such error would be considered at the hearing of the appeal, and not on motion to dismiss.

3. Where on appeal it is shown that a motion for new trial was entertained by the court, and denied, it will be presumed that a statement which accompanied it was settled by the court, and became a record, and was used on the hearing.

4. Where a notice of appeal from an order admitting a will to probate is not served on all the legatees, the appellate court is without jurisdiction to hear the appeal as to any of the parties.

5. Where, before a hearing on a contest to the probate of a will, the court appoints an attorney to represent all persons otherwise unrepresented, and the order appealed from recites that such attorney appeared, and represented such persons, and the notice of appeal is served on him, the appeal will not be dismissed because of an objection that all adverse parties were not personally served with notice of the appeal.

6. Where an appeal purports to be from an order admitting a will to probate, entered on a certain date, and it is shown at the hearing that that was the date on which the order was entered at length on the records, the 60 days within which to appeal from such order will run from that date.

7. A stipulation by parties to a will contest, reciting that, to settle the date of the order admitting the will to probate, it is agreed that it was entered on the day on which it was filed, will not change the time from which the right of appeal begins to run, since a party's right of appeal dates from the actual entry of the order, and cannot be determined by the stipulation of the parties.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Contest by E. W. Scott to the probate of the will of Angelia R. Scott, deceased. From an order admitting its probate, contestant appeals. On motion to dismiss the appeal. Denied.

Philip G. Galpin and A. E. Bolton, for executors. A. Everett Ball, for contestant E. W. Scott.

HARRISON, J. Motion to dismiss the appeal. The appellant filed a contest in the superior court to the probate of the will of Angelia R. Scott, and the issues made upon his contest were tried, and decided in favor of the proponents of the will. The findings of the court, and its direction that the will be admitted to probate, were filed September 12, 1898, and on October 12, 1898, an order in pursuance thereof was entered. A notice of appeal from this order was given by the appellant herein November 2, 1898, and on December 2, 1898, he filed and served a second notice of appeal from the order. February 23, 1899, the proponents of the will gave notice to the appellant of a motion to dismiss his appeal for failure to file the transcript within 40 days after perfecting the appeal, and upon the further ground that the notices of appeal were defective, and had not been served upon all the adverse parties.

1. The contestant gave notice of a motion for a new trial September 21, 1898, and thereafter prepared a statement to be used upon this motion, which, with the amendments, were presented to the judge of the superior court for settlement, and at the time the notice of the motion herein was given proceedings were pending before the judge of the superior court for the settlement of this statement. Under rule 2 of this court the appellant was entitled to 40 days after the settlement of this statement within which to file the transcript. The respondents have presented certain affidavits purporting to show irregularities in the proceedings for the settlement of the statement, by which they claim that the judge had no jurisdiction or authority to settle the same, and which they presented to him as objections to its settlement by him; and therefore contend that, as this statement cannot be considered upon the appeal from the order, it forms no excuse for the delay in filing the transcript. It was shown, however, at the hearing herein, that subsequent to the giving of notice of this motion the judge of the superior court had in fact settled the statement, and we must hold that the appellant had 40 days after such settlement within which to file the transcript. Upon a motion to dismiss the appeal we must assume that the act of the judge in settling the statement was within his jurisdiction, and that he was authorized to settle it. If the respondents would claim that he committed error in so doing, such error must be considered at the hearing of the appeal, and cannot be reviewed upon a motion to dismiss the appeal. It is further urged that, as the notice of intention to move for a new trial was not served upon all the parties to the proceeding, it was ineffective, and for that reason the statement could not be used upon the hearing of that motion, and, consequently, is not available upon the appeal from the order admitting the will to probate. It has been frequently held that an appeal from an order denying a new trial will not be dismissed upon the ground of any defect in the proceedings in the superior court leading up to the order (Barnhart v. Fulkert, 92 Cal. 155, 28 Pac. 221; Gumpel v. Castagnetto, 97 Cal. 15, 31 Pac. 898; In re Ryer's Estate, 110 Cal. 556, 42 Pac. 1082; In re Bullard's Estate, 114 Cal. 462, 46 Pac. 297), as this would involve an examination of the action of the court below, which can properly be had only upon the hearing of the appeal. If an appeal has been properly taken from an order subject to be reviewed in this court, it cannot be dismissed upon the ground that the court below improperly made the order. Neither can we, under the same principles, consider the character of the notice of intention to move for a new trial. It was shown at the hearing herein that the motion for a new trial had been entertained by the court, and denied, and it will be presumed that the statement that had been settled by the judge, and which thereby became one of the records of the court, was used upon the hearing of this motion.

2. The notice of appeal which was given November 2, 1898, was directed to the proponents of the will and their attorneys, but did not purport to be a notice to any of the legatees or devisees under the will. As the effect of a reversal of the order admitting the will to probate would be to deprive the legatees of whatever interest in the estate of the decedent is given to them by the will, it is evident that they are interested in maintaining the order appealed from, and are, therefore, adverse parties to the appellant upon this appeal. The respondents concede that the notice was served upon those legatees who had appeared at the hearing upon the contest, with the exception of the Protestant Orphan Asylum, for whom an appearance had been made by George W. Haight as its attorney; but it is not shown that there was any service made upon this legatee or its attorney. As no service of the notice of appeal was made upon this legatee, it cannot be bound by any order or judgment made upon the appeal, and this court is therefore without jurisdiction to hear the appeal, even as between the other parties.

3. The notice of motion to dismiss the appeal of December 2d states as one of the grounds thereof that it was not served on all the adverse parties to said appeal, but in the printed points filed in support of the motion it is stated by the respondents that this notice of appeal was "addressed and served on all parties who had appeared." A large number of the legatees appeared by attorneys of their own selection, and before the hearing of the contest the court appointed E. D. Sawyer as attorney "to represent any and all absent heirs and creditors otherwise interested in or otherwise unrepresented" in the matter, and it is recited in the order appealed from that the attorney thus appointed for the persons otherwise unrepresented appeared at the hearing upon the contest. As the notice of this appeal was served upon this attorney as well as the others, it appears that all the adverse parties were before the court. We are not inclined to dismiss an appeal upon grounds or for defects in procedure that are purely technical, when it is apparent that the appellant has complied with the substantial requirements for perfecting his appeal, and is prosecuting the same with diligence and in good faith. The right of an appeal to this court from the superior court is given by the constitution in all such probate matters as may be provided by law; and statutes making such provision, and regulating the procedure therefor, should be liberally construed.

The other ground stated in the notice of motion for the dismissal of this appeal is that it was not taken within 60 days after the entry of the order appealed from. The notice of appeal purports in terms to be from an order made and entered in the superior court on the 11th day of October, 1898, and, as it was shown at the hearing herein that that was the date upon which the order admitting the will to probate was entered at length in the records of the court, the 60 days within which to appeal from the order began to run at that date. Home of Inebriates v. Kaplan, 84 Cal. 486, 24 Pac. 119; In re Pearsons' Estate, 119 Cal. 27, 50 Pac. 929. Annexed to the affidavit of the moving party herein is a copy of a stipulation filed in the court below November 21, 1898, between the attorneys for some of the parties to the proceeding therein, including the contestant and the proponents of the will, as follows: "Some confusion having arisen in the above-entitled cause as to the date of the actual entry of the order admitting the will to probate and appointing the executors, which said orders were signed and filed in this court on the 12th day of September, 1898, for the purpose of settling said date so that the same shall be fixed and certain, it is hereby stipulated for all purposes that the said orders were actually entered, as provided by law, on the same date the same were filed, to wit, on the 12th day of September, 1898;" and the respondents urge that by reason of this stipulation the appellant is precluded from contending that the appeal was within 60 days after the entry of the order. The time within which the appellate jurisdiction of this court may be invoked is determined by statute, and not by a stipulation of the parties. The Code provides that an appeal may be taken from an order admitting a will to probate "within sixty days after its entry," and it has been held that their rights in respect to an appeal are determined by the date of its "actual entry." Coon v. Grand Lodge, 76 Cal. 354, 18 Pac. 384. The action of the superior court does not become definite and certain until it is entered at length in its records. Prior to that time it is in the breast of the judge, and, until it shall be so entered, his decision may be changed from time to time, according to his views. It is only when his decision has become the judgment of the court, and thus passed beyond his recall, that the appellate jurisdiction of this court may be invoked. Brady v. Burke, 90 Cal. 1, 27 Pac. 52. If parties could, by their stipulation, bring before this court for review a decision of the superior court before it had been entered in that court, it would be within their power to invoke our action upon most questions, and we might be called upon to affirm or reverse orders that had never been made, or judgments that had never been entered. It does not appear for what purpose the above stipulation was entered into, the only recital therein being the "confusion" that had arisen as to the date of the actual entry of the order. There does not, however, appear to have been occasion for any confusion, as the date of filing and the date of entry are distinct and separate acts, and performed at different times. In fact, the date of its entry would seem to be as important a part of the record as the entry itself, and as readily ascertained. Code Civ. Proc. § 672. See, also, Menzies v. Watson, 105 Cal. 109, 38 Pac. 641. But, whatever may have been the cause of the confusion, we hold that the stipulation did not have the effect to deprive the contestant of the right to review the action of the superior court, or to change the time from which his right of appeal should begin to run. There is nothing in the stipulation which, by its terms, purports to express such a purpose, and, in the absence of express terms to that effect, we cannot assume that the parties thereto intended something which they were unauthorized to do. We do not mean to hold that parties may not be bound by an express stipulation when it would be inequitable to disregard it, or when, by reason thereof, others have been induced to take action which would cause them detriment in case the stipulation were disregarded. There is, however, no room to invoke this proposition in the present case. There is no element of estoppel which the respondents can invoke against the appellant. They parted with no right by reason of the stipulation, nor did they obtain any right therefor which they are now asked to surrender. The motion to dismiss the appeal which was taken November 2, 1898, is granted. The motion to dismiss the appeal of December 2, 1898, is denied.

SAUNDERS v. LA PURISIMA GOLD-MIN.
CO. et al. (Sac. 642.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 20, 1899.)
SCHOOL LANDS—CHARACTER OF LANDS—DETERMINATION—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Under Act Cong. March 3, 1853, granting certain agricultural lands to the state for school purposes, and providing that mineral lands shall not be subdivided into sections, public lands belonging to the state under said act, if agricultural, which the proper United States officials have platted into a section and classified as agricultural lands, and concerning which the receiver of the public land office has certified that the state's title thereto under said act is free from adverse claims, are not, after their disposal by the state, subject to re-entry as mineral lands; the determination of the United States officials that the lands were agricultural being conclusive against a collateral attack.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county.

Action by Harriet H. Saunders, as administratrix, against the La Purisima Gold-Mining Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order granting a new trial she appeals. Reversed.

J. B. Curtin, for appellant. J. P. O'Brien, for respondents.

VAN DYKE, J. This action is to determine conflicting claims to a tract of land, being a portion of section 36, township 2 N., range 13 E., Mt. Diablo meridian, containing 600 acres, located in Tuolumne county. On September 1, 1870, the official United States survey of said township was completed, and the lands therein sectionized. On the 18th day of February, 1871, the official plat of said township was approved by the United States surveyor general for California, and filed in his office. In this official plat of said township, section 36 was marked and returned as being agricultural land and unoccupied. On the 7th day of December, 1871, the commissioner of the general land office directed the register of the United States land office at Stockton, in which district said land was located, to withhold from sale or disposal, among other lands, said township 2; and on April 27, 1880, the secretary of the interior, by an order, revoked said withdrawal; and thereafter on September 6, 1884, the register of said United States land office issued to the state of California his certificate in due form, reciting that there were no persons occupying or in possession of any portion of said section 36, and there were no homestead pre-emptions or other valid claims thereto, or to any part thereof, adverse to the state of California. On the 1st day of September, 1890, the state of California issued to Robert B. Parks its patent in due form for the premises in controversy. Thereafter, on December 11, 1895, by proper mesne conveyance, the title to said lands was granted to, and became vested in, the plaintiff's intestate, Henry H. Saunders; that said Saunders thereupon entered into possession, and with his family occupied said tract of land up to the time of his death, June 20, 1897, and the plaintiff thereafter continued in such possession. In August, 1896, defendants Elder and Maguire entered upon a portion of said described lands, and commenced to run a tunnel and work a quartz claim, and thereupon filed a notice of mining location, designating the same as "the north extension of the La Purisima claim." This action was commenced in August, 1897. Defendants Elder and Maguire rely upon said mining location, and contend that said land is mineral land, and never passed to the state of California, and that the patent issued therefor is void. All the other defendants were defaulted. On the trial defendants offered "to prove that the land in controversy—namely, the north extension of the La Purisima Quartz Mining Claim—was expressly excepted from the grant to the state of California by the act of congress approved March 3, 1853, as the same is mineral land." Plaintiff's objection to this offer was sustained by the court, and judgment went for the plaintiff. Thereafter, upon motion of the defendants, the court granted a new trial on the ground, as stated in the order, "for the sole reason that the court erred in sustaining the objection to said defendants Maguire's and Elder's offered evidence as to the mineral character of the land in controversy." This appeal is from the order granting a new trial, and the question presented here is whether the court did or did not err at the trial in excluding the offered evidence.

The respondents rely upon Hermocilla v. Hubbell, 89 Cal. 5, 26 Pac. 611, in support of the order of the court granting them a new trial. Although the facts in that case are different from those in this, still it must be confessed that said case furnishes support to the contention of respondents. The opinion seems to rely upon Mining Co. v. Consolidated Min. Co., 102 U. S. 167, and it is said with reference thereto: "That decision is controlling, and must be followed here. The question then remains, were the disputed premises at the time of the grant mineral land,—that is, known to be valuable for minerals?" The facts, as found in Hermocilla v. Hubbell, were that, during the year 1850, and continuously ever since, and when the said patent was issued, on the 10th day of December, 1870, and at the time of the survey of said lands (being a portion of the sixteenth section), "they were, and have been, and now are, known to be public mineral lands of the United States, having therein known valuable mineral deposits"; whereas, in the United States case, referred to by the commissioner as controlling, and to be followed by this court, the facts were that there were three mining claims on the land in controversy,—one located in 1851, another one in 1853, and the other in 1863,—the last being seven years before the public survey of the tract, which was in 1870. The mining patent was applied for on these locations nearly two years before the state patent was issued, and subsequently, and within a year thereafter, the United States patent was issued on said mining locations. Hence the contest in that case was between two conflicting patents; whereas, in Hermocilla v. Hubbell, the contest was in the nature of a collateral attack upon a state patent, on the ground that the land was mineral land. It is said in the latter case: "The question then remains, were the disputed premises at the time of the grant mineral lands,—that is, known to be valuable for mineral lands?" But another and equally important question seems to have been overlooked by the court in that case, and that is, by whom and at what time are the facts to be ascertained and determined as to the character of the land at the time of the grant, whether mineral or nonmineral? And another question of equal importance is as to the effect of a patent, issued by competent authority, purporting to convey such land.

The decisions of the supreme court of the United States upon both of these questions are so numerous and so uniform (and the decisions of this court are in the same line, with few exceptions) that both questions now ought to be considered well settled. The first is that by the laws of congress providing for the patenting of certain public lands, upon the ascertainment of certain facts, the proper officers of the land department of the general government have jurisdiction to inquire into and determine those facts; that is, if a large body of public lands be subject to sale or other disposition, but subject to reservation of such parts as may be found to be of a particular character, as swamp or mineral land, the land department has jurisdiction to determine the character of any part thereof, and its decision is conclusive. In Steel v. Refining Co., 106 U. S. 447, 1 Sup. Ct. 389, Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, says: "We have so often had occasion to speak of the land department, the object of its creation, and the powers it possesses in the alienation by patent of portions of the public lands, that it creates an unpleasant surprise to find that counsel, in discussing the effect to be given to the action of that department, overlooked our decisions on that subject. That department, as we have repeatedly said, was established to supervise various proceedings whereby evidence of a title from the United States to portions of the public domain is obtained, and to see that the different requirements of acts of congress are fully complied with. Necessarily, therefore, it must consider and pass upon the qualifications of the applicant, the acts he has performed to secure the title, the nature of the land, and whether it is of a class which is open to sale. Its judgment upon these matters is that of a special tribunal, and is unassailable except by direct proceeding for its annulment or limitation. Such has been the uniform language of this court in repeated decisions." In this case it was shown that the land in question was surveyed and sectionized; whereas, the act of congress directed that, in case of mineral lands, it should not be sectionized, and that the plat of survey showing the land to be agricultural land—in other words, not mineral—was returned and properly approved. As a further measure of precaution, and to allow abundant opportunity for a full investigation and ascertainment of the character of the land, the disposal of the same was suspended for a number of years, and finally, it having been determined that it was of the character of land subject to be granted to the state, a certificate was issued by the proper United States authorities to the state of California, certifying its right to the section of land in question under the grant of 1853. The state's patent thereupon issued to the plaintiff's grantor long prior to the intrusion of the defendants for the purpose of mining. Under the rule just cited, this concluded the investigation as to the character of the land, except on a direct proceeding to set aside the patent on the ground of fraud or other invalidity.

The case of Gale v. Best, 78 Cal. 235, 20 Pac. 550, seems to have been overlooked—at any rate, it is not noticed—in the preparation of the opinion in Hermocilla v. Hubbell, supra. In that case the plaintiff claimed under a patent to a tract of land under a railroad grant. The defendants claimed by right of possession, upon the ground that it was mineral land, and that all mineral lands are reserved in the grant of congress to said railroad company. In affirming the judgment of the court below, this court, after reviewing quite fully the cases bearing upon the question, says: "Our opinion is that where a patent issues for public land under a law which provides for its disposition as agricultural land,—either to a railroad company or to pre-emption or homestead claims,—and there is no reservation in the law except a general one of mineral lands, and no reservation at all in the patent, then the patent must be considered as a conclusive determination by the government that the land is agricultural." This case was referred to and approved in Dreyfus v. Badger, 108 Cal. 58, 41 Pac. 279, which, it will be seen, was some time after the Hermocilla Case, relied upon by the respondent here. Dreyfus, the plaintiff, relied upon a state patent issued on state lieu school lands, and the defendant, as a pre-emptor, antedating his right as such prior to the patent by the state. In affirming the judgment of the lower court, this court says: "A defendant may defeat an action of ejectment by showing that plaintiff has no title. But where a patent, regular on its face, has been issued by the government (federal or state) for land which it owns, under a law providing for the disposal of the land patented, upon the ascertainment of certain facts, the officers of the land department of the government have jurisdiction to determine such facts, and the issuance of a patent is, upon collateral attack, a conclusive declaration, as against all claiming under said government, that the facts have been found in favor of the patentee. 'And this rule applies to the determination of the particular character of the land which is the subject of the patent.' This was expressly held in Gale v. Best, 78 Cal. 235, 20 Pac. 550, where we alluded to the authorities at some length, and, basing our conclusion on decisions of the supreme court of the United States (citing a number), we declared the law to be as above stated. These cases involved patents of the general government; but, upon principle, the rule applies with equal force to a patent of the state government. Moreover, it has been so expressly held in this court in Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 295, where it was decided that 'the patent is the record of the state that the land was subject to location under the grant of the United States, and has been located'; and Ah Yew v. Choate, 24 Cal. 562, where it was held that the patent is also 'a record of the judgment of the state, by its officers duly appointed for that purpose, and that the conditions and characteristics of the land were not such as to constitute it mineral, within the meaning of the provisions of the statute.' Irvine v. Tarbat, 105 Cal. 237, 38 Pac. 896, is to the same effect, and is referred to and approved in Dreyfus v. Badger.

To quote from the numerous adjudicated cases in the United States supreme court would be a waste of time, and lengthen this opinion beyond reasonable limits, and it will be sufficient merely to refer to some of them. Steel v. Refining Co., supra; Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 644; French v. Fyan, 93 U. S. 69; Barden v. Railroad Co., 154 U. S. 288, 14 Sup. Ct. 1030; Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 488, 7 Sup. Ct. 985; Heath v. Wallace, 138 U. S. 573, 11 Sup. Ct. 380; McCormick v. Hayes, 159 U. S. 332, 16 Sup. Ct. 37. See, also, Cowell v. Lammers, 10 Sawy. 250, 21 Fed. 200.

The cases relied upon by the respondents, when examined, it will be seen, do not conflict with the general tenor of the decisions already cited. In those cases the lands in question were shown not to have been subject to sale or disposition at the time the right alleged accrued on which the patent was issued, and the patents, therefore, were issued without authority of law. For instance, Burfenning v. Railway Co., 163 U. S. 321, 16 Sup. Ct. 1018, involved title to certain islands in the Mississippi at Minneapolis. At the date of the homestead selection in that case on which the patent was issued, these islands were within the limits of said city; and the invalidity of the patent was based upon the fact that "lands included within the limits of any incorporated town, or selected as the site of a city or town," were by the laws of congress excluded from the right of pre-emption and homestead claims. The court of course sustained that contention on the ground that the action of "the land department cannot override the express will of congress, or convey away public lands in disregard or defiance thereof." At the same time the court announced this as a rule: "It has undoubtedly been affirmed over and over again that in the administration of the public-lands system of the United States questions of fact are under the consideration and judgment of the land department, and that its judgment thereon is final. Whether, for instance, a certain tract is swamp land or not, saline land or not, mineral land or not, presents a question of fact not resting on record, dependent on oral testimony; and it cannot be doubted that the decision of the land department one way or the other, in reference to these questions, is conclusive, and not open to litigation in the courts, except in those cases of fraud, etc., which permit any determination to be re-examined,"—citing Johnson v. Towsley, 13 Wall. 72; Smelting Co. v. Kemp and Steel v. Refining Co., supra; Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 488, 7 Sup. Ct. 985; Heath v. Wallace, 138 U. S. 573, 11 Sup. Ct. 380; McCormick v. Hayes, 159 U. S. 332, 16 Sup. Ct. 37.

As already stated and held in numerous cases, the grant by congress to this state of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, by the act of congress of 1853, was a grant in present, and, if at that time there were existing no known minerals or other exceptions noted in the grant why the lands should not pass to the state, it at that moment became the land of the state. The investigations of the officers of the land department in this case show that the land in question did not fall within any of the exceptions or limitations contained in the act; and subsequently, and long prior to any claim on the part of the defendants, the land was properly certified to, and patented by, the state to the plaintiff's grantor. Any rule which would permit intrusion upon the premises so conveyed and patented by the state, under such circumstances, long after the lands had passed into the hands of presumably innocent third parties for value, would be a reproach to our laws and jurisprudence.

If such claims as that presented by the defendants here were sanctioned by the court, a patent to lands in this state, instead of being a muniment of title, would simply be an invitation to parties to invade the premises for the purpose of ascertaining whether facts and conditions existed prior to the grant or patent so as to avoid the same; and it would be the same whatever the nature of the land might be. In case of a patent to mining lands, an investigation could be had years after the date of the patent, and after the title to the ground had passed to innocent third parties, to determine whether it was not agricultural land, and more valuable for that purpose than for mining; or, in case of a pre-emption or homestead claim, patented by the United States, an investigation could be set on foot at any period, and as against any party, whether innocent or otherwise, who might be the holder of the title, to ascertain whether the land was, at the initiation of the claim on which the patent is based, of the character subject to pre-emption or homestead,—for instance, that it was mineral land, or swamp or overflowed land, or any other class falling within the exceptions specified in the laws of congress. Such a condition as this would be simply intolerable, and there would be no confidence or certainty in land titles in this state. The court below properly sustained the objection to the offered testimony, and its judgment was correct, and should have been allowed to stand. The order granting a new trial is reversed.

PEOPLE ex rel. PIXLEY v. LODI HIGH-SCHOOL DIST. OF SAN JOAQUIN COUNTY. (Sac. 522.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 6, 1899.)
SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS—ORGANIZATION OF HIGH-SCHOOL DISTRICT—ELECTIONS—PETITION—TAXATION—STATUTES.

1. Pol. Code, § 1670, subds. 14, 15, as amended in 1895, providing that the high-school board shall furnish to the board of supervisors an estimate of the cost of building a high school, and each year thereafter the amount of money required to conduct the school for the year, and that the board of supervisors shall levy a special tax upon all the taxable property of the district "sufficient in amount to maintain the high school," is not unconstitutional, as conferring legislative power on the high-school board.

2. Such statute is not void, under Pol. Code, §§ 1830-1839, providing that a special tax cannot be levied in any of the common-school districts without an election.

3. Pol. Code, § 1670, subds. 14, 15, providing that the high-school board shall furnish to the board of supervisors an estimate of the amount required to run the high school for the year, and that the supervisors shall levy a special tax sufficient to maintain the high school, such tax to be "computed * * * and collected in the same manner as other taxes," is not void as fixing no maximum rate and providing no rule of computation.

4. Pol. Code, § 1670, providing for the organization of high-school districts in school districts with a population of more than 1,000, and providing, in subdivisions 14 and 15, for the levy of a special tax in each district by the board of supervisors, upon the estimate of the high-school board, to maintain the high school, is not void as special legislation, in that it takes from the operation of the general law for the levy of taxes a certain class of school districts, and gives special powers to the high-school board and board of supervisors.

5. A petition for an election for the creation of a high-school district, under Pol. Code, § 1670, providing that "wherever * * * a majority of the heads of families * * * shall unite in a petition to the * * * board of school trustees," etc., which is directed to the "trustees of S. school district," instead of to the "board of trustees," is sufficient.

6. Such petition is sufficient, although it does not state in the body that the signers constitute a majority of the heads of families of the district, where appended to it and made a part of it is a certificate to that effect signed by the school-census marshal.

7. A petition by the school trustees to the county superintendent of public schools to call an election to organize a high-school district is sufficient, although it is unverified, and is not authenticated by the clerk.

8. A petition by the school trustees to the county superintendent of public schools to call an election to organize a high-school district is sufficient, although the petitioners are designated as "trustees," instead of "board of trustees."

9. Where the evidence is not contained in the record, it will be presumed that it was sufficient to sustain the findings.

10. Where one of the judges appointed by the superintendent of schools to conduct an election to determine whether a high school should be established in a school district fails to attend, and the other judges choose a substitute, instead of his being appointed by the electors present, the irregularity will not vitiate the election, where the result was not changed thereby.

11. It is a sufficient compliance with Pol. Code, § 1597, providing that "the polls must not be opened before nine o'clock a. m. nor kept open less than four hours," if the polls are open from 2 o'clock p. m. until sunset on May 23d.

12. Where an election notice was posted more than 15 days before the election, it need not be proved that it remained posted each day after it was posted.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Action, on the relation of Reuben Pixley, to exclude the Lodi high-school district of San Joaquin county from exercising any power as a high-school district. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald and Minor & Ashley, for appellant. W. C. Green and Nicol & Orr, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to exclude defendant from exercising any power as a high-school district. Defendant had judgment, from which, and from an order denying motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

Appellant contends: (1) That section 1670 of the Political Code, as amended in 1895, which provides for the organization of high schools in cities, incorporated towns, and school districts having a population of 1,000 inhabitants or more, violates section 1, art. 14, of the amendments of the national constitution, in that it deprives the taxpayer of his property without due process of law; that it also violates section 12, art. 11, of the constitution of this state, because it confers legislative powers upon the high-school district, and also violates section 25, art. 4, of that constitution, because it is a special law. And (2) it is contended that the proceedings taken in organizing defendant corporation did not comply with the requirements of law.

1. The feature of the Political Code, found in subdivisions 14 and 15 of section 1670, which relate to the levy of a special tax for the support of these schools, is especially assailed. Subdivision 14 of this section, as it was amended in 1895, requires the high-school board to furnish to the authorities whose duty it is to levy taxes,—in this case, the board of supervisors (Chico High-School Board v. Board of Sup'rs of Butte Co., 118 Cal. 115, 50 Pac. 275),—the 1st day of September, "an estimate of the cost of purchasing a suitable lot, of procuring plans * * * and erecting a building * * * and of conducting the school for the school year," and "each year thereafter to present to said authorities * * * an estimate of the amount of money required for conducting the school for the school year." Subdivision 15 provides that: "When such estimate shall have been made and submitted, it shall be the duty of the authorities whose duty it is to levy taxes in said * * * school district * * * to levy a special tax upon all the taxable property of said * * * school district, sufficient in amount to maintain the high school. Said tax shall be computed, entered upon the tax roll, and collected, in the same manner as other taxes are computed, entered and collected." The same question was here under the act of 1891 (St. 1891, p. 182). As the law then read, it was held unconstitutional, because it left the amount of the tax wholly to the discretion of an executive officer, leaving no discretion in the board of supervisors; thus delegating legislative power to the county superintendent. McCabe v. Carpenter, 102 Cal. 469, 36 Pac. 836. After that decision, and probably to obviate the infirmity in the law of 1891, the provisions of the Code were amended as shown above. Appellant insists that the law as amended is still obnoxious to the same objections as pointed out in McCabe v. Carpenter. We cannot so regard the statute. In the former act it was provided that "an annual tax shall be levied * * * the amount of said tax being estimated by the county superintendent of schools," and it was made the duty of the board of supervisors "to levy such rate as will produce the amount estimated to be necessary for such purposes." Under the statute of 1895 the estimate of the superintendent of schools is but advisory, and the discretion is left with the supervisors to determine the amount and levy the tax "sufficient * * * to maintain the high school," not necessarily "such rate as will produce the amount estimated" by the superintendent, as formerly; and "said tax shall be computed, entered upon the tax roll, and collected, in the same manner as other taxes are computed," etc. So far as we can see, the taxpayer has the same right under this law to be heard, and has the same notice, as he has under the law which provides for fixing the tax levy by the supervisors to meet the estimate furnished by the school superintendent for the county-school fund. Pol. Code, §§ 1817-1819.

It is said that this is a special tax, and that because a special tax cannot be levied in any of the common-school districts without an election, as provided for in sections 1830-1839, except as specified in sections 1817-1820, the law is unconstitutional. We know of no limitation upon the powers of the legislature to authorize by general law a tax for a special purpose without first submitting the proposition to a vote of the electors. Having voted that they will organize a high school under a law which gives to the supervisors the power to levy a special tax to support the school, there would seem to be no occasion for submitting the question to a vote of the people a second time, except it might be to determine the rate. But that is a function within the powers of the supervisors, which we think the legislature could confer, and has conferred, upon them. There is reason for submitting the question for special tax to the voters in the common-school districts which does not exist in the high-school districts. The common school is supported by the general school fund and school tax, no part of which can be used for other schools.

The objection that the law fixed no maximum rate, and provides no rule or method of computation of amounts to be raised, is without merit. The law says that the supervisors shall compute the tax in the manner as other taxes are computed, and the rate is governed necessarily by the amount found by the board to be sufficient for conducting the school for the school year, or for constructing the necessary buildings, as the case may be. We cannot assume that this discretion will be abused, in order to take away the power by which that discretion is exercised. We must rather assume that the supervisors will exercise such wise discretion as alone guides and limits them in fixing the rate of taxation to meet other county expenditures,—for example, building bridges, as to which their powers are unlimited.

Section 25 of article 4 of the constitution contains 33 subdivisions specifying certain matters relating to which "the legislature shall not pass local or special laws." Appellant designates the following subdivisions as violated by section 1670: "(10) For the assessment or collection of taxes; (11) providing for conducting elections * * * except on the organization of new counties;" "(19) granting to any corporation * * * any special privilege," etc.; "(27) providing for the management of common schools; (28) creating offices, or prescribing the powers and duties of officers, in counties, * * * election of school districts;" "(33) in all other cases where a general law can be made applicable." Section 6 of article 9 of the constitution provides that "our public school system shall include primary and grammar schools, and such high schools, evening schools, normal schools and technical schools as may be established by the legislature, or by municipal or district authority; but the entire revenue derived from the state school fund, and the school tax, shall be applied exclusively to the support of primary and grammar schools." Section 5 of the same article makes it the duty of the legislature to provide a system of common schools by which a free school shall be kept up and supported in each district at least six months in every year; and section 1 declares that "a general diffusion of knowledge and intelligence" is "essential to the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people," and therefore "the legislature shall encourage by all suitable means the promotion of intellectual * * * improvement." The common or free school is made the special and exclusive beneficiary of the state school fund and the school tax, but all the enumerated educational instrumentalities belong to our public school system, and may be authorized and their support provided for by the legislature. Under the constitutional admonition the legislature has provided a system of public schools, consisting of the primary, grammar, and high school, the latter of which is designed to be preparatory to admission in the state university. Graduates of the grammar school are admitted into the high school without examination. It cannot be doubted that it is within the power of the legislature to provide a plan for the organization and establishment of high schools, and we do not understand that the people of the state in this action are attempting to discredit a power expressly given the legislature by them in our organic law. The objection is to the plan itself, and not to the power to prescribe a plan. The plan is by no means complex or anomalous. By section 1670, as amended by the act of 1895, "any * * * school district having a population of one thousand inhabitants or more may, by a majority vote of the qualified electors voting at the election held for the purpose * * * establish and maintain a high school at the expense of such * * * school district." It is made the duty of the board of school trustees whenever a majority of the heads of families in any school district, as shown by said census, shall unite in a petition to that board "for the establishing and maintaining of a high school therein," to petition the county superintendent of schools "for a determination of the question"; and it is made the duty of the county superintendent thereupon to call an election for that purpose, to "be conducted in the manner prescribed for conducting school elections." The election officer must report the result to the county superintendent within 10 days from the holding the election, and, if a majority have voted in favor of the school, it is made the duty of the county superintendent, within 15 days after receiving the returns, to call a meeting of the board of school trustees of the district, who shall at said meeting determine the location and name of the high school. The board of school trustees constitute the high-school board, and "shall have the management and control of said high school." Their powers and duties shall be such as are now or may hereafter be assigned by law to boards of school trustees. Other provisions prescribe the course of study, and for admission of pupils. The high school is thus constituted. Then follow the provisions in subdivisions 14 and 15 already considered, relating to revenue to support the school. It is claimed that the section is special legislation, because it takes from the operation of the general law for the levy of taxes a certain class of school districts, and it applies to these districts alone, and vests in the board of supervisors a power to levy a tax which the general laws of the state do not give that board, and gives to the high-school board initiatory powers with respect to taxation not possessed in any other district. All this may be true, without making the law special legislation in the sense the term "special" is used in the constitution. It was within the power of the legislature to constitute these schools, and to provide for their support by methods different from those adopted for like purposes as to other schools. In a sense, the provisions had to be special, for no part of the state school fund or general school tax could be used to support the high school. The law is general in its operation, for it applies alike to all cities, incorporated towns, and school districts having a population of 1,000 inhabitants or more; and it is general in its purpose, for it gives to all inhabitants of the state similarly situated equal opportunity to avail themselves of the benefits to be derived from these schools. The nature and objects of these schools suggest a classification different from the common-school corporation, and rationally justify the diversity in the legislation as to them. People v. Railroad Co., 105 Cal. 576, 38 Pac. 905. While it is true, as suggested by appellant, that the taxpayer is compelled to pay a special tax to support the high school, without being heard upon the amount of his tax in the manner he may be heard before being compelled to pay a special tax to support the common school,—i. e. by voting at an election called for the purpose,—the act is not for that reason special legislation. We do not feel called upon to discuss the several specific objections above noted. We think the high-school act here involved meets the definition of a general law, as pointed out in the case last cited.

2. The objection that the proceedings did not comply with the requirements of the law is not well taken. The petition is directed to the "trustees of Salem school district, of the county of San Joaquin" (naming them). This was sufficient, without directing the petition to the board of trustees. It states the population of the district to be more than 1,000. It gives the boundaries of the proposed district, and shows that they include the whole of Salem school district. The body of the petition does not state that the signers constitute "a majority of the heads of families" of the district, but appended to it, and forming a part of it, as submitted to the trustees, is a certificate signed by the school-census marshal for Salem school district, in which he certifies that the petition "contains the names of a majority of the heads of families in the above-named school district, as shown by the last school-census report." Section 1670, supra, provides that "whenever a majority of the heads of families * * * shall unite in a petition to the * * * board of school trustees," etc. We think the petition was sufficient. Fredrick v. City of San Luis Obispo, 118 Cal. 391, 50 Pac. 661.

It is objected that the petition of the trustees to the county superintendent of public schools to call an election was insufficient, because it is unverified and is not authenticated by the clerk; also, because it begins, "We, the undersigned school trustees," and contains,

"Now, therefore, we, the undersigned trustees, and your petitioners will ever pray," and bears these names over the word "Trustees," and is indorsed, "Petition by Trustees," etc. The point is that the act requires a petition to the board of trustees and a petition by the board of trustees. The section requires the trustees "to petition the county superintendent of schools to call an election in * * * said school district, for the determination of the question." No form of petition is prescribed. This petition was sufficient. It was quite full and specific as to the purpose for which it was presented, and was prima facie authority to the county school superintendent.

It is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the petition was signed by a majority of the heads of families in the district. There was evidence that the signers to the petition were heads of families, but no direct evidence appears in the transcript that they constituted a majority of the heads of families. It appears, however, that the census marshal correctly took the census of all the heads of families, and that the original sheets used by the marshal and showing this census were before the school trustees when the petition was presented to them, and were also used at the trial of this case. They furnished evidence from which, by comparison of the names on the petition with those on the sheets, the fact could be determined whether a majority of all the heads of families signed the petition. We must presume that this evidence was sufficient, inasmuch as it does not appear in the record. It was the duty of the defendant to make out its case at the trial, but on the appeal by plaintiff it became the duty of the latter to show error affirmatively. If for any reason these census sheets did not prove what they purported to show, they should have been printed in the record. It was admitted at the trial that the district had a population of over 1,000.

It is claimed that the county superintendent of schools had no power to nominate the election board. The statute, in terms, directs the county superintendent to call the election, and to appoint three qualified electors of the district to conduct the election. He named J. D. Huffman, C. M. Ferdun, and R. L. Graham. Graham was sick and did not attend, and an elector, S. W. Sollars, was chosen to fill the vacancy. Huffman testified: "I was one of the officers appointed to conduct the election. R. L. Graham did not attend. * * * Upon ascertaining this fact the officers of the election and three or four other electors present selected Mr. Sollars in Mr. Graham's place. He was a bystander and freeholder. He took the oath and acted. I was one of the judges, and Mr. Ferdun the other. We were electors." On cross-examination he testified: "I don't know but what I and Mr. Ferdun named Mr. Sollars between us, without reference to any other of the electors present. I don't know anything as to the details of that part of it. There was no record made of any kind. It was a kind of free and easy affair. We all had a chip in it. I think we conferred with the others. I don't know." The complaint sets forth in an exhibit the returns of the election board to the county superintendent which the law requires to be made. The returns certify to Graham's absence on account of sickness, and the appointment of Sollars in his stead. Then follows the verified statement that an election was held May 23, 1896, "to determine whether a high school shall be established and maintained, or not, in said Salem school district." The returns recite the names of the inspector, judges (Sollars among them), the clerks, and sets out the oath of office, with signatures attached. A list of 174 voters is given, followed by a certificate signed by the inspector, judges, and clerks, certifying that 174 electors voted at the election. The tally list is set forth, showing the vote to have been: "For the high school, one hundred and forty; against the high school, thirty; blanks, four." And this is attested and signed by the inspector, the judges, and clerks. It was held in Sprague v. Norway, 31 Cal. 174, where an inspector appointed by the supervisors did not attend, and the judges filled the vacancy, instead of his being appointed by the electors present, that it was not such irregularity as vitiated the election in that precinct, provided the result of the election was not thereby changed. Approved in Keller v. Chapman, 34 Cal. 635; Preston v. Culbertson, 58 Cal. 198. See, also, 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 197; Atkinson v. Lorbeer, 111 Cal. 419, 44 Pac. 162.

It is objected that the polls should have been opened earlier and closed earlier; citing People v. Caruthers School-Dist., 102 Cal. 184, 36 Pac. 396. Section 1597, Pol. Code, provides that, in districts such as this one, "the polls must not be opened before nine o'clock a. m., nor kept open less than four hours." The notice of election required the polls to be kept open from two o'clock p. m. until sunset. This was a sufficient compliance with the law.

The superintendent of schools directed the notice of election to be published in the Lodi Sentinel, a weekly newspaper published in said district, and the proof is that it was so published. Appellant is in error in claiming that the notice required publication in the Lodi Weekly Sentinel.

It is objected that the notice did not remain posted for the fifteen days required by law. The proof is that it was duly posted on May 6, 1896. The election was held on May 23d following. It was not necessary to prove that the notice remained posted each day after it was posted.

There are numerous other assignments, but we find none importing prejudicial error. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

JOHNSON v. BANK OF LAKE. (S. F. 956.)¹
(Supreme Court of California. June 8, 1899.)
ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—ACTION FOR FEES—
LIMITATIONS.

The liability of a corporation on a contract of employment of an attorney accrues, within the meaning of the statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 359), when the services are performed, and not when the contract is made.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Lake county.

Action by F. E. Johnson against the Bank of Lake. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

T. J. Sheridan and Garret W. McEnerney, for appellant. M. S. Sayre, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff, by appropriate allegations, sought to enforce a liability against the Bank of Lake, as a stockholder of the Lakeport Agricultural Park Association. By his first cause of action he charged for the value of his services, as an attorney at law, rendered to the association, at its request, in defense of an action in which it was a defendant, "in consideration of which the Lakeport Agricultural Association promised, undertook, and agreed to pay the plaintiff the reasonable value of the said services whenever thereto requested." The second cause of action charged for moneys expended by plaintiff for the association at its request, and under its promise of repayment. The third cause of action was for the value of the services of J. J. Bruton, rendered under a like employment as attorney at law in the same litigation; Bruton's claim having been assigned to plaintiff. The court found the employment, the value of the services, and the expenditures of moneys, all as pleaded in the complaint; but it found that defendant's plea of the statute of limitations was a good plea, "because the employment of plaintiff and of Bruton to perform the services which they did perform was made prior to the time when the defendant became a stockholder, although the services were actually performed and rendered after the date when defendant became such stockholder." Judgment therefore passed for the defendant, saving as to a small portion of the money expended. As to this money no question is made upon this appeal.

Section 359 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an action against a stockholder of a corporation to enforce a liability created by law must be brought within three years after the liability was created. Section 322 of the Civil Code declares that the liability of each stockholder is determined by the amount of stock or shares owned by him at the time the debt or liability was incurred. The point then here presented is: When, under this contract, was the liability of the corporation created? If it was created at the time of the employment, as the trial court held, its judgment is admittedly proper. If it was created at the time when the services were fully performed, then the defendant corporation is liable in the amount sued for. In McBean v. City of Fresno, 112 Cal. 159, 44 Pac. 358, this court had occasion to construe a contract of the city of Fresno which was to continue for five years, and which involved the expenditure of $4,900 per annum, payable quarterly. It was called upon to construe the contract under the provisions of the constitution prohibiting cities from incurring indebtedness or liability, in any manner or for any purpose, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such year, in connection with the charter of the city, which declared, "The trustees shall not create, audit, allow or permit to accrue any debt or liability in excess of the available money in the treasury." It was contended on behalf of the city, as it is contended by respondents here, that the liability was created and incurred at the time when the contract was entered into. But the conclusion reached and expressed by this court was that "at the time of entering into the contract no debt or liability was created for the aggregate amount of the installments to be paid under the contract, but that the sole debt or liability created was that which arose from year to year in separate amounts as the work was performed." To the same effect is State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 429. In accordance with this same construction may be cited Garrison v. Howe, 17 N. Y. 458. In each case the time of the creation of the liability is to be determined by the terms and conditions of the contract itself. In the case at bar it is apparent from its reading that the association's liability to pay arose only after performance by the attorney of the requested services. Before the services had been rendered, the attorney could no more have exacted payment under the contract than could McBean, in advance of his rendition of the services, have required from the city of Fresno the aggregate amount of payments contemplated by his five-years contract. The judgment appealed from is therefore reversed.

GRAY et al. v. ESCHEN et al. (S. F. 1,021.)
TROVER — FINDINGS — VERDICT — INSTRUCTIONS—APPELLANT SHOWING ERROR.

1. In an action to recover for rock carried away by one who purchased only the debris of a blast, testimony by one of defendants that they took the dirt, and plaintiff took the rock, and that the stuff taken out of the quarry by defendants was of no value at all, and that they did not at any time take away any rock that was above six inches in diameter, together with the testimony of another, who was around the place frequently, that he never saw defendants haul away any rock, and that the material defendants' teams hauled from the quarry was all fine stuff, together with testimony of another that defendants took out waste, small dirt, and small bits of rock, is sufficient to justify a verdict that defendants did not take away the whole of the rock thrown down by the blast.

2. A finding of fact on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

3. In an action by a lessee to recover for rock alleged to have been wrongfully carried away from the premises by one who purchased the débris of a blast prior to plaintiff's lease, evidence that all the quarry that was blasted was without the lines of the lessor's lot, if believed by the jury, will justify a verdict for defendants.

4. In an action by the lessee of a quarry to recover for rock alleged to have been carried away from the leased premises by one who purchased the débris of a blast from the lessor prior to the lease under which plaintiff claims title to the rock, an instruction that, if the jury find that the lessor was not the owner of the land from which the rock was blasted, then their verdict must be for defendants, is not erroneous, where there is some evidence that the blast did not occur on the lessor's land.

5. It is not error to give an instruction which, standing alone, may have left the meaning of a word indefinite, when, read in connection with the other instructions, its meaning is clear.

6. In an action by a lessee to recover for rock alleged to have been wrongfully carried away from the leased premises by one who purchased the débris of a blast from the lessor prior to the lease under which plaintiff claims title to the rock, an instruction that if the jury find that the rock, or any part thereof, was blasted out of L. street without the license of the proper authorities of the city, then their verdict must be for defendants, is not erroneous, where there is some evidence that it came out of L. street, and not the leased premises.

7. A lessee of premises, who by the terms of the lease acquires the material detached by a blast made prior thereto, only acquires title to so much of the material as had not been sold before the lease.

8. A record not showing what modifications of the instructions were made by the court, or in what respect or at whose request the instructions were given, a statement by the court, embodied in the record, that it is understood that every portion of the charge is deemed excepted to by counsel, and every omission or modification is also deemed excepted to by counsel, is insufficient to base error on, as the proceedings are presumed to be regular, and it is incumbent on appellant to show that there was error.

9. A party cannot complain of an instruction given at his request.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by G. F. Gray and others against James Eschen and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appealed. Affirmed.

Fisher Ames, for appellants. Boyd & Field, for respondents.

COOPER, C. Action to recover $1,580 for goods, wares, and merchandise alleged to have been sold and delivered by plaintiffs to defendants. Verdict and judgment for defendants. Motion for new trial, and order denying the same. This appeal is from the judgment and order.

It is claimed by plaintiffs that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, in certain particulars specified. The first specification is as follows: "That it appears from the evidence that John Kelso, at the time of giving the alleged permission to the defendants to take away materials from said quarry, merely gave or granted to them the right to take away what is known as 'waste' or 'débris,' whereas they took away, not only such waste or débris, but the whole of the rock which had been thrown down by the blast." The complaint is in the general form of assumpsit for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered. There is no evidence in the record of any sale, but plaintiffs, in support of their complaint, attempted to prove the taking by defendants of certain broken rock claimed to have been the property of plaintiffs. On February 23, 1895, defendants paid to one John Kelso $100, for which a receipt was given as follows: "To waste on property on the corner of Lombard and Montgomery streets, one hundred dollars. Paid February 23, 1895. John Kelso, by Saml. L. Lent." On July 30, 1895, the said Kelso gave a lease of a lot of land on Lombard and Montgomery streets to plaintiffs, which lease expressed that it was "for the purpose of having the rock removed therefrom, and the said lots graded to the level of the present grade," etc. Prior to February, 1895, said Kelso had blasted the bluff in the vicinity of Lombard and Montgomery streets, by which blast several thousand tons of rock, débris, etc., were thrown upon the land in the vicinity, and upon the lot so leased by said Kelso to plaintiffs. The rock and earth had been loosened by the blast before the receipt was given to defendants by Kelso for the $100. The portion of the rock so lying upon the ground, and claimed to have been taken away by defendants after July 30th, is the property alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendants. The specification therefore is directed to the fact that defendant not only took away "waste or débris," but the whole of the rock which had been thrown down by the blast. Defendant Eschen testified: "Gray Bros. were hauling the clean rock. They were engaged in doing that until they got all the clean rock hauled away. We took the dirt, and they took the rock. * * * The stuff we took out of that quarry of Kelso's was of no value at all. * * * We didn't take away any rock at any time while we were there that was above six inches in diameter, and we were there from February, the time we made the purchase, until about the 20th of May." The witness Burke testified: "I remember this fall of rock in the Kelso quarry. After the 30th of July, 1895, the character of the material which Captain Eschen's teams drew out of there was all fine stuff. * * * I was around there all the time, off and on. I always seen the stuff they were hauling. * * * I never saw them haul away any rock." The witness Minor testified: "I know the kind of material that our men took out of that quarry after the 30th of July, 1895. They took waste and small dirt,—small bits of rock." There is other testimony of the same character, but the above is sufficient. This evidence was approved by the verdict of the jury, and it therefore was sufficient to show that defendant "did not take away the whole of the rock which had been thrown down by the blast."

The second specification of insufficiency of evidence is as follows: "It appears from the evidence that not more than fifteen per cent. of the materials thrown down by the blast was waste or débris, which the defendants, if they had any right to remove any material from the quarry, could legally have removed, and that as a fact the defendants did remove nearly all if not the entire one hundred per cent. of the material so thrown down." If all the evidence in the record showed that not more than 15 per cent. of the materials thrown down by the blast was "waste or débris," then this specification would be well taken, provided the fact were a material and controlling one. But there is certainly a very sharp conflict in the record as to the amount or percentage of the blast which was rock, and the amount which was débris. The witness Minor said: "As to the coarseness or fineness of that rock, I can say that, while Mr. Kelso quarried there, I suppose there was about from fifty to seventy-five per cent. of it that was débris. I call 'débris' anything that he did not want. Anything that he did not call 'rock' I called 'débris.'"

* * * Only twenty-five per cent. of the entire mass was rock larger than your fists." The witness Kelso testified that any rock smaller than six inches was called "débris." This testimony shows that more than 15 per cent. of the materials thrown down by the blast was "waste or débris." From this we cannot say that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict in either of the respects specified. Under the Code, and the rule many times repeated by this court, we are not at liberty to consider the insufficiency of the evidence in any other respects than those specified. Moreover, the witness Murdock testified that he was present when the blast exploded, and that he worked for Kelso, and that "all the quarry that was blasted was within the lines of Lombard street." If the jury believed this evidence, which they had the right to do, then the verdict would be justified upon the ground that the rock did not come off the lot leased to plaintiffs, and plaintiffs had no title to it.

The plaintiffs' counsel, in the bill of exceptions and statement, specifies six errors of law occurring at the trial, by reason of the court giving certain instructions to the jury, but in his brief argues only four, and we will examine only those urged in the brief.

The first instruction complained of reads as follows: "If you find and believe that John Kelso was not the owner of the land from which the said materials were blasted, and had no interest or estate in said land which gave to him the right to blast them out, and the only right to said materials derived to the plaintiffs was derived from John Kelso, your verdict will be for the defendants." It is not claimed but that the instruction is correct as an abstract proposition of law, but it is said there was no issue as to the ownership by John Kelso of the lands from which the said materials were blasted. The plaintiffs, under the issues made by the pleadings, had to prove that they were the owners of the "merchandise sold and delivered" to defendants. To prove such title they introduced what is called a "lease" from John Kelso to them, and the whole theory of the plaintiffs is that the rocks were taken from the premises described in this lease. If Kelso did not own the land from which the materials were blasted, the plaintiffs, as we understand the case, could not recover. There was testimony that all the blasting was within the lines of Lombard street. If this is true, then the rock did not come from the lands described in the lease to plaintiffs, and Kelso was not the owner of the lands from which the materials were blasted. It is claimed that it was error for the court to use the words "said materials," because the term is so indefinite that the jury may have considered that it meant rock as well as waste material. The court in other parts of its instruction referred to said materials as those taken by defendants, and told the jury that they were to determine from all the facts and circumstances what materials were included within the term "waste." Applying the rule that all the instructions are to be read together, as supplementing and explaining each other, the instruction could not have been misleading.

The second instruction complained of reads as follows: "If you find and believe that the said materials, or any part thereof, was blasted out of Lombard street without the license of the proper authorities of the city and county of San Francisco, then your verdict will be for the defendants, so far as all the materials which so came out of Lombard street, if any, are concerned, but not necessarily as to the other materials." The reasons given as to why the first instruction was not prejudicial error apply to this. There was testimony in the record that the blasting was out of Lombard street.

The third instruction complained of is as follows: "If you find and believe that said materials came out of the fifty-vara lot on the southwest corner of Lombard and Montgomery streets, and that all the allegations of the complaint are true, then your verdict for the value of said materials, exclusive of waste, will be for the plaintiffs." The instruction was certainly favorable to plaintiffs, and could not have injured their case, unless they were entitled to recover for waste. Defendants had bought of Kelso, and paid for, the waste, long before the lease was made to plaintiffs. If defendants and plaintiffs both claim title from a common source, as counsel elsewhere states in his brief, it appears to us that the plaintiffs only took from Kelso that which had not before been sold to defendants.

The fourth and last instruction complained of reads as follows: "On the contrary, if you find and believe that the defendants took and removed materials other than waste, and that the complaint is true, then your verdict for said materials, other than waste, so taken and removed, will be for the plaintiffs." This instruction is practically the same as the third complained of, and for the same reasons the giving of it was not error.

We have considered the alleged errors in giving the instructions, but we might well have held that proper exceptions were not taken to them. The court, in giving the instructions, said, "I give you the following instructions, based upon those given by the respective counsel, and in some instances they have been modified by the court," and then proceeded to read or give the instructions. They were not numbered, and there is nothing in the record to show whether any particular instruction was given at the request of the plaintiffs or of the defendants, or, if modified by the court, in what respect or what was the instruction modified. The respective counsel asked, after the instructions were read, "that certain exceptions to the instructions given by the court be reserved." The court stated, "It is understood that every portion of the charge is deemed excepted to by each counsel, and every omission or modification is also deemed excepted to by each counsel." We cannot possibly say from this record that there was a single omission or modification. It does not appear that plaintiffs excepted to any instruction, or any portion of any instruction. If the instructions, under the statement of the court, are deemed excepted to by plaintiffs, we are totally in the dark as to whether such instruction was given at the request of plaintiffs or of defendants. It certainly could not avail plaintiffs' counsel to except to an instruction offered by himself. It is presumed that the proceedings in the court below were regular, and, where error is claimed, it is incumbent upon appellants to show it affirmatively. Applying the rule to the instructions given in this case, we must presume that each and every one of the instructions were given at the request of plaintiffs' counsel. We find nothing in the record to show that plaintiffs excepted to any one of the instructions so given, but the court said that they might each be deemed excepted to. It cannot avail counsel to deem his own instructions "excepted to." In Bernstein v. Downs, 112 Cal. 205, 44 Pac. 557, certain instructions were given to the jury at the request of plaintiff. Counsel for defendants said: "We except to the instructions asked for and allowed by the court on the part of the plaintiff." This court held this was not a specification of the particular errors upon which the party intended to rely, and in the opinion said: "There certainly should be at least an exception to each of the instructions, by number or other designation; otherwise, the attention of the court is not called to any one particular alleged error." If counsel in this case had said at the conclusion of giving the instructions, "I except to every portion of the charge, and every omission or modification thereof," it could not plausibly be claimed that the exception was sufficient. If it would not have been sufficient for counsel to have made the exception in this form, it certainly was not sufficient "that he be deemed to have made it." In the case of Cockrill v. Hall, 76 Cal. 195, 18 Pac. 318, the exception was, "To each and every part and to the whole of said instructions the plaintiff duly excepted." This court held the exception insufficient, and in discussing the exception said, "This was nothing more than an exception taken to the whole charge of the court, without bringing to its attention any special point where error was claimed to have been committed." Under the rule laid down in the above cases, we do not think, even if the instructions contain error, that plaintiffs can avail themselves of it on this record. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

DOYLE v. REPUBLIC LIFE INS. CO. et al.
(S. F. 1,113.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 8, 1899.)

APPEALABLE ORDER—NEW TRIAL.

1. An order refusing a motion to vacate a default judgment and permit defendant to answer to the merits is not a final judgment, but an order made after final judgment, from which appeal is required, by Code Civ. Proc. § 939, subd. 3, to be taken within 60 days.

2. There can be no new trial of a "motion."

3. A subsequent order refusing to vacate an appealable order regularly and advisedly made is not appealable.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county.

Action by John T. Doyle against the Republic Life Insurance Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order refusing to vacate the judgment, and a denial of a new trial of this motion, Samuel D. Ward, receiver, appeals. Dismissed.

Vincent Neale, for appellant. G. W. McEnerny, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff had obtained judgment against the Republic Life Insurance Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Illinois. The service of the summons was by publication and mailing, and the defendant corporation suffered default. One year, less 11 days, after entry of this judgment, S. D. Ward asked that it be vacated, and that he, as receiver of the defendant corporation under appointment of the circuit court of Illinois, be permitted to answer to the merits of the action. His motion was denied by an order given on May 12, 1896. Thereafter he moved for a new trial of this motion, and by its order of May 8, 1897, the court denied his latter application. He took his appeals from both of these orders after that date.

Neither of these appeals can be entertained. The order of the court refusing Ward leave to answer was not a final judgment, but was an order made after final judgment. His appeal therefrom was not taken within 60 days. Code Civ. Proc. § 939, subd. 3. It must therefore be dismissed. The order denying the motion for a new trial of the petition for leave to answer is not appealable—First, because the practice of moving for a new trial of a motion is one neither countenanced nor permitted by our procedure (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 590, 656); and, second, because a subsequent order refusing to vacate an appealable order, which has been regularly and advisedly made, is not appealable. Harper v. Hildreth, 99 Cal. 265, 33 Pac. 1103. Both of the appeals are therefore ordered dismissed.

SMELTZER v. MILLER, County Auditor.
(S. F. 964.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1899.)

COUNTIES—LETTING CONTRACTS—ADVERTISING FOR BIDS.

That the board of supervisors may cure previous informalities in letting contracts by subsequent ratification has no application where the board, by failure to advertise for bids for county printing, as required by Pol. Code, § 3766, as amended in 1895, had no power to make the contract in the first instance.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county.

Action by M. J. Smeltzer against George S. Miller, auditor of Monterey county. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. K. Alexander, for appellant. S. F. Geil and P. E. Zabala, for respondent.

GRAY, C. All the questions involved in this appeal were stated by this court, thoroughly discussed, and settled on the former appeal herein. Smeltzer v. Miller, 113 Cal. 163, 45 Pac. 264. Prior to that appeal the trial court had sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and this court, after reciting parts of the complaint, held that it stated a cause of action, and that the demurrer should have been overruled. It appears that, on the return of the case to the trial court, an answer was filed, and a trial had, and the fifth and sixth findings of the court are as follows: "(5) That on, to wit, the 7th day of June, 1894, the board of supervisors of said county of Monterey made and entered in the minutes of said board the following orders, to wit: 'This being the time fixed to hear the report of the committee heretofore appointed to propose the rate of county printing and furnishing blanks for one year, from June 10, 1894, to June 10, 1895, said report is presented to the board, and by the board accepted, and so fixed, and the following prices as proposed by the committee are adopted, to wit: For printing the proceedings of board of supervisors, per square of two hundred and forty ems, nonpareil, twenty-five cents. For ordinances, orders, notices, reports, etc., sixty cents per square for first insertion, and twenty-five cents per square for each subsequent insertion. For delinquent tax list, sixty cents per square for first insertion, and twenty-five cents per square for all subsequent insertions. On motion of J. T. Porter, seconded by T. J. Field, it is ordered that the minutes of the board of supervisors, and all orders, ordinances, and notices made by the board, and all printing ordered by the board of supervisors of Monterey county, be and are hereby awarded to the Salinas Weekly Index, a weekly newspaper printed and published in Salinas City, for one year, commencing June 10, 1894, and ending June 10, 1895.' (6) That during the entire year of 1895 said board of supervisors of said Monterey county failed, neglected, and refused to advertise for bids for publication of the delinquent tax list of said county of Monterey for the year 1894-95, and said board of supervisors of said Monterey county failed, neglected, and refused to contract or award any contract for said publication with the lowest or any bidder after ten days, or any public or any notice that such contract would be let; that no sealed proposals or bids were ever received by said board of supervisors for the publication of said delinquent tax list, and the making of the orders of said board of supervisors mentioned in finding 5 were the only provisions made by said board of supervisors for the publication of said or any delinquent tax list."

These findings show that the printing of the tax list was not even awarded to the newspaper mentioned, and, further, that there was no advertising for bids, and no contract made with the board of supervisors for printing the tax list; that section 3766 of the Political Code, as amended in 1895, was not complied with; and that the complaint, as set out and held sufficient in the former opinion of this court, was absolutely true. This court has had occasion to approve its first decision herein in the case of Harris v. Cook, 119 Cal. 454, 51 Pac. 692. The case at bar is clearly distinguishable from Power v. May, 114 Cal. 207, 46 Pac. 6, and the other cases cited by respondent, holding that the board of supervisors may cure previous informalities by subsequent ratification and recognition of liability. In Power v. May, the board had the power to make the contract which it subsequently ratified (see Power v. May [Cal.] 55

Pac. 796); but in the case at bar the board never had the power to make the contract for the printing, for the reason that they had not advertised for bids as required by the statute, and therefore they could not call into existence by subsequent ratification a contract that they had no power to make in the first instance. The former decision of this court herein is not only correct, but it is the law of the case. I advise that the judgment be reversed, and the court below directed to enter judgment on the findings for the plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of his complaint.

We concur: COOPER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the court below directed to enter judgment on the findings for the plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of his complaint.

PEOPLE v. HILL. (S. F. 1,596.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1899.)
ELECTIONS—CLOSING POLLS—DISFRANCHISEMENT—MUNICIPALITIES.

Under Salinas City Charter, § 5, providing that the general law shall apply to city elections as far as practicable, but that the polls shall not be opened later than 2 p. m., nor closed before sundown, the vote of wards closing before sundown should be disregarded, notwithstanding the general law had subsequently fixed an earlier hour, this law being made applicable to state and county elections only; and this though a majority of the voters are thus disfranchised.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county.

Action by the people against W. J. Hill. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. F. Geil and C. F. Lacey, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald and Renison & Jones, for the People.

TEMPLE, J. This action is for usurpation of the office of mayor of Salinas City. The city was reincorporated by special act of the legislature passed in 1876. In section 5 of that act it is provided, as to municipal elections, among other things, that "all provisions of law regulating elections for state and county officers shall apply, as far as practicable, to elections under this charter. The polls for all elections shall be opened at such hour as may be designated by the mayor and common council in giving notice of said election; provided, that the hour for opening the polls shall in no case be later than the hour of two o'clock p. m., and the polls shall not be closed until sundown of the same day." A municipal election was held on the 14th of March, 1898, at which Francee, at whose instance this suit was brought, and Hill, defendant, were candidates. The proclamation calling the election directed that the polls should be opened at sunrise and closed at sundown. The general election law for state and county officers directed that the polls shall be closed at 5 p. m. There are three wards in the city. In two they followed the state law, and closed the polls at 5 o'clock p. m., which was found to be one hour and six minutes before sundown. Counting the votes from all the wards, Hill would have a majority of 24, and he was declared elected by the council. Rejecting the votes cast in wards 1 and 2 as illegal, Francee would be elected by a majority of 22; and this conclusion was reached by the trial court, and Hill takes this appeal.

It is contended by the appellant that the language of the section, providing that, so far as practicable, the general election law shall apply, indicates the intent that the general law should govern all city elections. If this were so, it is difficult to see why anything was said in the charter about the time for opening and closing the polls, and in regard to many other things mentioned in section 5. It is suggested that it was intended to provide that the polls need not be opened until 2 o'clock p. m., but to make no change as to the hour of closing, for then the general law directed that the polls be closed at sundown, which time was afterwards changed to 5 o'clock p. m., and, we may add, might be changed to 2 o'clock p. m. But it seems perfectly manifest that the permission given to the council by its proclamation to fix a later hour for the opening of the polls than that fixed in the general law, and the requirement that the polls must not be closed before sundown, are parts of the same provision. The absolute requirement is because of the power given the board to delay opening the polls. Where but few votes would be cast, it is not necessary that the polls should be kept open all day; but it is a wise provision which directs that, even then, voters may know that at all events the polls will be kept open for a certain designated portion of the day. Even if this were not so, there is no more ground for holding that the provision that the council may designate a different time for opening the polls than that fixed by the general law shall stand as an exception, than that the imperative requirement of the charter that the polls shall not close before sundown shall exist as an exception, notwithstanding the general law. As already stated, both are coupled with the provision making the general law applicable, and are purposeless if notwithstanding the general law is to control in such matters; for the general election law must always provide for opening and closing the polls. The charter, being a law for a special case, is not in conflict with a general law which provides otherwise. Even a general law subsequently passed does not repeal laws expressly made for special cases, unless an intent that the general law shall have such effect is manifested in some mode in the general law. This intent may be shown in various ways, but assuredly cannot be found in a statute which is expressly made applicable to state and county elections only. The decisions rendered in Staudé v. Commissioners, 61 Cal. 313, Thomason v. Ashworth, 73 Cal. 73, 14 Pac. 615, People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 436, 18 Pac. 413, and other cases cited, have no bearing whatever upon this matter. In those cases the statutes expressed a design to control and repeal the special laws, and the only questions considered were as to the power of the legislature to pass such laws,—not as to the construction of the statutes. Here it is the charter which makes the general law applicable so far as it is so, for in form and words the general law excludes the idea that it has any application to the charter election. Provision in a statute for a special case is not deemed repugnant to the general law, but an exception. But as the general law is in terms not applicable to this particular case, and the attempt is to show that it is expressly made applicable by the special law, neither the decisions cited nor the rule of interpretation are of consequence here.

It is said that under the ruling a majority of the voters are disfranchised, and that under such circumstances no one should be declared elected. No authority is cited for this proposition, and clearly it is for the legislature to determine the effect of such a failure. Whichever way the rule is made, unscrupulous managers can take advantage of it to defeat the popular will, if they are permitted so to do. It is not like the case where a majority of votes are cast for one who is ineligible. There the votes are legally cast and counted, but a person has been elected who is not qualified to serve, and it is also true that the opposing candidate did not receive a majority of the legal votes. There the votes may be canvassed, and full return made of the result, which will be received and counted; but in this case the election in the offending precincts is declared void, and no election was held therein. There are therefore no returns to canvass. The judgment is affirmed.

CORPORATIONS—CONTRACTS—DUTY OF STOCKHOLDERS.

Stockholders of a corporation, who do not control its directors, owe no duty to the corporation not to conceal from the directors the fact that they are interested in another corporation with which the directors of the former are about to make a contract, and hence such a contract is valid, notwithstanding such concealment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Theodore Fox against John W. Mackay and others. From an order denying a motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. G. Sieberst, for appellant. W. E. F. Deal and Edmund Tauszky, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. Plaintiff brings this action as a dissatisfied stockholder and on behalf of the Consolidated California & Virginia Mining Company, which corporation is made a party defendant. The defendant the Comstock Mill & Mining Company was never served with process, and is not interested in the litigation. John W. Mackay and John P. Jones are the real parties defendant. The corporation represented in this litigation by plaintiff has 216,000 shares. Plaintiff is the owner of 5 shares of this stock. By the bill a conspiracy is charged against Mackay and Flood to defraud the Consolidated California & Virginia Mining Company. It is claimed that at all times prior to Flood's death Mackay and he controlled this mining corporation, and that subsequent to Flood's death Mackay alone controlled it. That upon December 23, 1885, the mining company entered into a three-years contract with J. P. Jones for the milling of its ores; that this contract was entered into by the connivance and procurement of Mackay, Flood, and Jones; that Mackay and Flood were interested with Jones in the profits of the contract, and also controlled the directors of the mining company, and that the contract was greatly to the disadvantage and loss of the mining company, and that by Jones' contract he agreed to transport the ore from the dump to the mill and mill the same for six dollars per ton, returning to the mining company at least 70 per cent. of the pulp assay. It is next alleged that upon January 8, 1886, the Comstock Mill & Mining Company was organized by Jones, Mackay, and Flood, and that this milling contract was thereupon assigned to said milling company. It is further charged that upon December 24, 1886, this milling contract was modified and changed at the instigation of Mackay, Flood, and Jones, to the great loss of the mining company. It is further alleged that 41,000 tons of ore were milled, and less than 70 per cent. of the pulp assay returned upon such ore. By the bill, reduced to its lowest terms, it is claimed that Mackay and Flood are the moving, controlling parties in both corporations, and by the contract of milling and the unskillful and careless manner of milling, and by violations of the contract of milling, they defrauded the mining company out of immense sums of money. After the introduction of evidence upon issue joined, findings of fact were made by the trial court. These findings of fact are strong against the allegations of the bill, and, unless overthrown, stand as a stone wall forever barring a recovery by the plaintiff. Realizing these conditions, plaintiff has assaulted the findings as without support in the evidence. A few errors of law in the admission and rejection of evidence are relied upon by plaintiff, but we find them of such minor importance as not to demand consideration.

Defendants also urge certain grounds as fatal to plaintiff's cause of action. It is claimed that plaintiff was not a stockholder upon the books of the mining corporation at the times these various frauds are alleged to have been committed. It is said that the record discloses plaintiff to be a mere speculator and professional litigant, making this class of litigation a specialty, and that he purchased these five shares of stock of the corporation for the sole purpose of giving him a status as a party plaintiff, and that, therefore, he has come into a court of equity with bad motives. It is urged that plaintiff made no demand upon the corporation to bring the action. Laches is also relied upon, and likewise ratification by the stockholders is claimed. Although some of these defenses present interesting legal propositions, we pass them by with little discussion in view of the conclusion arrived at after an examination of the evidence and findings of fact. The record largely justifies the claim of defendants as to the somewhat equivocal position plaintiff occupies in this case. It is not entirely plain that he is one of those dissatisfied stockholders whom the law had in mind when it authorized such a one to inaugurate this character of litigation. Plaintiff's good faith in bringing the action is to some extent an open question. It is not conclusively shown that the best interests of the corporation were the moving factors in his mind in prosecuting this suit. These statements are justified when we consider that plaintiff, as the holder of 5 shares of stock of the corporation, stands alone, for, as far as we may be allowed to see, the holders of the remaining 215,995 shares are entirely satisfied with the corporation's past business management. They are fairly justified, in view of the fact that plaintiff held this particular five shares of stock but for a single month, and purchased them for the purpose of giving him a standing as plaintiff in this action, and also in view of the further fact that he brought five other actions of the same character against five other mining corporations upon the date that this complaint was filed. The findings are full and complete, and cover every substantial allegation of the bill. We see no good purpose to be subserved by setting forth in this opinion a detailed recital of the evidence which tends to support these findings, but might well content ourselves in saying that, after a careful reading of the record, we are satisfied that the trial judge was justified, under the evidence, in finding the facts as they are set out. If the case were to be reversed by reason of the insufficiency of the evidence, then, for the guidance of the trial court upon a second trial, we would point out in detail where the weak spots are found. But the rule may well be otherwise when the court deems the evidence sufficient. Yet, in view of the importance of the litigation, and the labor involved in the trial and the preparation of the record upon appeal, a few of the most important contentions of plaintiff will be noticed.

As to the milling contract of December, 1885, entered into with the mining company by Jones, the court has found that it was a fair contract for the mining company, and was honestly performed, and there is an abundance of evidence to support that finding. Indeed, there is hardly a substantial conflict of evidence upon the issue. If the contract made was a fair contract, and honestly performed, it would seem to be immaterial as to the part Mackay, Jones, and Flood took in making it. But, waiving the question as to what a court of equity might do with them if they had participated in the making of the contract, we find any participation absolutely denied by the evidence of both Mackay and Jones. Mr. Mackay testifies: "That at no time since November 17, 1883, either individually or with others, did he own or control a majority of the stock of the defendant. That he has not since that time taken any part in any election of any board of directors of the company, or attempted to control any action of the board of directors, or any member thereof. That he had nothing to do with their election, or influencing the stockholders or anybody else as to who should be elected, and never asked a shareholder for a proxy. I never asked or requested Mr. Havens, or anybody else connected with the company, to get proxies to be used at any stockholders' meeting. I have attended no meeting of the board of directors of the company since November 17, 1883." Mr. Jones testified: "I have taken no part whatever in the election of any board of directors of the company. I never spoke to any of the directors about their becoming directors, nor have any of them ever spoken to me; have never done anything to secure the control of the board of directors of either of these companies; had nothing to do with it; never took any interest in it; could not have told you who they were. I have not procured, either directly or indirectly, in any manner, shape, or form, the election of any director of the company, or made any attempt to do such a thing; never made any attempt in any manner to control the action of any board of directors of either of the companies that I have mentioned. I have never controlled, or sought to control, the affairs of the mining company, and I have never taken any part in its affairs at all." It is sufficient to say that the finding of the trial court was directly in line with this testimony.

The transactions evidenced by this litigation cover a period of 71 months. During that time there were four months when the milling company failed to return to the mining company 70 per cent. of the pulp assay.

But these returns were not greatly below 70 per cent., and when we consider that many other months intervened between each of the respective four months, the failure at those times to return 70 per cent. becomes immaterial, for it is disclosed by both evidence and findings that the actual per cent. of the return by the milling company cannot be determined at the end of a single month, unless the run terminates at that time. This is accounted for by the reason of the clean-up made at the end of the run which raises the average of the return for every month during the run. Such was the fact in this case, as is disclosed by both evidence and finding. During this period of 71 months there were 4 months in which the returns were over 90 per cent. of the pulp assay, and 42 months in which those returns were between 80 and 90 per cent. Under this showing there is nothing whatever to indicate fraud in the milling of the ore, and nothing whatever to furnish any reason why a stockholder of the mining company should be dissatisfied.

The milling contract of December, 1885, was modified by the parties in December, 1886. It appears that during the year 1885 large bodies of richer ore were found, and for this reason and others—as, for example, the increase in the price and quantity of quicksilver required to mill the richer ores—the contract was modified, whereby the milling company received compensation for transportation and milling based upon a scale per ton according to the richness of the ore. This contract is declared by the trial court to be a fair one, and to be honestly and faithfully carried out. The evidence fully supports the finding. Even conceding that the evidence discloses a few instances where the milling company charged seven dollars per ton when they should have charged but six dollars, still there is nothing in such fact alone to indicate fraud. Indeed, it would seem that, if mistakes of this character did occur, the balance of the account resulting therefrom stands in favor of the mining company.

In view of the fact that neither Mackay nor Flood was ever a director of the mining company, and in view of the further fact that the findings supported by the evidence declare that neither collectively nor individually did they control the directors of the mining company, it would seem that many of the matters raised upon the motion for a new trial and discussed in appellant's brief become immaterial. Indeed, such findings supported by the evidence would seem to almost undermine plaintiff's entire case. Certainly, upon such a state of facts, the discussion of various matters of fact and law raised in appellant's brief become unnecessary. Plaintiff insists that the intentional concealment by Mackay and Flood of their interest in the contract of the milling company should weigh strongly against them. Yet conceding this claim of concealment to be true, still these men were not directors of the mining corporation, nor did they control its directors; and as mere stockholders they owed it no duty. Again, for the same reason, the ruling of the court relating to the admissibility of Holden's evidence as an expert could not possibly prejudice plaintiff's case. In fact, it would seem that some of the questions we have already discussed and declared against appellant's contention could well have been disposed of upon this ground. After a careful examination of the record, we see nothing which demands a retrial of the case. For the foregoing reasons, the order is affirmed.

CONTRACT FOR MILLING ORES—CONSTRUCTION—ACTION FOR ACCOUNTING.

1. Under a contract for milling ores which provides that "said ores, rock, and earth shall be worked in the usual and ordinary manner of working like ores, and returns therefrom shall not be less than seventy (70) per cent. of the pulp assay," the return is for an average of 70 per cent., and not on each ton of ore furnished.

2. Defendant contracted to mill ores furnished by plaintiff, and return 70 per cent. of the pulp assay. Plaintiff sued for an accounting, alleging fraud and conspiracy, and that less than 70 per cent. was returned by defendant on a certain number of tons of ore furnished. There was no allegation that the 70 per cent. had reference to the pulp assay, or how much it fell short of 70 per cent., or when the ore was furnished. Held, that such complaint was insufficient.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Theodore Fox against John W. Mackay and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. G. Sieberst, for appellant. W. E. F. Deal and Edmund Tauszky, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This action is brought by Fox, a dissatisfied stockholder of the Consolidated California & Virginia Mining Company (a mining corporation), in behalf of the corporation, against the Comstock Mill & Mining Company, J. W. Mackay, J. P. Jones, and the Consolidated California & Virginia Mining Company. Mackay and Jones are the real defendants in interest. By the complaint, conspiracy and fraud are alleged against Mackay and Jones in the milling of the ores of the Consolidated California & Virginia Mining Company, and an accounting is asked. Under the contract entered into between the mining company and the milling company and Jones, by which the ores were to be milled, it was provided: "Said ores, rock, and earth shall be worked in the usual and ordinary manner of working like ores, and returns therefrom shall not be less than seventy (70) per cent. of the pulp assay." This appeal is taken from the judgment rendered against plaintiff, and the sole question raised revolves around a single allegation of the complaint, taken in connection with certain denials and allegations of the answer relating to the same subject-matter.

Plaintiff alleges that 734,000 tons of ore were milled under the said contract with Jones and the milling company, and, after alleging various other matters, declares: "And for the fraudulent purposes above stated said ores were milled and crushed by the said Comstock Mill & Mining Company in a very superficial and imperfect manner, so that an unusually small percentage of the precious metals was extracted therefrom and returned to the said Consolidated California & Virginia Mining Company, and plaintiff enumerates that less than seventy (70) per cent. was returned by said milling company to the said Consolidated California & Virginia Mining Company for more than 41,225 tons of the ore of the said Consolidated California & Virginia Mining Company, milled and reduced by the Comstock Mill & Mining Company." It is now claimed that this allegation of the complaint is admitted, and that by reason of such admission a breach of the contract as to a return of 70 per cent. of the pulp assay is shown, and that, therefore, judgment to that extent, at least, should have gone for plaintiff. For various reasons there is no merit whatever in the point urged. Passing, for a moment, the sufficiency of the denials found in the answer bearing upon this allegation of the complaint, we are satisfied the allegation itself is not sufficient to support a judgment. First, there is no statement in the allegation that the "seventy per cent." has any reference whatever to the pulp assay. As far as the allegation indicates, it may have been any other assay. Again, invoking the rule that the pleading should be construed against the pleader, we may assume that this shortage under 70 per cent. was the smallest fraction of 1 per cent., and, such being the case, the rule of "de minimis" would bar a recovery. Again, by any construction of this covenant in the contract, it may be fairly assumed that upon an honest and modern milling of the ore the milling company was bound to return an average of at least 70 per cent. of the pulp assay. Whether this average was to be based upon the daily or monthly output milled, or based upon the output for the entire life of the contract, we are not concerned; for it is plain that the milling company was not bound to return at least 70 per cent. of the pulp assay on each particular ton of ore milled. This is apparent, for no mode or means is provided under the contract by which such figures could be obtained. Indeed, the whole history of working and milling ore is opposed to any such construction of the contract.

We find no allegation that these 41,000 tons of ore were milled in any particular day or month or year. The pleading does not contradict the conclusion that the milling of this particular ore was scattered along at regular or irregular intervals throughout the entire life of the contract. If this allegation of the complaint is not strengthened by the allegations of the answer, we hold it insufficient; and the allegations of the answer, upon careful consideration, weaken, rather than strengthen, plaintiff's pleading. While we find a direct admission in the answer that for four certain months the return to the mining company was less than 70 per cent. of the pulp assay, yet we find the further allegation, "And that while the average for said months was less than 70 per cent., as above specified, yet the returns from all of the ore worked during said months were not less than 70 per cent. of the pulp assay; and that said average was made up in the succeeding months." It thus appears that, while the monthly returns for these four months fell below seventy per cent. of the pulp assay, yet thereafter additional returns came in from the ores milled during these months, which brought the percentage within the stipulations of the contract. For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

ALLISON v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY OF SAN BERNARDINO SCHOOL
DIST. et al. (L. A. 521.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 15, 1899.)

VETERANS—APPOINTMENTS IN PUBLIC SERVICE.

Act March 31, 1891, entitling a veteran of the war of the Rebellion to preference in appointment in the public service, does not entitle a veteran to a writ of mandate compelling a board of education to appoint him as janitor of a school building, where he fails to show that he is the only veteran desirous of the appointment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county.

Proceeding in mandate by H. J. Allison against the board of education of the city of San Bernardino school district and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Rolfe & Rolfe, for appellant. Jas. Hutchings, F. C. Chapman, and J. W. Stephenson, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is a proceeding in mandate to compel the board of education of the city of San Bernardino school district to prefer the plaintiff for appointment and employment as a janitor of the high school building of said city, and to retain and continue him as such, under an act of the legislature, approved March 31, 1891; he being an honorably discharged ex-Union soldier of the war of the Rebellion. This act is entitled "An act to provide for, insure and maintain preference in the appointment, employment and retention in public service and public works of the state of California, of honorably discharged ex-Union soldiers, sailors and marines of the war of the Rebellion." The petitioner was employed for the period of one year as janitor, and a few days prior to the expiration of the term was discharged and another party appointed to the place. After the expiration of the year, he began this proceeding. A demurrer was sustained to the petition, and this appeal was taken from the judgment entered thereon.

Respondents advance many reasons why the action of the trial court should be sustained. We will notice but a single one. The life of petitioner's contract with the board of education having expired before this proceeding was inaugurated, the purpose of the writ can only be to compel his appointment to the position by the board of education. But it appears that no vacancy exists in the position, and therefore the mandate sought must not only order an appointment of petitioner, but must first oust the present incumbent, and thereby create a vacancy. Even assuming that the scope of the writ of mandate may be so broad, still the showing made by the petition is not sufficient. If only a man with the qualifications of petitioner is entitled to the place, and the party filling the place has not those qualifications, still these facts alone do not show a case where petitioner is entitled to the writ. If a man filling the demands set forth in the act of the legislature has the preference, then this petitioner does not show but that there are hundreds of men possessing the qualifications that he possesses who are ready and willing and anxious to be employed as janitor by this board of education. If there be other ex-Union soldiers equally qualified with petitioner, he has no absolute right to the place, and the board cannot be compelled by mandate to appoint him. In other words, he would only be entitled to the writ upon a showing made that he was the only man coming within the provisions of the act who was desirous of the appointment. The petition before us entirely fails to make such a showing. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

HUTCHINSON et al. v. HUTCHINSON.
(S. F. 1,173.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 6, 1899.)

PARENT AND CHILD—ABUSE OF PARENTAL AUTHORITY—EVIDENCE—FINDINGS.

1. On returning after an absence of several months, a father found that his two daughters had, without his authority, drawn his wages and spent them, whereupon he whipped them. The next morning he again whipped them, and kicked one of them, because breakfast was not ready at the usual time. The daughters then ran away, and, after staying at a hotel for one day, were arrested. The father took them home, struck them, and sent them to bed. Shortly afterwards he missed a watch, and, the answers of the girls to his questions concerning it being unsatisfactory, he gave them a severe beating, using a cane and poker. One of the daughters testified that her father knocked her down, kicked her, and punched her in the stomach with his fist. The father admitted that he frequently whipped them with a cat o'nine tails. He had, before they ran away, thrown a teacup at one of them, struck one with a hammer, and on another occasion with a frying pan; his punishment leaving marks on the girls. Held, that the father had abused his parental authority, within Civ. Code, § 203, authorizing the freeing of the child from parental dominion, and compelling support, where a parent abuses his parental authority.

2. A finding that a father has brutally chastised his children, without sufficient cause; that on a certain occasion, believing the children had lied to him, he beat them in a manner wholly unnecessary; and that he had at various times brutally and unnecessarily beaten and otherwise abused them, using his fists, a frying pan, an iron hammer, a cat o'nine tails, etc.,—is not a conclusion of law, but a finding of fact, which warrants a judgment freeing the children from the parental dominion of their father, and requiring him to contribute for their support and education, under Civ. Code, § 203.

3. On an issue whether a father, in punishing his children, abused his parental authority, evidence of particular instances of falsehood and deception, practiced by the children on the father at a time prior to the alleged abuse of parental authority, are inadmissible, where the evidence fully disclosed their conduct at, and immediately preceding, the time in question.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Helen Eleanor Hutchinson and another, infants, by their guardian ad litem, against Joseph W. Hutchinson. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Satterwhite (O. F. Meldon, of counsel), for appellant. Price & Braun, for respondents.

GRAY, C. The respondents are the twin daughters of defendant. Their age at the time of the trial was 16 years. They base this action against their father upon section 203 of the Civil Code, which provides as follows: "The abuse of parental authority is the subject of judicial cognizance in a civil action brought by the child, * * * and when the abuse is established the child may be freed from the dominion of the parent, and the duty of support and education enforced." The judgment is that plaintiffs be freed from the parental dominion of their father, and that he pay to their guardian $25 a month for their support and education. From this judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

The evidence shows that defendant is a hard-working man, a machinist by trade, and as such earns from $60 to $80 a month; that his wife died some 10 years before the trial of this case, and that since her death he has had sole care of plaintiffs, until they ran away from home; that his family of late years has consisted of these two girls and his son Willie, who was some 10 or 12 years of age at the time of the trial; that defendant, by reason of his occupation, was necessarily away from home much of the time. In Deember, 1895, the father was obliged to leave his home in San Francisco, and remain absent from the city for several months. During such absence the daughters drew his wages from his employer, and invested much of them in clothes and theater tickets. When the father returned, and learned of this, he upbraided his daughters, whipped them, and sent them to bed. On the next morning he again whipped them, and kicked one of them, because they did not have breakfast ready at the usual time. They then decided to run away, and hid themselves in the basement of their dwelling, where they staid three days; after which they went to the Orlando House, and, after staying there one night, they were arrested by the police, and taken to the police station, and from there the father took them home, accused them of having men with them at the Orlando House, which they stoutly denied, struck them with his hand, and sent them to bed. A few days after this, in March, 1896, the defendant missed a silver watch, and inquired of the daughters concerning it. Their answers were unsatisfactory to him, whereupon he charged them with lying, and gave them an unmerciful beating, using therein a cane and a poker. The plaintiff Helen testifies that in the course of this beating the defendant took her by the throat and knocked her on the floor, kicked her on the side, and punched her in the stomach with his fist, and left her partially unconscious. The next morning the daughters ran away again, and lived for three weeks thereafter under the stairs leading to an empty house on Folsom street, when they were again taken in charge by the police, and conveyed to the city prison at the New City Hall. The defendant called on them there, and told them he would not take them home again, but would turn them over to the police authorities. Their father now becoming discouraged in his efforts to keep his daughters under control, they were, by his consent, taken to the Hill Home; from which place early in June, 1896, they were taken by their guardian ad litem herein, Mrs. Burnett, to her home on Broadway street, in San Francisco, their father agreeing to pay her $25 a month for their support. From that time down to the commencement of this action, some four months later, the children remained with Mrs. Burnett, to whom they have become much attached, and she desires them to remain with her. She testified that the children are mild mannered and gentle, and seem to be much in fear of their father. The father and daughters have been on friendly terms, and have gone walking together, and have corresponded, and he has visited them since they have been with Mrs. Burnett; but it appears he finally concluded that Mrs. Burnett was trying, in his own language, "to rule over" him in the matter of what the children should wear, and he threatened and intended to take the children away from her, against the will of all concerned except himself. There is also evidence tending to show that a short time prior to the children running away the defendant had thrown a teacup at one of them, and had struck one of them with a hammer, and at another time had thrown a frying pan at one of them; that he frequently whipped them with a leather strap about 18 inches long, an inch wide, slitted at the ends, and denominated a "cat o'nine tails." It also appears from defendant's testimony that this strap had been a cherished instrument of punishment in the family from the infancy of defendant's oldest child, now a young man some 25 or 26 years of age. It further appeared that from the whippings and beatings they received the girls sustained black and blue spots, bruised, swollen, and sore places on their bodies.

On this evidence the court found, as to defendant's treatment of plaintiffs, as follows: "That plaintiffs are mild, gentle, well-behaved, and obedient children. That defendant has not, at all times, treated the plaintiffs herein with the utmost kindness and affection, but, on the contrary, that he has cruelly and brutally chastised them, without sufficient cause, and in a manner wholly unnecessary to the enforcement of proper discipline. That the allegation in defendant's answer that he administered to said plaintiffs moderate and reasonable chastisement, in order to induce them to speak the truth concerning the whereabouts of a certain watch, which he believed them to have stolen, is untrue, but, on the contrary, on this occasion defendant cruelly and brutally kicked and beat said plaintiffs, in a manner wholly unnecessary to attain the ends which he sought. That defendant has abused his parental authority over said children, in this: That at various and numerous times during the months of February and March, 1896, he brutally, cruelly, unnecessarily, and with undue severity, beat, struck, and otherwise abused and maltreated them; that in said maltreatment, beating, and abuse he used his closed fists, a teacup, a frying pan, a strap, a cane, an iron hammer, an iron stove poker, and a cat o' nine tails."

It is argued on this appeal that the findings do not support the judgment; that there is no finding of facts as to the abuse of parental authority; and that the evidence does not support the findings. The judge of the trial court had all the parties interested before him, and was in a much better position than this court can be to judge, not only of the weight that should be given to the testimony of each of them, but also as to their character and disposition in other respects pertinent to the case. The first consideration of the trial court in a case of this character is, or should be, the welfare of the children. The statute upon which the action is based is enacted for the benefit and protection of children. The circumstances of the case, as developed by the evidence, were amply sufficient to convince the trial judge that the father had lost the confidence of his children, and with it the power to personally control them; for he admits that he despaired of controlling them further after they ran away the second time. This condition of affairs was undoubtedly the result of his harsh treatment of them. We deem it unwise for a father to attempt to control his daughters, of the age of 16 years, with a "strap slitted at the end," to say nothing of the frying pan and other instruments mentioned in the evidence; and when such an attempt results in a double failure, and the father thereafter seeks, against their will, to remove his daughters from the care of a woman who seems able to control them, without any showing that he has any other place for them, the trial court is fully warranted in the conclusion that such acts are an abuse of parental authority. The case made by the evidence is one which addresses itself peculiarly to the sound judgment and wise discretion of the trial court.

The findings of fact set out herein were not mere conclusions of law, as contended, but were amply sufficient, on the question of "abuse of parental authority," to support the judgment, and this is the only respect in which the sufficiency of the findings is challenged.

We see no error in the court refusing to allow defendant to prove particular instances of falsehood and deception practiced by plaintiffs prior to January, 1896. The court was fully enlightened as to their traits of character and disposition in that regard by the evidence as to their conduct more immediately preceding their running away from home. Seeing no reason to disturb the decision as it stands, and believing that the best welfare of plaintiffs is subserved thereby, I advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

LYNCH v. PEARSON. (S. F. 959.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1899.)
USE AND OCCUPATION—AGREEMENT OF SALE.

The doctrine that one who enters on premises, under an agreement or understanding that he is to be a purchaser, is not afterwards liable in an action for use and occupation, has no application where the entry is made under the owner, and the agreement of sale, which is afterwards rescinded, is with a mortgagee, whose title is acquired in subsequent foreclosure proceedings.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county.

Action by William Lynch against Calvin Pearson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. E. Church, for appellant. Frank H. Short, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Action to recover for use and occupation of premises. Judgment for plaintiff for $360. Motion for a new trial, which was denied. This appeal is from the judgment and order. The court below filed findings, and in the brief of the appellant no finding is attacked for insufficiency of the evidence, and we will therefore take the facts as found by the court below and as admitted by the pleadings. On December 14, 1892, defendant was living upon the premises described in the amended complaint, with his father, who was the owner thereof. Plaintiff was on said day the owner of a note secured by mortgage upon said premises. While defendant was so living upon said premises, and while plaintiff was so the owner of said note and mortgage, and on said 14th day of December, 1892, defendant and plaintiff entered into an agreement whereby plaintiff agreed to foreclose his said mortgage, and to bid in the lands therein described, and upon receipt of a sheriff's deed to execute to defendant a deed to said premises, subject to a certain prior mortgage held by one Gray, and to take and receive from defendant his note and mortgage for the amount due the plaintiff on such foreclosure proceedings; and in consideration thereof the defendant agreed to pay the costs and attorney's fees in the foreclosure proceedings. According to the agreement, plaintiff proceeded to foreclose the said mortgage, and on the 24th day of April, 1893, purchased the same at sheriff's sale, and received the usual certificate. Defendant was in possession of the premises at the time he made the said agreement, and never entered into possession thereof through or under plaintiff. After the plaintiff began foreclosure proceedings, and as necessary costs and attorney's fees in connection therewith, he paid the sum of $192.50, of which sum defendant paid $140 only. About October 1, 1893, the defendant and plaintiff rescinded the former agreement of December 14, 1892, and mutually released each other from the obligations thereof. After April 24, up to October 24, 1893, the defendant continued in the possession of the premises, and received the rents, issues, and profits thereof, and the value of such use and occupation during such time, to wit, from April 24 to October 24, 1893, was the sum of $500. There was not at any time any agreement between plaintiff and defendant as to the payment of rent, and the plaintiff never released the defendant from any obligation to pay rent. At the time the agreement of December 14, 1892, was made, the plaintiff had no title to the premises therein referred to, and defendant never entered into possession under said agreement. The court below deducted the sum of $140, which had been paid by defendant to plaintiff under the agreement of December 14, 1892, from the value of the use and occupation, and gave judgment for $360, and we think the judgment is correct. It gave the defendant the benefit of the $140 which he had paid on the contract that had been canceled; and while, perhaps, the law in its strict construction would not have compelled it to be so applied, the court, in a spirit of equity, did so apply it. Appellant contends that the doctrine of vendor and vendee applied as between the plaintiff and defendant after December 14, 1892. It is the general doctrine that one who enters by virtue of an agreement or understanding that he was to be a purchaser is not afterwards liable in an action for use and occupation, but the doctrine does not apply to defendant in the case, for the reason that he did not enter under a contract with plaintiff. On December 14, 1892, defendant was already in possession of the premises by permission of his father, who was the owner of them. Plaintiff was not the owner, nor entitled to the possession, and hence had no power to put defendant in possession. The defendant testified that, after making the agreement with plaintiff, he leased the premises of his father. The agreement made with plaintiff was in fact an agreement by which the plaintiff was to take legal proceedings, and thus attempt to get the title. The defendant agreed to pay the cost of such legal proceedings, and plaintiff, if successful in getting the title, was then to convey to defendant on certain terms specified. Before the defendant had paid all the costs of such proceedings, and before the title had passed to plaintiff, the contract was rescinded by mutual consent. Plaintiff was the purchaser of the property at foreclosure sale. It was never redeemed. Defendant was the tenant in possession at the time of the sale, and so continued until the time for redemption expired. The value of the use and occupation was $500. These facts entitled the plaintiff to judgment. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

McKAY v. McKAY. (S. F. 1,059.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. June 14, 1899.)

DIVORCE—JURISDICTION TO MODIFY DECREE—SUPPORT OF CHILDREN—EFFECT OF DECREE ON FATHER'S LIABILITY.

1. Under Civ. Code, §§ 138, 139, providing that the court may, before or after judgment, give directions for the custody of the children, and, when the divorce is granted for the husband's offense, compel him to provide for their maintenance, and may from time to time modify its orders, where the original decree, granted for the husband's fault, awarded the custody of the children to the mother, but made no provision for their maintenance, the court cannot thereafter modify the decree, and compel the husband to pay for their past or future maintenance.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 209, providing that, "if the husband receives his wife's children by a former husband into his family and supports them, it is presumed he does so as a parent," a divorced father of children in the lawful custody of their mother is not liable for their support in the family of her second husband.

3. Under Civ. Code, § 138, providing that "the court may before or after judgment give such direction for the custody, care and education of the children as may be necessary," where children in the lawful custody of their divorced mother have been supported by the voluntary act of herself or her second husband their father cannot be compelled to pay therefor.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Petition by Emma J. McKay against Angus McKay for an order requiring him to pay for the past support of children awarded to her custody by a divorce decree. From an order granting the petition, the defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. S. Goodfellow, for appellant. E. P. Cole, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. A decree of divorce was rendered May 29, 1884, between the parties hereto, upon the application of the plaintiff, and for the offense of the defendant; and by the decree the care, custody, and control of the two minor children of the marriage, then aged 5 and 3 years, respectively, were awarded to the plaintiff. No provision was made in the decree for the maintenance of the children, or for the support of the wife. In 1886 the plaintiff became the wife of R. S. Polastri, and thereupon her husband took the children into his family, and subsequently brought them up and supported them as members thereof. March 2, 1897, the plaintiff filed in said cause a petition to the superior court for an order requiring the defendant to pay certain moneys for the past support of each of said children, and also for their future maintenance and education. After a hearing thereon, the court made an order requiring the defendant to "pay to the plaintiff the sum of three thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars for the past care, maintenance, education, and support of said minor children, and also the further sum of one hundred dollars a month until the further order of the court for the future support, education, and maintenance of said minor children." From this order the defendant has appealed.

1. Whether the court was authorized to modify the judgment entered in 1884 by adding thereto the provision requiring the defendant to provide for the care, custody, and education of the children, is to be determined by a construction of the provisions of the Code upon this subject. In jurisdictions where procedure is not regulated by statute, but is according to the rules and practice of the court, such authority is maintained upon the ground that, when chancery has once acquired jurisdiction over the subject-matter, it will continue to exercise that jurisdiction so long and as often as occasion shall require, for the purpose of making its decree effec-

Kamp*, 59 N. Y. 212. In a majority of the states, however, express authority is given to the court by statute to make changes in its judgments from time to time as circumstances may justify. See Buckminster v. Buckminster, 38 Vt. 248; Campbell v. Campbell, 37 Wis. 206. But the changes which may thus be made are limited to the cases and conditions expressed in the statute by which they are authorized. In Erkenbrach v. Erkenbrach, 96 N. Y. 456, after holding that this authority in that state is purely statutory, the court said: "The statute carefully defines the various causes for which a divorce may be allowed, the relief which may be granted in such actions during the pendency thereof, and by its final decree, and the cases in which the courts may make further orders. The legislature has assumed to legislate upon the subject, and has defined the purposes for which an order may be made by the courts after final decree. By expressly authorizing an order to be made after judgment providing only for the 'care, custody and education of the children of the marriage,' it has impliedly prohibited such an order for any other cause." To the same effect is the provision of section 4 of the Civil Code of this state, which declares, "The Code establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates." The Codes, however, are to be construed as a single statute; and upon this subject section 577, Code Civ. Proc., must be read in connection with sections 138 and 139 of the Civil Code. These sections are as follows:

"Sec. 138. In an action for divorce the court may before or after judgment give such direction for the custody, care and education of the children of the marriage as may seem necessary or proper, and may at any time vacate or modify the same.

"Sec. 139. Where a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband, the court may compel him to provide for the maintenance of the children of the marriage, and to make such suitable allowance to the wife for her support during her life, or for a shorter period, as the court may deem just, having regard to the circumstances of the parties respectively; and the court may from time to time modify its orders in these respects."

In Howell v. Howell, 104 Cal. 45, 37 Pac.

770, it was held that, when the original decree of divorce made no provision for an allowance to the wife for her support, the court had no jurisdiction thereafter to make an order compelling the husband to pay alimony to her; that, if no order for its payment was included in the decree of divorce, there was nothing to "modify"; and that such subsequent order was void. Under the reasoning in that case it must be held that, by the failure to make provision in the decree for the maintenance of the children, the court had no authority under this section to make the order appealed from. The decision in Wilson v. Wilson, 45 Cal. 399, cited by the respondent, was made prior to the adoption of the Codes, and under a statute which expressly authorized the court to make an order subsequent to the judgment for the maintenance of the children of the marriage (St. 1851, p. 187, § 7), but cannot be regarded as an authority under the different provisions of the Code. Whether the court has power under section 138, Civ. Code, to make such subsequent order for the "care, custody and education" of the children, was not involved in the case of Howell v. Howell, and was expressly stated in the opinion therein not to have been considered. The statutes of New York (2 Rev. St. p. 148, § 59) contain provisions similar to those of section 138, Civ. Code; and in Erkenbrach v. Erkenbrach, supra, it was held by the court of appeals of that state, in construing this section of the statute, that as it authorized the court to make an order after judgment for the "care, custody and education" of the children of the marriage, it must be assumed that provision for the expenses reasonably to be incurred for the accomplishment of these objects was within the intention of the legislature in framing the section. This ruling was followed in McKay v. Superior Court, 120 Cal. 143, 52 Pac. 147, wherein it was determined that under the provisions of section 138, Civ. Code, the superior court had jurisdiction to entertain the application of the plaintiff, and to make an order thereon.

2. McKay v. Superior Court was an original application to this court for a writ of review, and the only question presented for consideration was the jurisdiction or power of the court to make the order; but whether the facts before the court justified it in the exercise of this power, or whether the order was broader in its scope than was justified by the evidence provided therefor, was not involved or presented for consideration. These questions are presented upon the present appeal, and, upon an examination of the evidence before the superior court, we are of the opinion that it was not authorized to include in its order any direction for the payment by the defendant of the expenses incurred prior to making the application. It clearly appears from the bill of exceptions that Mr. Polastri immediately upon his marriage with the plaintiff took the children into his family, and that since that time he has cared for them, and paid all the expenses of their support and education; and the plaintiff testified that, so far as any compensation for past support is concerned, it would be to recompense Mr. Polastri for moneys that he has spent upon these children. Section 209, Civ. Code, provides: "The husband is not bound to maintain his wife's children by a former husband; but, if he receives them into his family and supports them, it is presumed that he does so as a parent; and where such is the case they are not liable to him for their support, nor he to them for their services." The plaintiff does not claim to have expended any money in the support or education of the children, other than that expended by Mr. Polastri, and under the provisions of this section he could have no claim upon the defendant for his support of the children. The provisions of section 138 cannot be made a substitute for an action, or give to him the right to assert through the plaintiff a claim which he could not himself make. Johnson v. Onsted, 74 Mich. 437, 42 N. W. 62. The provisions of section 138 are in their nature prospective, and the use of the term "direction" instead of "payment" implies that the action of the court is to be limited to the "care, custody and education" which the children are subsequently to receive under its directions. If the original decree had contained a provision upon this subject, such provision would have been the measure of the rights and liabilities of the parties to the suit, until the court should make some modification thereof; and, until the court had given some direction for the subsequent care and education of the children, there could be no liability on the part of the defendant for the expenses that might be incurred thereunder. Manifestly the court could give no direction for the care and education of the children prior to its order, and, in the absence of such direction, no liability would exist against the defendant, and no obligation could be created against him. In Kendall v. Kendall (Kan.) 48 Pac. 940, the minor children had been awarded to the mother, but no provision was made in the decree for their support. Subsequently, upon the application of the mother, the court directed the payment of a certain sum by the father for their support, and that this payment should commence at the date of the original decree. Upon appeal this portion of the order was reversed, and the court directed that the payments should commence at the date of the modification of the order, and not from the date of the original decree. In Washburn v. Catlin, 97 N. Y. 623, the general term had made an order requiring the defendant to pay the expenses incurred during the previous nine years, but the court of appeals modified this order by restricting such payment to the expenses incurred subsequent to filing the petition. The question of the father's liability for the care and support of his children after a decree of divorce, in which their custody has been awarded to the mother, has been frequently presented in actions brought therefor by strangers or by the mother, and courts have almost invariably held that an action against him to enforce such liability could not be maintained. Finch v. Finch, 22 Conn. 411; Ramsey v. Ramsey, 121 Ind. 215, 23 N. E. 69; Burritt v. Burritt, 29 Barb. 124; Harris v. Harris, 5 Kan. 46; Hancock v. Merrick, 10 Cush. 41; Brown v. Smith, 19 R. I. 319, 33 Atl. 466; Hall v. Green, 87 Me. 122, 32 Atl. 796. A contrary holding was made in Pretzinger v. Pretzinger, 45 Ohio St. 452, 15 N. E. 471; but as was said in Brown v. Smith, supra, this case is opposed to the preponderance of American authorities upon the subject, and in a subsequent case in the same state (Fulton v. Fulton, 52 Ohio St. 229, 39 N. E. 727), the ruling therein was materially modified. So far as the right of the wife to recover for past expenses incurred by her is involved, the principle is the same, whether the application is made in an independent action, or through a motion in the original case. The jurisdiction which the court retains in the original case, either by express reservation in its decree, or which it has by authority of statute, to modify its judgment with reference to the custody and education of the children, or to make a new order in reference thereto, is not for the purpose of reimbursing her for any expenditures she may have voluntarily made in that behalf, but to provide for such expenses as may be subsequently incurred by reason of the direction that may be given regarding such care and education. The children are not parties to the litigation, and the jurisdiction thus retained, or which the court is authorized to exercise, is to be exercised in their behalf; but, if they have already been sufficiently cared for by the voluntary act of the mother or of strangers, the court is not empowered to compel the father to reimburse them for these expenses. See Loveren v. Loveren, 100 Cal. 493, 35 Pac. 87; Lacey v. Lacey, 108 Cal. 45, 40 Pac. 1056. Section 208, Civ. Code, declares that "a parent is not bound to compensate the other parent or a relative for the voluntary support of his child, without an agreement for compensation." The order is reversed, and the superior court is directed to make such order in the premises as will be consistent with the views herein expressed.

JOHNSON v. REED et al. (Sac. 539.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1899.)

JUDGMENTS—COLLATERAL ATTACK—MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURES—FRAUD.

1. The correctness of a judgment cannot be reviewed in an independent action on grounds available in the original action, which the party has sought to have reviewed by a motion for a new trial.

2. A judgment for plaintiff in a foreclosure suit is conclusive as against a collateral attack on the ground that the action was prematurely brought.

3. The fact that a third person induces the mortgagee to foreclose, though the former seeks to profit thereby by purchasing the property, is not a fraud on the mortgagor, so as to make such third person liable to him.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Butte county.

Action by one Johnson against one Reed and others to vacate a judgment of foreclosure and to cancel the execution deed. From a judgment for defendant Brooks, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. H. Maxwell and R. M. F. Soto, for appellant. L. L. Solomons, for respondent and defendants.

HARRISON, J. It is alleged in the complaint herein that in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage executed by the plaintiff to the defendant Brooks the defendants filed an answer setting up as a defense that the action was prematurely brought by reason of the fact that the time for the payment of the note secured by the mortgage had been extended to a date subsequent to the commencement of the action; that the cause was tried, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff therein; that thereafter the plaintiff herein filed and served a notice of his intention to move for a new trial, and that a bill of exceptions based upon said notice had been settled, allowed, and filed in said action, and that an affidavit to be used on said motion had also been filed; that under said judgment the property described in the mortgage had been sold to the mortgagee, and a deed therefor executed to him; that, the proceeds of said sale being insufficient to satisfy the judgment, a judgment for the deficiency had been docketed against the plaintiff herein, and that an execution had been issued upon said deficiency judgment, and certain personal property sold by virtue thereof to one of the defendants herein. The complaint further alleges that prior to the commencement of said action the defendant, Charles W. Reed, induced the mortgagee to violate his agreement for the extension of payment and to commence the action for foreclosure before the said period of extension had expired, and agree with him that the said action should be prosecuted to final judgment and a sale thereunder, and that the property should be thereafter sold and transferred to him, the said Reed; that the mortgaged property was of much greater value than the amount of the mortgage debt, but that it was also agreed between them that upon the sale under the judgment a deficiency should be left, and that an execution should be issued upon said deficiency judgment, and certain personal property of the plaintiff herein sold thereunder; that the said agreement was carried into effect, and that all of the proceedings were had with the fraudulent purpose and design of said Reed to defraud the plaintiff of his interest in the mortgaged property. Plaintiff therefore asks a judgment vacating the judgment of foreclosure, and canceling and annulling the deed issued under the sale upon said judgment, and allowing him to redeem the property, and setting aside the sale of the personal property, and restoring him to the possession thereof. The defendant Brooks, who appears to be the only person served with the complaint, demurred thereto, and, his demurrer having been sustained, judgment was entered in his favor, from which the plaintiff has appealed.

1. It is not alleged in the complaint whether the motion for a new trial in the original action has been determined or not. In the absence of any averment upon the subject, it must be assumed that the motion is still pending and undetermined. The fact, as averred in the complaint, that one of the defendants therein had changed its attorneys, and that such attorneys had abandoned all the rights of that defendant upon the motion for a new trial, did not preclude the plaintiff herein from prosecuting his own motion therefor, or from appealing from the judgment therein. As all the facts upon which the plaintiff claims that the judgment of the court was unauthorized were set up in his answer to the foreclosure suit, it must be assumed that the court found that they were unsustained by the evidence. If such was not the fact, or if the judgment therein was rendered by reason of any error or irregularity in the procedure, such error must be cured through the proceedings for a new trial. If, however, it be the fact that that court has denied his motion for a new trial, the plaintiff must seek a review of that order by an appeal therefrom. The correctness of a judgment cannot be reviewed in an independent action upon grounds which were available to the litigant in the original action, and upon which he has sought to have it reviewed by a motion therein.

2. As the court, by giving judgment for the plaintiff in the foreclosure suit, must have found that the action was not prematurely brought, it is evident that the mortgagee, in bringing the action after the maturity of the obligation, was in the exercise of his legal rights, and that the action of Mr. Reed in inducing him to bring the suit was not with any fraudulent purpose, however much he may have sought to profit thereby. It may be added that the allegations in the complaint fail to establish any fraudulent purpose or conduct on the part of Mr. Reed. No fact is alleged which, either by itself or in connection with the other portions of the complaint, constitute a sufficient averment of fraud. The appeal herein is without merit, and the judgment is affirmed.

SONOMA COUNTY v. STOFEN et al.
(S. F. 1,160.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1899.)

OFFICERS—CONVERSION OF FUNDS—ROBBERY—EVIDENCE—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

1. In an action on a county treasurer's bond for conversion of funds, to prove a defense of robbery the treasurer testified that in the morning, as he drew out the money trays, he was confronted by a man with an uplifted dagger, who ordered him to drop them; that this was the last he knew; that he felt no blow, but presumed he was struck, as there was a lump and a discoloration of skin on the back of his head; that, when he came to, he was in the vault, lying on his back, with his head under the opening of the door; that he remained there about eight hours, and from time to time kicked on the door with all his might, but did not strike the sheet-iron lining of the vault. His wife testified that she became alarmed at his absence in the afternoon, and got the court-house janitor to unlock the office; that two others were with her when she approached the vault door, but she was excited, and did not at first succeed with the combination, though she knew it; that, when she got the outer door open, she had to unlock the inner door, the key of which on the bunch of defendant's keys was in the lock; that, opening the door, her husband was found dazed and weak, and had a bruise and swelling on the back of his head. The two witnesses with her could not testify whether the inner door was locked or not, or whether she actually unlocked it. They testified to the distressed condition of defendant when released, but neither observed any injuries on him. Held that, though this evidence was uncontradicted, that the alleged robbers committed the deed on a business day, in a building containing the county officers; locked defendant in the vault; escaped with their plunder without leaving the slightest trace of their identity or whereabouts; that it was but a few days before the expiration of defendant's term, when he must account for the county funds; that a blow on the sheet-iron sides of the vault would produce a sound like a bass drum, that could be heard throughout the building, but defendant, though knowing of this, struck no such blow, and his blows on the door were not heard, though he testified he heard footsteps in the outer office; and that the vault was not shown to be locked, though it appeared to be, and was assumed to be by the rescuers,—created such suspicious circumstances as justified the jury in ignoring defendant's uncontradicted evidence.

2. Experimental evidence of the effect of kicking on the vault doors was competent in corroboration or disproof of defendant's assertion that he attempted to attract attention in this way, though neither the atmospheric conditions nor the arrangement of the building were exactly the same.

3. The effect of striking the sheet-iron sides of the vault was also competent, since it was a fair inference that if his story was true, and knowing the effect of such a blow, he would certainly have tried to attract attention in that way.

4. Evidence of an employé of the building that he saw a man with a grip leave the treasurer's office about the time of the alleged robbery, which he reported to defendant, but which defendant paid little attention to, because witness told him that a placard on the door announced the treasurer's absence on that day, was not newly discovered, simply because after the trial witness deposed he might have been mistaken about the placard.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county.

Action by Sonoma county against Peter N. Stofen and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. R. Leppo, for appellant Stofen. E. C. Barham and J. A. Barham, for other appellants. Emmett Seawell, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action brought by the county of Sonoma against Stofen, ex-treasurer of the county, and against his bondsmen, to recover the sum of $7,815.79, alleged to have been converted by Stofen while he was treasurer. The defendants denied the conversion, and set up as a defense that Stofen had been robbed of the money. Judgment passed for plaintiff, and defendants moved for a new trial. Upon denial of their motion, they appealed both from that order and from the judgment.

It is strenuously insisted that the uncontradicted evidence in this case establishes a robbery. The account of the affair given by the defendant Stofen is as follows: Upon the morning of the 28th day of December, a Friday morning, he had gone to his office in the county court house, in the city of Santa Rosa. He entered his office at about the usual hour, at 9 o'clock, or a few minutes thereafter. He opened the outer and inner doors of the vault in his office, and proceeded to take out the drawers or money trays for use in his daily business. Turning round with a tray in each hand, he confronted a man with an uplifted dagger, who ordered him to drop the trays. "This is the last that I knew. I felt no blow, and did not see him strike me, but I presume, as I put down the money, he struck me on the back of the head, because that is where I had a lump and discoloration of the skin. That is the last I knew until I came to in the vault, and I was lying on my back, with my head right under the opening of the vault door. The first thing that I realized after I came to, I raised up and bumped my forehead again on the metal. That threw my head back again on the floor, and I felt up around, and I felt the safe floor. Then I comprehended for the first time where I was. I remained in the vault until I was taken out by my wife. They said it was about half past 4 in the afternoon of the same day." He further testified that the money, which was in its proper place at the time he entered the vault in the morning, was taken. From time to time during his imprisonment in the vault he kicked upon the door with all his might, "and that made a great racket." Mrs. Stofen, wife of the defendant, testified that in the afternoon of that day, visiting the court house in search of her husband, she became alarmed at his absence. She procured the janitor to unlock the outer door of her husband's office, and entered the room with one or two others. She saw her husband's overcoat and hat on the desk, and became greatly excited. She thought she heard a noise in the other room, which was the room containing the vault, and Judge Moore said, "He is in the vault." She hurried to the vault door, and tried the combination, which she knew, but, being excited, she did not succeed the first time in opening the door. Judge Moore stood by her, endeavoring to calm her, and in time she succeeded in opening the outer door. Then she had to unlock the inner sheet-iron door, which was locked. The key of this door, upon the bunch of defendant's keys, was in the lock. Opening the door, her husband was found dazed and weak. There was an injury, a bruise upon the back of his head, a swelling and discoloration. J. H. Wise and A. P. Moore accompanied Mrs. Stofen when she unlocked the vault. Their testimony corroborated hers, saying that Wise says he could not say whether Mrs. Stofen actually unlocked the inner door or not, or whether the inner door was locked or not. Moore could not testify whether the inner door was locked or not. He states that as they were going from the front room to the inner room Mrs. Stofen, who was very much excited, exclaimed: "Oh, they have locked my husband up!" These two witnesses both agreed in their account of the distressed condition of Stofen when released from the vault, but neither observed any injuries to his person. This account of the robbery stands uncontradicted and unimpeached by any direct evidence in the case. So much must be conceded, and, under this concession, appellants contend that the decision is unsupported by the evidence. But, while it is true that uncontradicted evidence of a positive fact must generally be controlling, there are exceptional cases in which the jury or the judge as a trier of the facts is held justified in rejecting uncontradicted evidence, even the most positive. In Quock Ting v. U. S., 140 U. S. 417, 11 Sup. Ct. 733, 851, Mr. Justice Field uses this language: "Undoubtedly, as a general rule, positive testimony as to a particular fact, uncontradicted by any one, should control the decision of the court; but that rule admits of many exceptions. There may be such an inherent improbability in the statements of a witness as to induce the court or jury to disregard his evidence, even in the absence of any direct conflicting testimony. He may be contradicted by the facts he states as completely as by direct adverse testimony, and there may be so many omissions in his own account of particular transactions, or of his own conduct, as to discredit his whole story. His manner, too, of testifying may give rise to doubts of his sincerity, and create the impression that he is giving a wrong coloring to material facts. All these things may properly be considered in determining the weight which should be given to his statement, although there be no adverse verbal testimony adduced." To like effect are the cases of Blankman v. Vallejo, 15 Cal. 339, and People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 171, 54 Pac. 833.

Are any of these elements of doubt or suspicion present in this case, and, if so, are they sufficient to have warranted the court in finding against the defense of robbery? In this, as in all such cases where the question has arisen, the offered evidence is the evidence of a person directly interested in the outcome of the litigation. This fact itself is a circumstance of importance in weighing the testimony given. With the manner of a witness upon the stand, and with his deportment under examination, circumstances which have always been recognized as affecting one way or the other the credibility of his testimony, this court can have nothing to do; but, when the matter of defendant's testimony is considered and analyzed, it will certainly be shown to present features of suspicion and doubt. To begin with, it is extraordinary that in the city of Santa Rosa, upon the morning of a business day, one or more robbers could have thus assaulted the treasurer in a public building containing the courts and offices of the county officers, have robbed him, have locked him in the vault, and have escaped with their plunder without leaving the slightest clew to, or trace of, their identity or whereabouts. Again, the robbery took place but a few days before the expiration of the defendant Stofen's term of office, and consequently but a few days before it was necessary for him to turn over the county funds to his successor. This is but a circumstance, and nothing more, but it certainly gives room for suspicion that this extraordinary robbery should have taken place at so opportune or inopportune a time. Moreover, the vault in which the treasurer was locked was incased upon three sides with sheet iron, the fourth side being the iron door. These facts were well known to Stofen. A blow upon the sheet iron produces a loud, resonant sound, like that of a bass drum, and can be heard for considerable distances throughout the building. Yet Stofen, by his own testimony, although he could hear sounds which he thought were steps in the corridor outside, never struck the sheet-iron walls of his prison. He did kick upon the iron door many times, he says, but there is upon this point at least negative testimony of the other occupants of the building that they never heard or noticed any such sound. Again, if it were established that Stofen was found locked in the vault, and that he could not so have locked himself therein, it would tend very strongly to corroborate his account of the robbery, for there is not the slightest pretense that there was any one in Santa Rosa upon that morning to act as his confederate; but upon this it is shown that the bolts of both doors to the vault may be shot in place by any one who is inside, and, while the shooting of the bolts does not lock the doors in the sense that the combination must be employed upon the one and the key upon the other to open them, yet it creates the appearance of their being locked. Mrs. Stofen and those who were with her assumed that the outer door of the vault was locked. The first time she essayed the combination she failed, and this of course actually set the lock. As to the inner door in which the bunch of keys was found, she testified that she unlocked it. She herself was under great excitement, and may have been mistaken. Certainly she was not a wholly disinterested witness, and neither of the two who accompanied her testified to the unlocking of this inner door.

It is the law of this state that robbery is a defense to an action for the recovery of public moneys. City of Healdsburg v. Mulligan, 113 Cal. 205, 45 Pac. 325. The evidence of one witness entitled to full credit is sufficient to prove the robbery. Code Civ. Proc. § 1844. But the evidence of a defendant so situated does not, as a matter of legal compulsion, command this full credit. Robbery is a defense which may be easily simulated, and the temptation to do so must needs be strong upon one who has misappropriated trust funds. In consideration of these facts, it is not insisting upon too much to say that the defense must be satisfactorily established. If it be an honest defense, this, in the great majority of instances, can readily be done. If exceptional cases shall arise where the defense is rightful, yet conviction of its truth is not brought home by the evidence, it must be remembered that the imperfect machinery of the law cannot always measure out perfect justice, and that public policy forbids putting a premium upon speculation by permitting this facile defense to be too lightly established. We think it unnecessary to enlarge further upon the question. What has been said is not designed as expressing this court's opinion of the evidence, but it is in illustration of the fact that the trial judge, who rejected the evidence of the robbery because of the circumstances of doubt and suspicion attending the account of it, was, under the exceptional features of this case, justified in so doing, and that his finding in this regard cannot here be disturbed.

Defendant Stofen testified that, while in the vault, he kicked many times upon the inner door with the heels of his boots, and that "it made a great racket." He further testified that he did not kick or strike upon the sheet-iron lining of the sides of the vault. He knew its general construction, and that there was a hollow space, several inches in diameter, between the sheet iron and the brick outer wall. Evidence was offered and admitted touching experiments made by striking with clenched hands and books of account upon the sheet-iron sides, and also of experiments made by striking or kicking upon the inner door. Witnesses stationed in different parts of the building testified to hearing the sounds of these blows, and that those from the blows upon the sheet-iron sides were much louder than those from the blows upon the door. The admission of this evidence is urged as error, because the atmospheric and climatic conditions are not shown to have been the same upon the two days. The condition of the court house was shown to have been different by the removal of one door between the treasurer's and sheriff's offices, and the replacing of the wooden panels in the upper portions of the other doors with glass; further, that it was not and could not be shown that in any blows struck by the experimenters they used the same amount of force as that employed by Stofen; and, finally, as to the blows upon the sheet-iron walls, that the evidence was pertinent to nothing in the case, for Stofen positively testified that he did not strike upon these walls at all. Experimental evidence in corroboration or disproof depends for its value upon the fact that the experiment has been made when the conditions affecting the result are, as near as may be, identical with those existing at the time of and operating to produce the particular effect. An absolute identity is, of course, impossible; but a substantial identity must exist to give the evidence value. But this identity need not extend to nor be shown to exist as to conditions which could have had no casual operation upon the result. Thus, if a witness testified that at a given distance he had heard a gunshot, before experimental evidence in disproof could be admissible it might properly be required to be shown that the force and direction of the wind were the same upon both days. If the question were upon the stopping of a car within a specified distance by the use of a given brake, experimental evidence would be valueless, unless it were shown that the experiment was made under like conditions as to the car, the brake, the amount of force used to set it, and the state of the track. If a witness should testify that from a specified spot he saw a certain act, evidence that he could not have seen from that spot, because of an intervening building, would be worthless, unless it were also shown that the building was there at the time of the occurrence. So indefinitely might illustrations be multiplied, but, upon the other hand, it would be entirely immaterial in the instance last given whether the wind was blowing three or thirty miles an hour in one direction or another, while these would constitute most pregnant circumstances in determining how far a gunshot could be heard. So, in experimenting with the car brake, it might be of no consequence whether it was done by day or by night; but, to test the vision of a witness, obviously similar conditions of light would be most material. The experiments here made went to the volume of sound and the distance of its audibility. It is not apparent nor is it shown that different atmospheric conditions or the structural changes in the building would have materially affected the result, and as to the force used the experimenter testified that he employed moderate force, while Stofen testified that he kicked with all his might. The witnesses stationed about the building agreed substantially in their accounts, the differences being such as would naturally be expected from their varying distances from the origin of the sound. The blows upon the door could be heard distinctly, but were not such as would have been likely to attract attention. The blows upon the walls were loud and resonant, like the beating of a bass drum or the pounding of an iron boiler. The evidence as to the blows upon the door was admissible as experimental evidence. It was of little value, assuredly, since in the one case the witnesses stood with attentive ears to catch the expected sounds, while in the other case there was nothing to attract their particular attention. The admissibility of the evidence of the blows upon the wall rests upon a somewhat different ground. It was a matter of fair argument that, if his story were true, Stofen would have used every means to escape from confinement, and would have given an alarm; that, with his knowledge of the vault and of its construction, he would have pounded upon that part of it which naturally would have given out the greatest noise. It was permissible to support this argument by proof of the fact that, if he had done so, the alarm would certainly have been heard, and his prompt release would have been assured. That he did not do so certainly gives basis to an argument against the probability of his story, for it is to be remembered that according to that story he was incarcerated for nearly eight hours, and that he never struck upon the sheet-iron walls, and yet within his prison he could occasionally hear the footsteps of those passing outside.

In support of their application for a new trial, upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence, defendants presented the affidavit of one George E. Perry. Perry's affidavit is to the effect that upon the day of the alleged robbery he was in charge of the steam engine and heating apparatus in the Santa Rosa court house, during the temporary absence of his brother, who was the regular engineer in charge. In accordance with his practice, he made a tour of inspection of the offices in the building to note their temperature and observe whether or not the heater was performing its work. Upon this particular morning, at a few minutes after 9 o'clock, as he approached the door of the treasurer's office, the door opened, and a man stepped out carrying a leather valise in his right hand. His appearance surprised the affiant, who thought that the treasurer was out of town. He stopped in front of the man, and asked if the treasurer was in his office, to which the man replied, "Yes," and hurried on. He tried one of the doors of the office, and found it locked. He passed on to the other door, and found that also locked. He then concluded that the man had misunderstood his question, and had thought that he had inquired if that were the treasurer's office, and so attached no significance to the matter until the evening of that day, when he learned that the treasurer's office had been robbed. He further deposed that in July or October, 1896, he related these facts to the defendant Stofen, but also stated to him that, in attempting to open the side door, he noticed upon it a placard stating that the treasurer was absent or out of town, and that at the time he so stated he believed that such was the fact, but "I may be mistaken, and I now believe that I am." After he had told Stofen about the placard, Stofen seemed to take less interest in his narration. Aside from the rigorous scrutiny, amounting to suspicion, with which newly-discovered evidence, such as this, should be regarded, the court was justified in refusing to grant a new trial, because in fact it was not newly-discovered evidence. Affiant's statement is that he informed Stofen of these facts while this very action was pending. It was evidence of the highest importance to the defense to show that a man with a valise in his hand was seen coming out of the treasurer's office upon the morning of the day of the alleged robbery, and at the time of day which Stofen fixes as the hour of its commission, regardless of the question as to whether or not there was a placard upon one of the doors stating that the treasurer was out of town. Aside from the dubious circumstance that the affiant declares that his present belief is that he was mistaken as to the placard, even if he had adhered to his first story in this regard, the evidence would still have been of vital moment. It is conceivable that the robber himself might have placed such a placard upon the door to avert inquiry. But, whatever may be the truth as to all these matters, the fact is that knowledge of this evidence was in the possession of the defendant while his case was pending, and he did not see fit to avail himself of it. The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

DAVIS et al. v. HURGREN et al. (S. F. 1,063.)

COUNTERCLAIM — ACTION ON CONTRACT — COSTS—PARTIES—NEW TRIAL—NOTICE—FILING.

1. An action for damages for the breach of a contract to deliver goods is an action arising on contract, within Code Civ. Proc. § 438, subd. 2, authorizing the pleading of a counterclaim arising on an independent contract in such action.

2. Defendant is entitled to costs as of course, where he recovers $1 on a counterclaim interposed to a complaint for over $300, on which plaintiff recovers nothing, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, giving plaintiff costs as of course on a recovery of over $300, and providing that defendant shall recover costs, on recovering, in cases in which plaintiff would, on recovering, be entitled to costs.

3. Code Civ. Proc. § 639, requiring a notice of intention to move for a new trial to be filed within 10 days after the verdict or decision, is not complied with by delivering the notice to the clerk for filing without paying the requisite fee, where he refuses to file it because of such non-payment, as he is required to demand the payment of such fee in advance, under St. 1895, p. 267.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county.

Action by W. Davis & Son against Hurgren & Anderson: From a judgment for defendants and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Lippitt & Lippitt, for appellants. Barham & Miller, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover of the defendants $702 for the nonfulfillment by them of a contract to deliver to plaintiffs a certain amount of collar leather. The defendants by their answer deny the averments of the complaint, and set up as a counterclaim that plaintiffs are indebted to them for goods, wares, and merchandise sold, etc., in the sum of $300. The jury returned a verdict for defendants in the sum of $1. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment, from an order denying their motion for a new trial, and from an order denying their motion to strike out defendants' cost bill.

1. The counterclaim of the respondents was one proper to be pleaded. The court below seemed to think that the evidence showed that the counterclaim was one "arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint," and therefore belonged to the class of counterclaims mentioned in subdivision 1, § 438, Code Civ. Proc. The evidence, however, is not before us, and, assuming it to be founded upon an independent contract, yet, as plaintiffs' cause of action was clearly one "arising upon contract," the counterclaim was valid, under subdivision 2 of said section.

2. The principal point urged by appellants is based upon the court's denial of their motion to strike out defendants' cost bill. Assuming that this matter can be reviewed either upon the appeal from the denial of the motion to strike out, or from the general judgment, the ruling of the court below was correct. Plaintiffs' contention on this point is that respondents were not entitled to costs because the judgment in their favor was less than $300, but this contention cannot be maintained. Section 1022, Code Civ. Proc., provides as follows: "Costs are allowed of course to the plaintiff upon a judgment in his favor in the following cases: * * *

(3) In an action for the recovery of money or damages when plaintiff recovers three hundred dollars or over;" and section 1024 provides that "costs must be allowed of course to the defendant upon a judgment in his favor in the actions mentioned in section 1022." If judgment had been merely for the defendants generally, the point here insisted upon would hardly have been made, but the fact that they recovered a judgment in their favor for one dollar does not change at all the specific provisions of the Code. This conclusion is clear upon principle, but the following authorities are directly in point: Dows v. Glaspel, 4 N. D. 251, 60 N. W. 60; Ury v. Wilde (Super. N. Y.) 3 N. Y. Supp. 791. In an action like the one at bar, unless the plaintiff is entitled to costs, the defendant recovers costs as a matter of course.

3. The transcript shows that the court "denied" the motion for a new trial, and also "dismissed" it, upon the ground that notice of intention was not filed with the clerk in time. The court ordered the clerk to enter as a minute order what really is an opinion of the court below, in which he states why the motion for a new trial was dismissed. A dismissal of a motion for a new trial is really nothing more than a denial of it. Warden v. Mendocino Co., 32 Cal. 655. In the case at bar the motion was made upon the minutes of the court, and after its denial and "dismissal" the appellant did not prepare or present any statement upon motion for a new trial, as is required by the statute in such cases. We cannot determine, therefore, whether or not the motion for a new trial was properly denied upon other grounds; and, as a reversal of the order denying a new trial would be in substance the granting of a new trial, it is difficult to see how, in the present state of the record, this court would be warranted in granting a new trial without having any means of ascertaining what the merits of the case are. But, assuming that we can consider the motion solely upon the reason which the court gave in its opinion for denying it, we do not think that any error was committed. Section 639, Code Civ. Proc., provides that a party intending to move for a new trial must, within 10 days after the verdict of the jury, file with the clerk his notice of intention. In the case at bar the 10 days expired on the 23d of February. On that day the appellants sent their notice of motion to the clerk, but the clerk did not file the same, because the fee therefor was not paid; and three days afterwards, at the request of the appellants, who then paid the fee, the clerk indorsed it as filed February 23d. The act of March 28, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 267 et seq.), provides that, on the filing of a notice of a motion for a new trial, the party filing the same must pay to the clerk a fee of two dollars, and that "county officers must * * * demand the payment of all fees in civil cases in advance" (page 272). The notice, therefore, was not filed in time. The mere fact that the clerk received it on the 23d did not constitute a filing. It was not his duty to file it without the fee. He did not file it, and he could not have been compelled to file it, on that day.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

In re NEWMAN'S ESTATE. (S. F. 1,623.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 6, 1899.)

ADMINISTRATION—RIGHTS OF UNFAITHFUL WIFE—JUDGMENT—RESIDENCE.

1. After decedent's marriage in New Hampshire, he moved to California, corresponding with his wife and sending her money. While he was in California, his wife married and lived with her second husband for 15 years until his death, a child being born as the result of this marriage. She was awarded letters of administration on his estate, and a decree entered adjudging her to be his widow. Subsequently she resumed her correspondence with her first husband, informing him of her conduct, and on his death made application for letters of administration on his estate in California. Held, that her conduct did not deprive her of the right to such letters.

2. A decree of the probate court declaring a person to be the widow of a decedent is not conclusive as to such question, so as to bar her rights as widow of another to administer his estate.

3. Where a nonresident goes to California to procure letters of administration on the estate of her husband, declaring her intention to remain in the state, the question of her residence depends on her intentions.

4. That a wife has been unfaithful and violated her marital obligation does not disqualify her to act as administratrix of her husband's estate.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county.

Applications by Rose A. Newman and L. M. Cutting for letters of administration on the estate of George H. Newman, deceased. Letters granted to Rose A. Newman, and Cutting appeals. Affirmed.

Minor & Ashley, for appellant, Cutting. Hartley & Abbott and W. S. Tinning, for respondent Newman. R. H. Latimer, for respondent Gunter.

PER CURIAM. This is a contest for letters of administration. There were three petitioners,—the public administrator, L. M. Cutting, a cousin of the deceased, and Rose A. Newman, widow of deceased. Letters were granted to the widow, and Cutting appeals.

Rose A. Newman and the deceased intermarried in New Hampshire, November, 1856. He was then 19 years of age, and she was 16. Within a very short time after the marriage he came with his father to California. There was, however, no desertion, as the parties continued to correspond at least up to 1862, recognizing in all their letters their marital relation. He did not prosper in California, but occasionally sent her small sums of money. In 1864, she, knowing that her husband was still alive, and that he had not deserted her, and although, as she testified, she received a letter from him about a year before, went through the forms of marriage with one Colburn. She continued to live with Colburn in this adulterous and criminal relation for 15 years, when Colburn died. She had a daughter by this bigamous union, born in 1866. Colburn left an estate, which apparently went to the child, and petitioner, as his widow, administered upon it, and received an allowance from the estate as his widow. In 1883 petitioner, having heard that her husband was still alive, had the hardihood to write to him, and he, in ignorance of her criminal career, at once responded, recognizing his marital obligations. In this letter he said: "I was surprised to hear from you after waiting so long for an answer to my last letter [about twenty years]. I sent you some money to come out here on, and never got any answer. I have been looking for you ever since. You could have found out that I was here if you had written to me, instead of to the postmaster. * * * Why did you not write before, and let me know that you wanted help? I would have helped you. I wish you had come out here when I sent for you. I think it would have been better for you if you had. * * * Write and let me know if you received that money I sent you to come out on; if so, why you did not come. I believe it was in 1864. Inclosed you will find ten dollars," etc. It is evident that he had never had any thought of deserting her, and, unsuspecting of wrong on her part, sent her money while she was living in adultery with Colburn. After this letter they continued to correspond for about nine years. She says that she informed him by letter of her bigamous marriage, but his letters, put in evidence by her, disclose no such knowledge. Finally, about 1892, Newman ceased to write, but why is not made to appear. Newman died intestate in the county of Contra Costa on the 24th day of November, 1897, leaving an estate in said county. The order made awarding letters of administration to Rose A. Newman is attacked upon various grounds: First. It is denied that she has the rights of a widow in the estate of Newman. The marriage is not denied, nor is it claimed that the parties were ever divorced; but it is argued that in some way she is estopped by her commission of the crime of bigamy and her passing for 15 years as the wife of another, having a daughter born of this criminal union, her administering upon Colburn's estate, claiming the right so to do as his widow, and her utter disregard of her marital duties to Newman for some 20 years, and especially by the decree of the probate court of New Hampshire, adjudging her to be the widow of Colburn. That she was an unfaithful wife must be admitted. She testified that she married Colburn, knowing that her husband was living, and that she had received a letter from him about one year before her marriage. She knew she had not been divorced, and she also knew that her husband had not deserted her. But the statute does not make adultery on the part of the wife, of itself, a forfeiture of marital rights. It only authorizes a divorce. It might be a good law to ordain that, when one spouse has committed bigamy, all rights with reference to the estate of the other are forfeited; but there is no such law. There are cases in which it has been held that, when a wife leaves her husband and renounces conjugal obligations before his death, she cannot be such a widow as was contemplated by the legislature when it provided for her rights in reference to the husband's estate. Odiorne's Appeal, 54 Pa. St. 175. By the bigamous marriage, it might be held that the petitioner renounced her conjugal obligations; but, after the bigamous spouse was dead, she resumed her relations with Newman, who continued to recognize the relation, apparently even after knowledge of the facts. Suppose she had, in response to his letters, come to California, and they had lived together as husband and wife, could her rights as a widow have been denied even though it were proved that he was kept in utter ignorance of her delinquency? Of course not. The rights of a widow in the estate of her husband cannot be questioned on the claim that during the life of her husband she was unfaithful to her vows.

The case of Arthur v. Israel, 15 Colo. 147, 25 Pac. 81, was a hard case, and perhaps was well disposed of. There is nothing in it which has any bearing upon this case. The matter of succession is purely statutory, and it would be better for the legislature to provide for such cases, which may arise anywhere, rather than put the court to the necessity of such logic to do justice.

It is contended that the decree of the probate court of New Hampshire, adjudging that petitioner was the widow of Colburn, is conclusive that she was not the wife of Newman. Had she died in New Hampshire, leaving an estate, such decree could not have barred Newman; therefore it could not estop her. A probate decree, according to our rulings, is in rem, and concludes all the world as to the succession. The marriage relation of Newman and wife was not the res before the court in that proceeding. The law of New Hampshire declaring that cohabitation for a period of years is proof that the parties so cohabiting were married is cited, and it is contended that petitioner so cohabited with Colburn, and therefore was his lawful wife, and could not also have been Newman's. The laws of New Hampshire can declare how marriage shall be entered into there, but they assume that the parties are competent to marry. But if this were not so, and the laws of New Hampshire authorized married people to marry again in that state, such marriage would not be recognized here as a dissolution of the former marriage.

It is contended that petitioner was not a resident of California, and therefore was not entitled to letters. She testified that she came to this state because her husband left an estate here; that, if he had not left such estate, she would not have come, but that, being here, it was her intention to remain and make this her future home. The court found in her favor. Her intention constituted the material issue, and there certainly was evidence to support the finding. The difference between this case and the case of In re Donovan's Estate, 104 Cal. 623, 38 Pac. 456, is that there the court found against the petitioner as to the fact. In each case this court must abide the conclusion. It is said that the evidence shows that the petitioner lacks integrity, and therefore should not have been appointed. She was shown to have been an unfaithful wife, and to have violated her marital obligation; but that does not tend to show lack of integrity, within the meaning of the statute. In re Bauquier's Estate, 88 Cal. 302, 26 Pac. 178, 532. We think the letters passing between the husband and wife were properly received in evidence. Order affirmed.

SAN JOAQUIN VALLEY BANK v. DODGE et al. (Sac. 605.)¹

WAY OF NECESSITY—PURCHASER AT MORTGAGE SALE—HOMESTEAD—EVIDENCE—PLEADING—AMENDMENT AFTER TRIAL—LIMITATIONS.

1. One claiming lands under a mortgage foreclosure sale, to which access cannot be had except over the lands of third persons, or over the homestead of the mortgagor, which was included in the mortgage, but was not sold, because the proceeds of the other lands were sufficient to pay the debt, is entitled to a way of necessity over such homestead, though the declaration of homestead was filed prior to the decree of foreclosure, and though Civ. Code, §§ 1240-1242, provide that a homestead can only be incumbered or conveyed by an instrument signed by both husband and wife, and is exempt from execution or forced sale.

2. The statute of limitations is available as a defense only when pleaded.

3. It is not an abuse of discretion to refuse permission to amend an answer, after the submission of the cause, by adding a plea of limitations.

4. A complaint to establish a way of necessity over lands is not insufficient because it alleges that defendant is the owner and entitled to possession of the lands over which the way is sought to be established, where it sets forth the ownership by the parties and plaintiff's right to the way.

5. Nor will it be held insufficient, on appeal, for failing to describe the way claimed, where it was neither demurred to nor objected to during the trial, and where the parties stipulated as to the proper description of the way in the event of a decree declaring it to exist.

6. On an issue whether the owner of a parcel of land was entitled to a way of necessity over adjoining lands, testimony whether or not there was a well-defined road along a creek adjoining the land for which the way was claimed is admissible.

7. In an action to establish a way of necessity, evidence as to the most convenient way to reach the highway from the lands for which the way is claimed is admissible.

Action by the San Joaquin Valley Bank against Emily Dodge and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Loutitt & Middlecoff, for appellants. Minor & Asuley, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Action to have plaintiff adjudged owner of a right of way of necessity over lands of defendant Emily Dodge. Judgment for plaintiff. Motion for new trial, which was denied. Defendant appeals from the judgment and order. The facts, briefly stated, are as follows: On December 3, 1881, one Dodge was the owner of a tract of land which he mortgaged to one Hewlett. In the year 1885 Dodge recorded a declaration of homestead on a portion of the land so mortgaged, which homestead was afterwards duly set apart by the superior court to said Dodge in insolvency proceedings. The family of Dodge consisted of himself and wife, Emily Dodge, one of the defendants in this case. On July 21, 1886, Hewlett commenced an action to foreclose his said mortgage, making Dodge and his wife, Emily, defendants. On October 6, 1886, the court decreed that Hewlett recover judgment against said Dodge, the mortgagor, for $15,708.80, and that the said judgment was a lien upon five separate parcels of land, which are described and referred to in this action as lots 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5. Lot 5 was the homestead so selected. The decree directed the sale of the land in five separate parcels in the order of their numbering, and that, if sufficient money should be raised from the sale of the parcels numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4, parcel number 5, being the homestead, should not be sold. On November 4, 1886, the property described in said decree as lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 was sold to different purchasers, and sufficient money realized from the sale to pay the judgment, leaving the homestead unsold and free from the mortgage lien. At the said sale one Ladd became the purchaser of lot 4, and the plaintiff thereafter, by mesne conveyances, prior to the commencement of this action, became the owner of said lot 4. The land mortgaged as a whole was bounded on the east by a public highway known as the Waterloo road, and the homestead is bounded on the east by said public highway. Lot numbered 4 is bounded easterly and southerly by the Calaveras river, westerly by lands of strangers, and on the north by lot 3 and the homestead lot. The homestead lot lies east of lot 3, and thus forms the boundary of a portion of the northerly line of lot 4. When lot 4 was sold at said foreclosure sale, at all times since, and now, said highway known as the Waterloo road could not be reached except by crossing over the homestead, without crossing the lands of strangers, and plaintiff is unable to use and enjoy its said property without a way to it from said public highway. Dodge died in July, 1893, leaving the defendant, Emily Dodge, the sole owner of the homestead. The principal question in this case is whether or not, by the sale of lot 4 under the decree of court, the homestead was burdened with a way of necessity from said lot 4 to the highway. A way of necessity arises when one grants a parcel of land surrounded by his other land, or where the grantee has no access to it, except over the other land of the grantor, or, as an alternative, by passing over the land of a stranger. In such cases the grantor impliedly grants a right of way over his land as incident to the purchaser's occupation and enjoyment of the premises granted. The general rule is not questioned, and if Dodge, the mortgagor, instead of the sheriff, had sold lot 4, and if the homestead had not been filed, the rule would beyond question apply to him. It is claimed that the rule does not apply to the defendant, Emily Dodge, in this case for two reasons: First, because the premises were sold by the sheriff under order of the court; and, second, because of the homestead having been filed prior to the decree and sale.

One of the earliest cases, decided more than 100 years ago, is Howton v. Frearson, 8 Term R. 50. One S. Dalby, a widow, was seised for her life of certain lands in the liberty of Ockbrook, which estate was limited in remainder to her son, J. J. Dalby, in tail. The mother died, and her said son became entitled to the lands. By the will of the son, certain trustees were appointed for the sale of the lands, and after his death the said trustees sold to the plaintiff in said case three parcels of land, to wit, the "Allotment," "Draycott Field" and "Carr Close," and to defendant the "Upper Meadow." Soon after defendants purchased, the owners of other portions of lands purchased at the trustees' sale closed up the way over their lands leading to defendant's lands, the "Upper Meadow." The case was argued at length in Trinity term as to whether or not the rule applied to a grant made by trustees. Lord Kenyon entertained great doubt upon the question, and ordered that the case might be argued again at the next term. Upon the calling of court, and before the case was reargued, the learned chief justice said: "Upon further consideration I find it impossible to distinguish this from the general case where a man grants a close surrounded by his own land (in which case the grantee has a way to it of necessity over the land of the grantor) merely on the ground that the plaintiff conveyed to the defendant in the character of trustee, for it cannot be intended that he meant to make a void grant. There being no other way to the defendant's close but over the land of one of the persons who granted to him, he was entitled to such a way of necessity upon the authority of all the cases, upon the principle that every deed must be taken most strongly against the grantor. * * * There are, I think, great difficulties in the question; but, in the other mode of considering the case, those difficulties are gotten rid of altogether, and it falls within all the authorities, which are not controverted even by the plaintiff." The rule thus laid down by Lord Kenyon has ever since been the rule in England and in this country. In Collins v. Prentice, 15 Conn. 38, it was held to apply by one purchaser against another at probate sale made by executors under order of court, both purchases being made on the same day and as parts of same estate. In Pernam v. Wead, 2 Mass. 202, it was held to apply in favor of a debtor as against a creditor who had taken part of the debtor's land under execution, leaving him no passage to the highway. In Taylor v. Townsend, 8 Mass. 410, it was held to apply in favor of a creditor, as against a debtor, when the creditor had certain lands set off to him under execution, but no way of reaching them, except on the lands of the debtor not so set apart. In the late case of Schmidt v. Quinn, 136 Mass. 575, the rule was again applied as against the judgment debtor in favor of the party holding under the execution. The court, in discussing the case, said: "We see no reason why the rule of law should not be the same where the grant is involuntary, as by the levy of an execution, even although a right of way might have been expressly included in the levy, but was not." It was applied to purchases made by tenants in common in Smyles v. Hastings, 22 N. Y. 217, and to mutual deeds arising on the settlement of an estate. Palmer v. Palmer, 150 N. Y. 139, 44 N. E. 966. It was applied in favor of a mortgagor purchasing at foreclosure sale as against the mortgagee and over lands not described in the mortgage in the well-considered case of Insurance Co. v. Patterson, 103 Ind. 582, 2 N. E. 188; and in Ellis v. Bassett, 128 Ind. 118, 27 N. E. 344, the same rule was held to apply against the purchaser from the widow of Bassett of a five-acre tract of land which had been set apart to her in partition proceedings in the estate of her husband, and in favor of the purchaser at administrator's sale of the other part of the real estate. This court in Blum v. Weston, 102 Cal. 362, 36 Pac. 778, applied the same rule in partition proceedings as to parties holding under the decree of the court. The court approved the rule as announced in Ellis v. Bassett, and held that the decree had the effect of vesting the title in the different parties, and that the rule would apply precisely as if they had conveyed to each other. Further authorities supporting the rule are: Russell v. Jackson, 2 Pick. 574; Jones, Easem. §§ 309-312; Washb. Easem. p. 261; Godd. Easem. p. 269. It is claimed with considerable plausibility that the sale freed the homestead from the lien of the mortgage, and that, under Civ. Code, §§ 1240-1242, the homestead cannot be invaded even for the purposes of a way of necessity.

We have carefully examined the authorities cited, and we think the rule applies to the homestead in this case. The land was all mortgaged by Dodge for his indebtedness. By the mortgage, and at the date of its execution, he authorized the mortgagee, in case the debt was not paid, to sell the land for the purpose of paying it. The filing of the homestead only protected the premises therein described from future liabilities, and gave the mortgagor or his wife the right in foreclosure proceedings to have the land not included in the homestead sold first, and, if the proceeds should be sufficient to pay the debt, to have the homestead reserved from sale. The homestead did not relieve the property therein described from the lien of the mortgage. If the mortgagor had sold the four lots, the defendant Emily joining in the deeds, the rule would apply to them. The premises were sold by Dodge through the decree of court under the authority given when the mortgage was made, at which time there was no homestead upon the premises. For the benefit of defendants in the foreclosure proceedings, the decree provided that the land should be sold in five different lots, and that, if the first four lots could be sold for enough, then lot 5 should be saved as a home. If the purchaser of lot 4 could not use the same, because of no way to reach it, and that fact had been announced at the sale, the homestead might have had to be sold under the decree. To apply the rule to the purchaser of lot 4, and against the very person who was benefited by its sale, seems to us to be just, and in accordance with the authorities. This disposes of the vital point in the case, and, the judgment of the court below being in accord with what has been said, we would not feel justified in disturbing it for errors in the trial or proceedings, unless material injury has been done. It is claimed that plaintiff's cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations; but it is sufficient to say that the statute is not pleaded, even if it applied to the facts of this case. Counsel seem to have been of the same opinion, as they asked leave to file an amended answer pleading the statute of limitations long after the case was tried and submitted, and they now claim it was error in the court to deny their application. Amendments to pleadings are left much to the discretion of the court below, and it is presumed that such discretion will always be exercised in furtherance of justice, and with the end in view of disposing of cases upon their merits. We cannot interfere, except in cases where such discretion is abused. In view of the fact that the application was made after the case had been submitted, and was made for the purpose of allowing defendants to plead the statute of limitations, we cannot say that the court abused its discretion. It is claimed that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because it states that defendant Emily Dodge is the owner seised in fee and entitled to the possession of lot 5, and, further, because there is no description of the right of way claimed in the complaint. The complaint sets forth the facts as to the ownership by different parties and the claim of plaintiff to the way. It would have been difficult to describe a way which had been denied to plaintiff, and the location of which the defendants had the right to dictate. No demurrer was filed in the court below, and no objection was made during the trial to the complaint. The case was tried upon the theory that it was sufficient. In view of these facts, and in view of the fact that the parties have stipulated as to the proper description of the way in case the law adjudges that one exists, we must now hold the complaint sufficient. It is said the evidence is insufficient to justify finding four as to the date of recording the declaration of homestead, and that it was recorded September 22, 1885, instead of December 17th, as found by the court. The date is wholly immaterial, as we view the case. Granting that the homestead was recorded September 22d, it would not change the views here expressed. Other findings are objected to, but we think there is evidence to support them. The questions asked of the witness Dodge to which objections were made do not appear to have been improper. As to whether or not there was a well-defined road along Calaveras creek, and as to which was the most convenient way to reach the highway, were facts tending to throw light upon the necessity for a way over the lands of defendant. We think the judgment and order should be affirmed, and so advise.

We concur: BRITT, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEISER et al. v. GRIFFIN et al. (BRADBURY, Intervener). (S. F. 1,091.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—TRUSTS—COMMUNITY—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION—AMENDMENT—LIMITATIONS—VESTED RIGHTS—FINDINGS.

1. A husband, for himself and as guardian of his minor son, sued his wife and another, alleging that certain lots were purchased with his money; that the deed was taken in the wife's name in trust for the husband and child and herself, but she conspired with the other defendant to defraud the husband and child of it; and seeking to enjoin the other defendant from conveying the property. Held, that the theory of the suit was that the legal title vested in the wife under a trust creating an equitable interest to one-third each of the land in the father and son, and an amendment based on the theory that the property was community property, and that the title had always been in the husband, and could not be conveyed by the wife, set up a new cause of action.

2. Where an amendment shows that it sets up a new cause of action which was barred, the court properly refuses to permit its being filed with leave to the adverse parties to plead the statute.

3. Act March 4, 1897, amending Civ. Code, § 164, repealing a former limitation law, and extending the limitation of a husband's right to recover as community property previously conveyed by the wife, did not apply to causes of action already barred.

4. Where plaintiff, under the findings actually made, could not possibly recover, he cannot complain of absence of findings on an issue raised by an intervener.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Suit by Lemuel Peiser and another against Thomas H. Griffin and Minnie L. Peiser, W. B. Bradbury, intervener. From a decree for defendants and intervener, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. A. Richardson, for appellants. Thos. J. Clunie, for respondents Griffin and others. T. V. O'Brien, for other respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Lemuel Peiser, for himself and as guardian ad litem of Edwin A. Peiser, his minor son, sued Thomas H. Griffin and Minnie L. Peiser, his wife. He alleged that on May 1, 1889, two certain lots of land in San Francisco were purchased with his money, and "that the deed of conveyance was had and made in the name of Minnie L. Peiser for the purpose of and in trust for plaintiff and said Minnie L. Peiser, and the child of parties, Edwin Adair Peiser"; that Thomas H. Griffin conspired with Minnie Peiser to defraud plaintiffs of their property, and, exercising undue influence upon her, induced her to convey and transfer the property to him. A judgment was sought restraining Griffin from alienating the property and setting aside Mrs. Peiser's deed to him. This complaint was filed on June 26, 1889. Griffin answered, denying the charge of undue influence. In October, 1890, W. B. Bradbury was allowed to intervene, and filed his complaint, in which he set up that without notice, and for a valuable consideration, he had upon June 24, 1889, purchased the property from Griffin. The answer to this complaint in intervention consisted of denials and an iteration of the matters pleaded in the original complaint. It was filed in March, 1895. Upon these pleadings trial was had. The court found that the land in question was paid for with the money of Lemuel Peiser, and that the deed was taken in the name of his wife; that his wife did not hold the title to the property under any trust; that the wife conveyed the property to Griffin without any valuable consideration, but that she had not been moved to the making of the deed by undue influence; that Bradbury purchased the property upon June 24, 1889, for a valuable consideration. The judgment denied plaintiffs any relief, and gave costs to defendant Griffin and intervener Bradbury. From this judgment, and from the order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal.

Upon the trial it was shown that Mrs. Peiser conveyed to Griffin one lot, and assigned to him a contract for the purchase of a second lot. Plaintiffs thereupon sought leave to file an amended complaint, setting up that the first lot was purchased with community funds, and was community property; that the same was true of the second lot; and that the later installments called for by the contract had all been paid by the plaintiff since the commencement of the action. The court refused permission to file this offered pleading. In so doing it held that the proposed complaint did not amend the old, but charged upon a new and distinct cause of action, and that the statute of limitations barred plaintiffs' right to prosecute upon this new cause. The soundness of the court's ruling on this matter is the most important question in this case. The original complaint is framed upon the theory that the trustee holding the legal title had made a conveyance in violation of the trust to one not an innocent purchaser for value, which conveyance was, therefore, voidable at the instance of the beneficiaries (Civ. Code, § 869); for, if the property was community property, the legal title remained in the husband notwithstanding that the deed was taken in the name of the wife, and the wife could not pass the title to it. An attempt of the wife to dispose of community property, real or personal, is a nullity. "If land, being community property, is conveyed to the wife during marriage, she takes no real title in it. The whole title, both real and equitable, at once vests in the husband by means of the deed to the wife. * * * Even the portion of community property standing in her own name, and acquired by her, the wife cannot convey nor transfer." Pom. Commun. Prop. 4 West Coast Rep. 390, 393; Tryon v. Sutton, 13 Cal. 490; Van Maren v. Johnson, 15 Cal. 308. If the original complaint had been framed upon the theory that the property was community property, it would certainly have contained some distinct allegation to this effect; but it does not. The averment that the property was purchased with the money of the husband might be open to the construction that community money was meant thereby were the action prosecuted against a mere stranger, but, as against his wife and her grantee, under this complaint it can only have reference to the husband's separate property; or, if it can be said that it refers to community property, then the further allegations demonstrate that its character as community property was destroyed by the express trust created in the wife as trustee for the benefit of the three. If the husband had meant to avoid the deed of his wife as being an attempt by her alone to pass title to the community property, he would not have pleaded a trust; he would not have sued as guardian ad litem of his minor son, who could have no actionable interest in the community property; he would not have sought an injunction to restrain Griffin from cheating and defrauding him by conveying the property away, when, if it were community property, Griffin would have nothing to convey. The manifest theory of the original complaint is that the legal title vested in Mrs. Peiser, as it could not vest if the property were community property; that it vested in her under a trust, which created an equitable interest or title to one-third each of the land in the father and minor son. By the proposed amended complaint all of these issues are withdrawn, and another and distinct cause of action is pleaded, namely, an action to establish that the property which had stood in the name of Mrs. Peiser was community property, and, consequently, that the title had always been in the husband, and could not have been conveyed by the wife's deed. At the time when this suit was commenced, such an action was open and available to the plaintiff, but upon March 3, 1893, section 164 of the Civil Code was amended. With other important changes which were wrought by the amendment, it was provided that in cases where married women have conveyed real property which they acquired prior to May 19, 1889, the husbands shall be barred from commencing any action to show that said real property was community property, or to recover such real property from and after July 1, 1894. This is a perfectly valid statute of limitations fixing the time within which an action to avoid such a past conveyance of the wife must be brought. It applied to this plaintiff's right of action, for Mrs. Peiser acquired the property prior to May 19, 1889, and her deed to Griffin was executed in June, 1889. The application to file the amended complaint was made in May, 1896. At that time plaintiff could not have commenced and maintained such an action as an original proceeding, and the court, under intervener's objection, properly refused to permit him in the guise of an amendment indirectly to do the same thing. Nor was it incumbent on the court to permit the amendment with leave to the adverse parties to plead the statute. Their objection to permitting the amended answer to be filed was that it was not an amendment to the old, but the statement of a new, cause of action, and one that was barred by the provisions of section 164 of the Civil Code. These grounds of objection being well taken, the proposed pleading was properly excluded from the files. On March 4, 1897, section 164 of the Civil Code was again amended. It now contains this provision: "In cases where married women have conveyed or shall hereafter convey real property which they acquired prior to May 19, 1889, the husbands or their heirs or assigns of such married women shall be barred from commencing or maintaining any action to show that said real property was community property, or to recover said real property, as follows: As to conveyances heretofore made, from and after one year from the date of the taking effect of this act, and, as to conveyances hereafter made, from and after one year from the filing for record in the recorder's office of such conveyances respectively." Appellants contend that this amendment operates to enlarge the time for the commencement of the action, and that, even if the trial court was justified in refusing to allow them to file an amended complaint, owing to the condition of the law at the time when the amended pleading was offered, still, the code amendment of 1897 being within the judicial knowledge of this court, we should now accord appellants the permission contemplated by the present section. But at the time when plaintiff proposed his amendment the statute of limitations barring his right to commence such a cause of action had already run. By its running the title to the property irrespective of the original right is regarded as vested in the possessor, and the subsequent repeal of the limitation law cannot be given a retroactive effect so as to disturb the title. Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) p. 448.

The foregoing renders unnecessary any extended consideration of appellants' remaining points. The findings are responsive to the issues tendered by plaintiffs' complaint. For the most part they negative the averments therein contained. The finding in the language of the complaint that the land was purchased with the money of Lemuel Peiser is not a finding that the property in question was community property, and therefore did not warrant, as appellants contend, a judgment in their favor. Under the findings, the judgment properly followed that plaintiffs should take nothing by their action. Appellants complain that the findings under the complaint in intervention do not determine the title, but, as under the findings actually made they could not, under any possibility, recover, additional findings could not have benefited them, and the absence of them cannot work injury. We perceive no rulings in the admission or rejection of evidence which call for especial consideration. The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1899.)

MODIFICATION OF JUDGMENT — RESTITUTION OF PROPERTY—APPEAL—RIGHT TO RENTS.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 957, which provides that when the judgment is reversed or modified the court may make complete restitution of all property and rights lost by the erroneous judgment, it is not error to refuse to set aside a foreclosure sale made pursuant to a judgment which, on appeal, subsequent to the sale, was modified by the reduction of the amount thereof, for interest improperly included therein, and which was in other respects affirmed, where complete justice will be done by the payment to plaintiff of the excess.

2. The right to appeal from an order denying a motion to set aside a foreclosure sale, made after the satisfaction of a judgment by the sale, where such motion is based on a decision of the supreme court in a former appeal taken without a stay bond, wherein the judgment under which the sale was made was modified, is not abridged by Code Civ. Proc. § 1049, which provides that an action is deemed to be pending until the time for appeal has passed, unless the judgment is sooner satisfied.

3. Where a purchaser at a mortgage foreclosure sale enters into possession, under an agreement with the mortgagor, before the time of redemption expires, whereby he undertakes to improve the premises, and the mortgagor agrees to repay the purchaser for all sums expended in that behalf in case of redemption, the purchaser is entitled to set off the rents and profits received by the mortgagor from the premises during the period for redemption against an excess of interest included in the judgment under which the sale was made, when the agreement is silent as to whom the rents and profits shall be payable, under Code Civ. Proc. § 707, which provides that a purchaser of real property at a sheriff's sale is entitled to receive the rents of the property sold, from the time of the purchase to the time of redemption.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county.

Bill by U. Yndart against N. C. Den and others. From an order refusing to set aside a foreclosure sale, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Bishop & Wheeler and J. W. Taggart, for appellants. Richards & Carrier, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Appeal from an order modifying the judgment herein, but refusing to set aside a sale made under the original judgment and restore the property so sold. The action was for foreclosure of a mortgage, in which judgment was entered May 14, 1895. On June 8, 1895, the mortgaged premises were sold, and on the same day the sheriff made return of full satisfaction of the judgment, and on December 10, 1895, his deed was made to the plaintiff as purchaser. On December 7, 1895, the day before the time for redemption had expired, defendants appealed from the judgment of foreclosure to this court. Its decision was rendered April 23, 1897, and is reported in 116 Cal. 533, 48 Pac. 618. The judgment here was that the original decree included interest in excess of that which should be allowed, and the cause was remanded, with directions to modify the decree in this particular "as of the date when the judgment appealed from was entered; and, when thus modified and entered, the decree will stand affirmed." Remittitur was filed in the lower court May 26, 1897. Thereupon defendants served notice that they would on June 4, 1897, move the court to modify said decree, as originally made and entered, "in accordance with the decision of the supreme court in said matter," and, "by virtue of said modification and decision, * * * to set aside the sale of the property made by the sheriff, * * * as shown by the return of the sheriff filed in said cause, and to make restitution to said defendants of all property and rights lost by the said erroneous judgment and decree of said superior court," etc. The motion was to be heard upon the papers on file in said cause, and on the affidavit of defendant N. C. Den. In his affidavit, defendant Den avers that he is the husband of defendant Isabel Den, to whom the mortgaged premises belonged, and as her agent has attended to all business connected with said action, and is more familiar with the same than the said Isabel; that the property sold for $17,711.01, and plaintiff became the purchaser, to whom certificate of purchase was issued, and to whom on December 10, 1895, the sheriff delivered his deed to said property, and that plaintiff thereupon went into possession, and has ever since remained in possession thereof under said deed; that at that time and now said property was of the market value of $25,000, and that the rents and incomes amounted to $2,500, which plaintiff received, and that the property would now sell for a sum in excess of the judgment as modified by the said supreme court; that the incomes have been in excess of the amount of interest which would have accrued from the date the judgment was authorized to be entered under the order modifying the same. Plaintiff filed objections, and claimed that defendants' application did not state sufficient grounds for the modification as asked, nor for the restitution of the property, and that the court has no jurisdiction to make such modifications, "there being no judgment in force or existing, the same having been fully satisfied before appeal taken"; and "the court has no power to grant restitution for said property as applied for." With the objections, and in support thereof, plaintiff made affidavit in which he denies that the property was worth any sum over $15,000. Denies that the incomes were $2,500, or any sum greater than the expenses, or that he has received any sum greater than the expenses per annum. Avers that it is impossible to state whether or not the property, on resale, would bring more than the full amount of the modified judgment. Avers that no appeal was taken until the day before redemption from the sheriff's sale expired; that, immediately after the sale, defendants stated to plaintiff that they could not obtain water for the preservation of the premises and the orchards thereon, and that it was impossible for the said Isabel, the owner of the property, "to carry on or preserve or cultivate said property, as she had not, and could not obtain, the means for the purpose, and she then proposed that affiant (plaintiff) should go into the possession of the property, take charge of and care for the same, and procure water for the use thereof, and advance the necessary funds for the care, management, and cultivation of the same, upon the understanding and agreement that affiant should hold possession and perform such acts until the said property was redeemed, or the time for redemption had expired, and that, in case she redeemed the property, she would pay affiant all costs and expenses incurred by affiant during the time affiant had possession, and, in case she failed to redeem the same, affiant was to make no charge against her." Avers that he went into possession under this agreement, which defendants afterwards ratified, and remained in possession under said agreement until the expiration of the time of redemption and issuance of the sheriff's deed; that, upon issuance of the deed by the sheriff, he was put into formal possession by writ of assistance issued out of the court in which the action was commenced in 1896, and has remained in possession ever since; that during the period of redemption he expended the sum of $1,300 in necessary labor, in the purchase of water and care of the premises, and to preserve the property from being impaired and destroyed, and that without such expenditure and care the property would have been impaired in value at least 30 per cent. of the price paid by plaintiff at the sheriff's sale; that plaintiff was the only bidder at the sale; that no other bidder could have been found at that time who would have paid over $15,000 for the property, and that the property was not then worth the amount of said judgment as modified by said supreme court; that plaintiff "received none of the rents and profits of said property, but defendants received and appropriated to their own use all thereof, and the same were in value more than the amount in which said judgment was modified by the supreme court, and were of value more than $1,500, and defendants have not paid or accounted to affiant for the same." This affidavit of plaintiff is not controverted. The motion was heard upon the foregoing affidavits, and upon the judgment roll as contained in the transcript in the case on appeal here, and the decision of this court of April 23, 1897. The court below modified the decree as directed by this court; i. e. reduced the judgment from $16,926.70 to $16,456.51, as of the date when the judgment was entered. In all other matters the motion was denied. Defendants appeal from this order on bill of exceptions, in which the foregoing proceedings appear. The first appeal was upon the judgment roll alone, and no stay bond was filed. The only error corrected by the appeal was in the computation of interest. The judgment of the trial court was not reversed. It was modified in this one particular of interest, which the court below found to amount to $470.19, and the judgment was to retain its date as when first entered, and, when modified, to stand affirmed.

Section 957, Code Civ. Proc., provides as follows: "When the judgment or order is reversed or modified the court may make complete restitution of all property and rights lost by the erroneous judgment or order," etc. Section 1049, Id., provides as follows: "An action is deemed to be pending * * * until the time for appeal has passed, unless the judgment is sooner satisfied." The judgment was satisfied against the will of appellants, and section 1049, in such case, cannot be invoked to abridge the right of appeal. Kenney v. Parks, 120 Cal. 22, 52 Pac. 40. Section 957 is not mandatory upon the court, but the power to make restitution rests in the discretion of the court. Waterworks v. Drinkhouse, 95 Cal. 220, 30 Pac. 218. Leaving out of view, for the moment, the undenied agreement set up in plaintiff's affidavit, defendants lost no rights or property by the execution of the judgment before the right of appeal had expired, except in the single item of the excess of interest included in the judgment. Complete justice will be done defendants by repayment of this excess, to wit, $470.19, and the statute does not contemplate any greater relief than the "restitution of all property and rights lost by the erroneous judgment or order." Where the judgment is not reversed, a different situation exists from that where there is a modification which does not disturb the foundation of the sale. This distinction is pointed out in Hewitt v. Dean, 91 Cal. 617, 28 Pac. 93.

Do the matters set up in plaintiff's affidavit work a set-off to defendants' right to have restored to them the excess of interest included in the judgment? It will be noticed that there was no agreement as to which of the parties was to have the rents and profits of the property. Plaintiff was entitled by law to the rents during the period of redemption. Code Civ. Proc. § 707; Walker v. McCusker, 71 Cal. 594, 12 Pac. 723. In support of the order, it must be assumed that the facts stated in plaintiff's affidavit are true. It is there stated that defendants received, of rents and profits, a sum greater than the excess of interest included in the judgment. In dealing with the question of defendants' right to restitution, we think the court could take into consideration the rents received by defendants. We are unable to discover, from the facts as they appear, that the court erred in its conclusion, and it is advised that the order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BRITT, C.

DAVIS v. PACIFIC TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO. (S. F. 1,097.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 12, 1899.)

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—PROBABLE CAUSE—FALSE IMPRISONMENT—ARREST BY OFFICER—PRESUMPTION.

1. Pen. Code, § 591, provides that any person who maliciously removes or obstructs any line of telegraph, or severs any wire thereof, is guilty of a misdemeanor. In an action for malicious prosecution the evidence disclosed that plaintiff was a house mover; that, to test a law requiring him to pay the expense of moving telegraph wires when necessary in moving buildings, he employed an attorney, who advised plaintiff to cut defendant's wires, after giving the latter notice to remove them, at the same time advising him that he would probably be arrested; that thereafter plaintiff cut defendant's wires, and was arrested, and charged with cutting telegraph wires, contrary to the provisions of section 591; and that he was acquitted in the police court on the charge. Held, that the evidence does not show such want of probable cause as to require its submission to the jury.

2. In an action to recover for malicious prosecution, the plaintiff is not, under the allegations of a complaint alleging that he was arrested without probable cause, and maliciously prosecuted by defendant, and that he was acquitted of the charge, entitled to recover as for false imprisonment, though the proof thereof would be sufficient under proper allegations, as the two causes of action are inconsistent.

3. Where a police officer is authorized to make an arrest only where he has a warrant for the offender, or the offense was committed in his presence, under an allegation that plaintiff was arrested by a police officer it will be presumed that he had a warrant, or that the offense was committed in his presence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by George Davis against the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appealed. Affirmed.

Crandall & Bull, for appellant. Pillsbury & Madison, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This is an action to recover damages for malicious prosecution. The complaint alleges that on the 17th day of October, 1891, the defendant caused a complaint to be verified and filed against the plaintiff, charging him with a criminal offense, to wit, "with willfully, unlawfully, and maliciously taking down, removing, injuring, and obstructing a line of telegraph in the city and county of San Francisco," and that on said complaint the defendant caused plaintiff to be arrested, and prosecuted in the police court of said city; that in so doing "the defendant acted maliciously, and without probable cause"; and that plaintiff was afterwards acquitted of the said offense. The plaintiff was charged in said police court with the violation of section 591 of the Penal Code, which is as follows: "Every person who maliciously takes down, removes, injures or obstructs any line of telegraph, or any part thereof, or appurtenance or apparatus connected therewith, or severs any wire thereof, is guilty of a misdemeanor." The undisputed facts, as established at the trial, were substantially as follows: A number of persons engaged in the business of moving houses in the city and county of San Francisco thought that the telegraph and telephone companies had no right to make the parties so engaged in moving houses pay the expense of moving or changing the telegraph wires when such removal or change became necessary by the removal of a house. Controversies had before arisen as to the right of the companies to exact payment of the house movers. Accordingly the house movers organized for the purpose of testing the law, and employed an attorney. The attorney advised the plaintiff, who appears to have been the treasurer and manager of the association, to serve a written notice upon defendant to the effect that he was moving a house on Union street, in said city, and that the wires used by defendant were an obstruction to him, and demanding that the wires be removed by 1 o'clock of the morning of October 17, 1891. The notice was accordingly prepared by the attorney for the association, and served by plaintiff upon defendant. Plaintiff, upon serving the notice, said nothing in explanation, but walked away. He had been advised by the attorney so retained that the way to test the law was to cut the wires after serving notice, and that he would then probably be arrested. The attorney prepared a bail bond for him, and agreed to attend to the case, and to all the "wire cases" that should come up. At 1 o'clock on the morning of the 17th of October the president and superintendent of defendant and several police officers appeared at the place designated in the notice. Plaintiff did not then cut the wires, but the next day, during the busy part of the day, and while no police officers were around, he cut about a dozen of defendant's wires in the presence of an employé of defendant. The employé immediately telephoned for the police officers, and in 15 or 20 minutes two came up, and upon their arrival the employé arrested the plaintiff, and turned him over to the police. The whole party then boarded a Union Street car, and proceeded to the old city hall, where plaintiff was charged with cutting telegraph wires, contrary to the provisions of law and section 591 of the Penal Code. Bail was fixed at $60, which plaintiff deposited, instead of giving the bond prepared by his attorney, and was then released. He was discharged in the police court. After testimony was given, establishing the facts as herein stated, in the court below defendant made a motion for a nonsuit upon several grounds; among others upon the ground that the evidence offered on the part of plaintiff failed to show either malice or want of probable cause. The court granted the motion, and judgment of nonsuit was entered. Motion for a new trial was made and denied, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment and order.

It is contended by plaintiff that there was evidence of malice and want of probable cause sufficient to entitle the case to go to the jury. It is incumbent upon the plaintiff, and the burden of proof is upon him, in an action of this kind to prove both malice and want of probable cause. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 454; Potter v. Seale, 8 Cal. 221; Grant v. Moore, 29 Cal. 656; Anderson v. Coleman, 53 Cal. 188. Probable cause is a suspicion founded upon circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonable man in the belief that the charge is true. 2 Greenl. Ev. §§ 453, 457; Potter v. Seale, supra; Smith v. Insurance Co., 107 Cal. 433, 40 Pac. 540. Where there is no conflicting testimony, the question whether or not the evidence introduced by plaintiff shows want of probable cause is always for the court to decide, and it is error in such case, where there is no proof of want of probable cause, to submit any question to the jury. Dwain v. Descalso, 66 Cal. 415, 5 Pac. 903; Smith v. Insurance Co., 107 Cal. 436, 40 Pac. 540. It was therefore incumbent on the plaintiff in this case, in order to entitle him to recover, to prove the allegations of his complaint. He alleged that the prosecution was malicious, and without probable cause. The primary question was the want of probable cause for the prosecution complained of, and this must have been established by the plaintiff before he could claim the right to have the case go to the jury. It was therefore essential for plaintiff to prove that his arrest and prosecution were not under such circumstances as would justify a suspicion in a reasonable man that the charge was true. Let us examine the facts, and determine whether or not they warranted such suspicion. The section of the Penal Code hereinbefore cited makes it a misdemeanor for any one to maliciously tear down, remove, or injure any line of telegraph. The plaintiff deliberately, with the advice of counsel, for the purpose of testing the law, with the expectation of being arrested, and during the busy hours of the day, cut about a dozen wires of defendant's telegraph line. The circumstances were such that appellant and his attorney (and we suppose they were reasonable men) expected an arrest to follow. The wires were cut in the presence of an employé of defendant. An act is, in contemplation of law, done maliciously where it is wrongful, and is done intentionally. Pen. Code, § 7, subd. 4; People v. Taylor, 36 Cal. 257; People v. Ah Toon, 68 Cal. 362, 9 Pac. 311. The act of plaintiff in cutting the wires was unlawful, and he knew it to be. He had been so advised by his attorney. In the complaint in this case, which was verified, he alleges that the complaint in the police court charged him with a criminal offense in the willful cutting of telegraph wires. It is not questioned that the wires of defendant had been erected and were being maintained under a franchise from the board of supervisors. It is not claimed that they in any way interfered with the regular use of the highway by the public, nor that they were upon private property. There is no attempt made to show that appellant had any legal authority to cut them. It seems to us that the circumstances were amply sufficient to warrant a reasonable person in the belief that the plaintiff had committed a crime. The fact that he was discharged in the police court is but a circumstance, and in no way convinces us that the charge was without probable cause. This court, in Janin v. Bank, 92 Cal. 27, 27 Pac. 1102, said: "In order to justify the submission of any question of fact to a jury, the proof must be sufficient to raise more than a mere conjecture or surmise that the fact is as alleged. It must be such that a rational, well-constructed mind can reasonably draw from it the conclusion that the fact exists, and, when the evidence is not sufficient to justify such an inference, the court may properly refuse to submit the question to a jury." Applying the rule to this case, we do not think there was evidence sufficient to convince a rational, well-constructed mind that there was no probable cause for plaintiff's arrest in the police court. Counsel for plaintiff seem to have apprehended that they had not proved the case as alleged in the complaint, because they devote the first half of their brief to arguing that the complaint is sufficient to sustain an action for false imprisonment, and that the evidence should have been submitted to the jury with proper instructions on that issue. We do not think the contention can be maintained. We will take the definition of false imprisonment as given by plaintiff's counsel: "False imprisonment is a trespass committed by one man against the person of another by unlawfully arresting him, and detaining him without any legal authority." In order for the complaint to state a cause of action under the above definition, it would have to show that the defendant unlawfully arrested the plaintiff without legal authority. The complaint not only fails to state that the arrest was unlawful, and without legal authority, but states that it was lawful, and upon a complaint charging plaintiff with a criminal offense, and by a police officer of the city and county. The plaintiff, in order to make out a case of malicious prosecution in his complaint, had to allege that he was arrested by legal process. On the other hand, in an action for false imprisonment he would have to allege that he was arrested without legal authority.

The rule has often been stated by this court that the plaintiff must recover, if at all, upon the cause of action set out in his complaint, and not upon some other, which may be developed by the proofs. Mondran v. Goux, 51 Cal. 151; Evans v. Bailey, 66 Cal. 113, 4 Pac. 1089; Milling Co. v. Morgan, 106 Cal. 409, 39 Pac. 802. In Johnstone v. Sutton, 1 Term R. 544, decided in 1786, Lord Loughborough, in discussing an action for malicious prosecution, said: "There is no similitude or analogy between an action of trespass, or false imprisonment, and this kind of action. An action of trespass is for the defendant's having done that which, upon the stating of it, is manifestly illegal. This kind of action is for a prosecution which, upon the stating of it, is manifestly legal." This rule has always been adhered to, not only in England, but in this country. Colter v. Lower, 35 Ind. 285; Turpin v. Remy, 3 Blackf. 210; Seeger v. Pfeifer, 35 Ind. 13; Murphy v. Martin, 58 Wis. 276, 16 N. W. 603; Elsee v. Smith, 2 Chit. 304; Gelzenleuchter v. Niemeyer, 64 Wis. 321, 25 N. W. 442. And in the case of Nebenzahl v. Townsend, 10 Daly, 235, the court used this language: "The complaint was for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution, which was uniting two causes of action that were inconsistent with each other, for, if the arrest was without lawful authority, it was not a case of malicious prosecution (Bourden v. Alloway, 11 Mod. 180); and, if under lawful process, there was no false imprisonment, the imprisonment being by lawful authority. Each cause of action is distinct from the other. Thus, formerly, for false imprisonment the remedy was trespass, and for malicious prosecution it was case. Elsee v. Smith, 2 Chit. 304. Both cannot exist upon the same state of facts; or, to put it more clearly, if the one lies upon the facts, the other does not." In this case plaintiff did not attempt in his complaint to state a cause of action for false imprisonment, and we do not think, under his pleading, that he can make the claim for the first time in this court. We have carefully examined the cases cited by appellant's counsel, and find nothing in them in conflict with what has been said. In Ah Fong v. Sternes, 79 Cal. 32, 21 Pac. 381, the court said: "We think the complaint states a good cause of action for false imprisonment. The allegation that the plaintiff was confined and restrained of his liberty by the defendant is an allegation of physical and bodily restraint, which would serve as a foundation for the old action of trespass vi et armis. In such an action it is not necessary to aver—as would be necessary to aver in an action for malicious prosecution—that the imprisonment was malicious, or without probable cause." The court evidently recognized the distinction between the two classes of cases. Even if the complaint in this action were sufficient as pleading a cause of action for false imprisonment, the evidence would not sustain it. The arrest was made by Corcoran, an employé of defendant, in whose presence the offense was committed. A private person may arrest another for a public offense committed or attempted in his presence. Pen. Code, § 837. If the evidence were sufficient to show a false imprisonment, we are again met by the objection that the complaint does not allege any restraint of any kind by defendant, but alleges that the defendant procured a police officer to arrest plaintiff. There is no statement as to whether the arrest was with or without a warrant, and the presumption of law is that a public officer performed his duty, and in this case the presumption would be that the officer either had a warrant, or that the "criminal offense" was committed in the presence of the officer. The allegation of the complaint is "that he was charged with a criminal offense," and in such case plaintiff cannot now claim "that he was not charged with any criminal offense." Being charged with a criminal offense, and arrested by a police officer, and nothing being averred to the contrary, it is presumed the officer had the proper warrant. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

125 Cal. 101

ALAMEDA COUNTY v. CROCKER et al.
(S. F. 1,179.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1899.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—FINDINGS—CONSTRUCTION —JUDGMENT—FICTITIOUS NAMES—ERRORS AFFECTING CO-PARTIES—COSTS.

1. A finding in condemnation proceedings "that all the facts alleged in the complaint are true, except as to those hereinafter otherwise specified, and as to those allegations the court finds as follows," the court then finding specifically as to certain facts, does not mean that all the facts so excepted are necessarily untrue, but that they are as found specially.

2. In condemnation proceedings, a finding specifically as to the ownership of all the lands sought to be condemned, and as to all lands about which there is any issue presented, necessarily excludes the idea of any ownership in a defendant not specifically mentioned, and is, in effect, a finding against him.

3. A judgment in condemnation proceedings against defendants, served by fictitious names, who appeared, and answered by their real names, cannot be supported without amending the complaint.

4. In condemnation proceedings, the action of the court in vacating former orders for condemnation of lands of a defaulting defendant, prematurely entered, and inoperative, and entering a final decree, such former orders not purporting to adjudge the rights of any of the other defendants or condemn any of the other lands, is not prejudicial as to such other defendants.

5. Where an appeal by defendant in condemnation proceedings is from the judgment, and upon the judgment roll alone, and there is nothing to show whether defendant presented a cost bill, or incurred any costs, or that, if a cost bill was presented, it contained only proper items of cost, it will be presumed in support of the judgment that defendant failed to present a bill of costs showing items properly chargeable to plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county.

Action by Alameda county against Mary Ives Crocker, Isabella E. Jordan, and others, to condemn lands for a public highway. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Isabella E. Jordan appeals. Affirmed.

R. E. Hewett, for appellant. Mastick, Belcher & Mastick and A. L. Rhodes, for defendants and respondent. T. C. Huxley and Charles E. Snook, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to condemn lands for a public highway in the county of Alameda. There were twelve defendants named in the complaint, four of whom were sued by the fictitious names of John Doe, Richard Roe, John White, and James Black. Mary V. Baldwin, George W. Patterson, R. W. Allen, and Catharine M. Allen, whose names do not appear in the complaint, appeared as defendants. George W. Patterson answered under the name of Richard Roe, claiming to own the land alleged to belong to A. Patterson. R. W. Allen was served under the name of Richard Roe. Catharine M. Allen appeared by demurrer under a fictitious name, not stated. The Allens (R. W. and Catharine) answered "as sued and served under fictitious names" (the fictitious names not stated), claiming to own the land alleged to belong to Mrs. F. J. Hall, alias Phebe J. Hall, defendant named in the complaint; and Mary V. Baldwin appeared by demurrer under the name of John Doe. No amendment of the complaint was made inserting the true names of these four who appeared after the complaint was filed. Defendant Pope defaulting, a preliminary decree was entered against him August 24, 1894, and a final decree October 29, 1894, condemning his lands, and on March 13, 1895, the final decree against Pope was amended as to description of his lands. Defaults as to all the other defendants were taken, except as to defendants Crocker, Dillon, the Allens, and appellant, Jordan, and upon the issues raised by their answers the case was tried August 25, 1896. The court filed findings, and ordered judgment for plaintiff as prayed for. Thereafter an interlocutory decree, and subsequently a final decree, were entered, which final decree included all the defendants in the case. From these last two mentioned decrees the appeal is taken by Isabella E. Jordan.

1. The court made the following finding: "That all the facts alleged in the complaint * * * are true, except as to those hereinafter otherwise specified, and as to those allegations the court finds as follows." The court then takes up the parties, and the several pieces of property sought to be condemned, and finds specifically as to the ownership, acreage, value, and damages and benefits to the tracts belonging to defendants Crocker and Dillon, appellant, Jordan, Phebe Hall (found to belong to R. W. and Catharine Allen); and as conclusions of law the court finds that Crocker and Dillon, Jordan, and the Allens are entitled to damages. Appellant contends that the above finding is insufficient, because uncertain and obscure. It is said: "It may mean that it was the intention of the court to indicate subsequently in its findings those allegations which it found to be untrue, or it may mean that all the allegations of the complaint were true except so far as inconsistent with the facts subsequently found." It is claimed that, if the former of these intentions is to be taken as the purpose of the court, it failed to point out the allegations it intended to declare to be untrue; and, if the second construction suggested be the true one, then the general finding in question would not comply with the Code,—citing Johnson v. Squires, 53 Cal. 37; Harlan v. Ely, 55 Cal. 340; Bank v. Treadwell, Id. 379. We think the natural reading of the finding is, in effect, that all the facts alleged in the complaint are true except as to those facts therein alleged and in the findings otherwise specified, as to which the facts are not necessarily untrue, but are as found specifically by the court. In the cases cited the finding left something undetermined, so that the court could not ascertain precisely what facts had been found. Here the finding is that the facts set forth in the complaint are true except as to certain particulars, and as to these the facts are as specifically found. For example: The complaint alleged that the value of the land belonging to defendants Crocker and Dillon does not exceed $1. The finding is that its value is $50. And so as to appellant's land, sought to be condemned, which was alleged to be of the value of $1, the finding is that it is of the value of $60. Certain land is alleged to belong to Phebe Hall, and the court found that the Allens were the owners. But it is said that, if the finding be sufficient, then it adopts as true the allegation of the complaint that the four fictitious defendants have or claim to have some interest in the property sought to be condemned, and that this finding is capable of the construction that the fictitious defendant sued as James Black is not merely an incumbrancer but the owner of the whole, or a portion of, or an undivided interest in, the lands specially found to belong to defendants Crocker, Dillon, Allen, or Jordan, and, if this be so, the two findings destroy each other. This might be true if there had been an unqualified finding that Black is the owner of an interest in any of the lands found to be entirely owned by some one or more other defendants and if Black had been a real party, and there was any issue made as to his interest. But the court found specifically as to the ownership of all the lands sought to be condemned, and as to all lands about which there was any issue presented. This finding necessarily excluded the idea of any ownership in Black, and was, in effect, a finding against him.

2. It is contended that the judgment is erroneous as to the Allens, Patterson, and Baldwin, as to whom the complaint was not amended, citing McKinlay v. Tuttle, 42 Cal. 572, and Baldwin v. Bornheimer, 48 Cal. 434. In McKinlay v. Tuttle certain defendants—the Castros—were served by fictitious names, and appeared and answered, but the complaint was not amended by inserting therein their true names, and it was held, under section 69 of the practice act, that, when the true name is discovered, the pleading must be amended, if it is intended to bind such person by the judgment. And this has been held to be the law under section 474 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Bachman v. Cathry, 113 Cal. 498, 45 Pac. 814. In the case cited in 48 Cal., supra, the rule in McKinlay v. Tuttle, supra, was approved, and the court affirmed the order denying a new trial, but ordered the lower court "to amend the complaint, or cause the same to be amended, as of date prior to the judgment in said court, by the insertion therein of the name of Engel Bornheimer as a party defendant." I think it essential that there should be a valid judgment against all defendants whose lands are sought to be condemned (Butte Co. v. Boydston, 68 Cal. 189, 8 Pac. 835), and that the judgment, without amending the complaint, cannot be supported (Bachman v. Cathry, supra); but I think the course pointed out in Baldwin v. Bornheimer, supra, should be followed. There is no necessity or reason for subjecting the parties to a new trial on account of the failure to amend the complaint in the particular complained of.

The point that the judgment is erroneous because it fails to ascertain and determine the specific rights, in the land condemned, of the defendants sued by fictitious names, is disposed of by what has already been said. There are no such lands, the specific rights in which have not been determined.

3. It is claimed that when the court rendered judgment against Pope it exercised its powers, and exhausted them for the purposes of the action, and the subsequent judgment must be void. It appears that on August 24, 1894, the court ordered that plaintiff pay to Pope the sum of $1 within 30 days, and "that upon such payment being made within said time the final order condemning and taking said strip of land be made and entered." This order was entered before appellant and some other defendants had answered. After the answers of some, but not all, of the defendants appearing were filed, the court, on October 29, 1894, "ordered, adjudged, and decreed" that "all the estate * * * of the defendant R. T. Pope, * * * and the same are hereby condemned for the purpose of a highway." On the same day the court made and entered an amended order as to Pope, referring to what it terms the "preliminary order of condemnation made and filed in this court on the 24th day of August, 1895 (should be 1894)." Appended to this order is an order dated March 13, 1895, reciting that an error was made in the description of the land contained in the order first made on October 29, 1894, and declaring that the true description is as in the last order of that date. Some of the defendants appeared by answer or demurrer after this order was entered; and finally, on April 25, 1896, the cause was tried, and the court made its findings, and entered its decree adjudging the rights of all the parties, including Pope; and on July 25, 1896, the court entered its final decree of condemnation as to all the land sought to be condemned, and as to all the defendants, including Pope. The court apparently treated the earlier orders or decrees made by it as prematurely entered and inoperative, and in support of the judgment it may be presumed that the court made an order vacating the first orders as to Pope. Those orders did not purport to adjudge the rights of any of the other defendants, or condemn any of the other lands; nor could the court have done so at that stage of the proceedings, for some of the defendants had not yet answered. The record was not yet in condition for a final decree. No possible harm came to appellant, and Pope is not appealing. See the subject discussed in 1 Freem. Judgm. § 16 et seq.; Fox v. Mining Co., 112 Cal. 568, 44 Pac. 1022. As to the necessity for a final judgment of condemnation as to all defendants, see Butte Co. v. Boydston, supra.

4. It is contended that the court erred in not awarding the defendants, whose lands were condemned, their costs of the action, citing City of San Francisco v. Collins, 98 Cal. 259, 33 Pac. 56. That case holds that the power to allow or not to allow costs in condemnation proceedings under section 1255, Code Civ. Proc., is limited by section 14, art. 1, of the constitution. See, also, Town Co. v. Neal, 88 Cal. 50, 25 Pac. 977. But it is held that the court had discretion to determine what are improper items of cost in proceedings of this kind, and to disallow such as are improper, as in other cases. This appeal is from the judgment and upon the judgment roll alone. There is nothing here to show whether appellant presented a cost bill or incurred any costs, or that, if she did so present a cost bill, it contained only proper items of cost. It must be presumed, in support of the judgment, that appellant failed to present a bill of costs showing items properly chargeable to plaintiff. We think the judgments appealed from should be affirmed, with directions to the court below to amend the complaint, or cause the same to be amended as of a date prior to the judgment of condemnation entered April 25, 1896, in said court, by the insertion therein of the names, Mary V. Baldwin, George W. Patterson, R. W. Allen, and Catharine M. Allen, as parties defendant.

We concur: BRITT, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgments appealed from are affirmed, with directions to the court below to amend the complaint, or cause the same to be amended, as of a date prior to the judgment of condemnation entered April 25, 1896, in said court, by the insertion therein of the names, Mary V. Baldwin, George W. Patterson, R. W. Allen, and Catharine M. Allen as parties defendant.

MOORE v. HOFFMAN et al. (S. F. 1,119.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1899.)

HOMESTEAD—CONVEYANCE OF UNDIVIDED INTEREST—RIGHTS OF GRANTEE.

A conveyance of the interest of a child in the homestead of a deceased parent will not constitute the grantee a tenant in common with the surviving parent, and entitle him, as such, to share the possession of the homestead with such parent.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county.

Action by Helen M. Moore against Alice Hoffman and another for the possession of certain real estate. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Chas. B. Younger, for appellant. Frank M. Stone, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. Plaintiff avers in her complaint that she is the owner of the undivided one-half of certain described land, and is entitled to the possession thereof, and that defendants are unlawfully in possession of said land; and she prays for the recovery of the possession of the land from defendants, with damages, etc. The defendants, in their answer, admit that plaintiff is the owner and entitled to possession of the undivided one-third of the premises, and afterwards, at the trial, admitted that she was entitled to one-half; but they say that the defendant Alice is the owner of an undivided interest in the land as tenant in common with plaintiff, and they claim only the right to hold possession jointly with plaintiff as tenant in common. The jury found for the defendants, for whom judgment was rendered; and plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

Appellant makes many points for a reversal, which, under our view of the case, need not be discussed; for, waiving all contentions of appellant as to minor matters, the court erred as to the leading question in the case, which goes to the real merits of the controversy.

William H. Moore died intestate, seised of the land in question, leaving a widow, the appellant herein, and three minor children, Charles Moore, Stella Moore, and William M. Moore. Afterwards, and during the administration of his estate, to wit, on April 26, 1881, the court in which the administration was pending duly set apart the land in question here as a probate homestead to the appellant, as widow, and the minor children;

the order setting it apart declaring that one half should go to the widow, and the other half to the children, or one-sixth to each of them. On September 11, 1889, Charles Moore, one of the children, who had then attained his majority, conveyed by deed to Alice Hoffman, one of the respondents, an undivided two-fifteenths of an undivided one-sixth of the land; and under this deed the said Alice and the other respondent, her husband, William C. Hoffman, who was also made a party defendant, claim the right to possession as tenants in common with appellant. It does not expressly appear whether or not the other two children had attained majority at the time this suit was commenced, although, according to certain dates which the record shows, they probably had; and, for the purposes of the case, we will assume that all the children were of legal age at the time of the commencement of this action, as that view is the most favorable to respondents. The question in the case presented by the foregoing facts is, can the grantee of one of the children, in a case like this, legally go into possession of the homestead as the tenant in common with the widow? The question arose in various ways, and principally upon the instructions of the court to the jury. The court instructed that, if Charles Moore deeded an interest to Alice Hoffman, as above stated, then "that, unless it had been shown by evidence that Alice Hoffman has since disposed of her interest in said land, that she is, and has been since said date, a tenant in common with plaintiff, and you must find for the defendants," and that her husband had a right to be in possession with her, and refused to instruct that neither of the children "could give any right to any person to the possession of said homestead against said plaintiff."

The purpose of a homestead is to secure a home to those clothed with the homestead right,—to each and all of them; and the power of a stranger to enter into the possession of the land, and, as a tenant in common, to interfere with its occupancy and control by the homestead claimants, and to have it partitioned, or sold if division be impracticable, would be inconsistent with the very nature of a homestead, and violative of the very purpose for which homesteads are created. Probate homesteads are, of course, for the benefit of minor children, when there are such, as well as for the surviving wife or husband; and our attention has not been called to any adjudication in this state where in such a case the grantee of a child has undertaken to disturb the possession of the other homestead claimants, but the principle which is clearly applicable to the case at bar was declared and applied, where the party asserting the right of possession was the grantee of the widow, in Hoppe v. Hoppe. 104 Cal. 94, 37 Pac. 894. In that case, where a probate homestead had been set apart to the widow and minor children, the widow had mortgaged all her interest in the homestead premises; and it was held that a purchaser at the foreclosure of the mortgage had no right to possession, as against the minor children, until their homestead rights had ceased, which would occur at their majority. The court announced the principle above stated as follows: "The homestead is a place of abode for the family, and no act of any member of the family can in any way prejudice the rights of the others to occupy it." Counsel for respondents seems to think that the Hoppe Case decides that the rights of all the homestead claimants ceased when the children arrived at majority, because the court said that the premises were to "remain as a homestead, without any power in either of the parties interested to destroy its quality as a homestead until after all of the children shall have arrived at majority," and "it must remain intact until the youngest child has reached its majority." But this language was used in a case where the rights of the minor children were being asserted as against the act of the widow, not where the rights of the widow were being asserted as against the acts of the children. When the children arrive at majority, their interest in the homestead, as a homestead, ceases, for they no longer constitute a part of the family, and whatever property rights they thereafter have in the land covered by the homestead are in the nature of those of remaindermen or reversioners. After their majority, the widow, being the only homestead claimant left, could, of course, dispose of her interests in the land, because there would then be no other homestead claimant to contest her right to do so; and it was in view of this situation that the court said in the Hoppe Case that she could not destroy the homestead while any of the children were minors. But exactly the same principle applies in favor of the widow as against the grantee of a child. Such grantee cannot disturb her possession until her homestead right has been extinguished either by her own act or by operation of law, and it cannot be extinguished by any act of one or all of the children, either before or after their majority. The rights of a homestead claimant cannot be affected by an instrument in writing to which such claimant is not a party. See Phelan v. Smith, 100 Cal. 166, 34 Pac. 667. The governing principle is that the homestead right continues in favor of any one of the family for whom it was created as long as he or she asserts it and remains in a position to assert it. This rule has been declared in other states, for, while not many of their statutory provisions about homesteads are exactly like ours, still they are sufficiently similar to make the principle applicable. See cases cited in opinion of Harrison, J., in Hoppe v. Hoppe, on page 101, 104 Cal., and page 895, 37 Pac. In Keyes v. Hill, 30 Vt. 768, the supreme court of Vermont declares the law as follows: "We think the clear design of the law is to continue the homestead entire, as the home of the widow, or of the widow and children constituting the family at the decease of the husband, housekeeper, or head of the family, and that no rights of the children become operative to sever or divert such homestead from full occupancy and enjoyment as a family home, as long as the widow, or widow and children, see fit to continue it as such family home." The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

We concur: TEMPLE, J.; HENSHAW, J.

125 Cal. 44

PEOPLE v. MILLER. (Gr. 528.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 10, 1899.)

HOMICIDE—JUROR—COMPETENCY.

1. On his voir dire, in a murder trial, a juror stated he had read accounts of the killing, and had heard it discussed by persons making statements they said were true. From what he had heard and read he had formed an opinion rather unfavorable to accused, if what he heard and read was true. He did not know deceased or witnesses, and it would take some evidence to remove his opinion. Held that, since it did not appear but what the juror had formed his opinion from talks with an eyewitness, or a witness on the trial, the statutory exception to the common-law rule disqualifying juror with an opinion of guilt (Pen. Code, § 1076) that, where the juror's opinion is founded on "public rumor, statements in public journals, or common notoriety," the court could exercise discretion in accepting him, did not apply, and it was error to accept him.

2. An instruction on a trial for murder that no man by his lawless acts can create a necessity for acting in self-defense, and that the plea, of necessity, is a shield only to those who are without fault in occasioning it, but that defendant can show in justification that, though he brought upon himself an imminent danger, he, in the presence of that necessity, changed his mind, and endeavored to escape from it, but could not without striking a mortal blow, though not approved, does not constitute error.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county.

Frank Miller was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Reversed.

E. V. Spencer and H. D. Burroughs, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Ford, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendant has been convicted of murder, and sentenced to imprisonment for life. He now claims that a challenge interposed to the juror De Forest, upon the ground of actual bias, should have been allowed. The attorney general, in his brief, sums up the evidence of the juror upon his voir dire examination in the following form (this summation being a fair one, and fully as favorable to the people as the circumstances justify): Upon examination the juror said: "That he had read newspaper accounts of the killing, had heard the matter discussed by persons, but did not know whether such persons assumed to know the facts or not, but they made certain statements which they said were true. He did not know whether such statements were true or not. From what he had heard and read he had formed an opinion rather unfavorable to defendant; that is, if what he had heard and read was true. He did not know deceased, nor who the witnesses were. It would take a little evidence to remove the opinion he had. He had no reason to disbelieve the statements he had heard. The only impression he had about the case was a sort of impressionable opinion formed from the statements he had heard from others. If sworn as a juror he would try to lay aside his opinion entirely and act solely and entirely upon the evidence. He could not entirely dismiss the opinion from his mind. He was not a man that made up his mind from newspaper reports and rumors. His opinion would not have great weight with him in trying the case. He would commence the trial of the case with an impressionable opinion, subject to be changed upon the introduction and production of almost any evidence that would disprove it. He would regard the statement he had heard as entitled to but little weight. The statements were made by parties he had known for years, and whom he believed were telling the truth, and he believed them. He had some idea that they might be mistaken. He would take the instructions of the court as to the law."

Upon the foregoing state of facts the challenge to the juror, upon the ground of actual bias, should have been allowed. The juror went into the box with an opinion that the defendant was guilty. Such condition of the juror's mind was an absolute disqualification at common law. Under the Penal Code of this state, a single exception is found to the common-law rule, and that exception is declared in section 1076. This juror was clearly disqualified, unless he came within the provisions of the aforesaid section. The exception found in the law covers the single case where the opinion of the juror is "founded upon public rumor, statements in public journals, or common notoriety," and it further appears to the court, from the declarations of the party under oath, that he can and will, notwithstanding his opinion, act impartially and fairly upon the matters submitted to him. The court is not allowed to hold that a juror is qualified when he is impressed with an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of a defendant, unless that opinion is based alone upon one or more of the cases enumerated in the aforesaid section of the Code. When the opinion is based upon one or more of these causes, then the court has a wide margin allowed it in weighing, measuring, and testing the party's declarations for the purpose of ascertaining his fairness and impartiality in passing upon the defendant's guilt or innocence. And here, if it appeared from the evidence that the opinion of the juror had been formed from public rumors, newspaper articles, or common notoriety, the finding of the court as to his competency probably would not be disturbed; but we have no such showing. As far as this record discloses, any one of the parties with whom the juror conversed as to the circumstances of the killing may have been an eyewitness to the tragedy and an important witness at the trial. The record must show affirmatively a contrary state of facts to this, or the exception in section 1076 to the common-law rule cannot be invoked. There is nothing in the evidence which would justify the conclusion that the opinion of the juror was founded alone upon public rumors, statements in public journals, or common notoriety. This case, in principle, is directly in line with People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 227, 34 Pac. 718. It is there said: "But in order that a juror, disqualified at common law by reason of having previously formed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, may come within this provision of the statute, it must appear affirmatively to the court, from the evidence before it, that such opinion is formed from public rumors or statements of public journals, or common notoriety." Some other jurors were placed in the box whose competency came close to the border line; but it becomes unnecessary to consider the questions involved as to them.

The trial court gave an instruction to the jury upon the law of self-defense. This instruction was taken bodily from the cases of People v. Kennett, 114 Cal. 18, 45 Pac. 994, and People v. Roemer, 114 Cal. 51, 45 Pac. 1003, where it was approved by a divided court. At the same time it was substantially said in the Roemer Case that "trial judges are not advised to make further use of it." This instruction, aside from the qualification, is unsound. See People v. Button, 106 Cal. 628, 39 Pac. 1073; People v. Conkling, 111 Cal. 616, 44 Pac. 314; People v. Farley (Cr. 494; filed June 2, 1899) 57 Pac. 571. In the Roemer and Kennett Cases it was held that this mass of bad law was so neutralized, and enriched for the better, by a qualification found at the end of the instruction as not to be absolutely vicious. To work such a result, the qualification must have been held by the court to have had the effect of a very powerful antidote. But, in view of the holding made in those cases, the giving of the instruction here does not constitute error. Yet no good purpose can ever be subserved by giving it, and it should never be done. There is nothing further disclosed by the record demanding the consideration of the court. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

KENNEY v. PARKS et al. (L. A. 405.)

DEEDS—EXECUTION—DELIVERY—SUFFICIENCY.

A grantor's deposit of a deed with a bank cashier, to be filed for record if the grantor died during the life of the grantee, and otherwise to be returned, is not a sufficient delivery to vest title in the grantee.

In bank.

On rehearing. Reversed.

For opinion in department, see 54 Pac. 251.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action in equity to reform a deed, quiet title, and for general relief. The plaintiff is the widow of Joseph A. Kenney, deceased, and the defendants are the executors of his last will and testament, joined with certain of his heirs at law. Judgment went for plaintiff, and this appeal is prosecuted therefrom. The leading question involved arises upon the sufficiency of the findings of fact to support the judgment, and by reason of the views we entertain upon that proposition it becomes unnecessary to review the minor matters discussed which bear upon the legal sufficiency of the complaint, and which are presented by special demurrer.

The evidence presents no important conflict, and by the evidence and the findings it appears that plaintiff and the deceased, Joseph A. Kenney, were husband and wife, and each owned considerable property, both real and personal. Having no children, they entered into an agreement in writing wherein they mutually agreed to execute deeds each to the other, conveying absolutely, in fee simple, all of their respective estates, both real and personal, situate in Santa Barbara county; and agreed that said deeds should be placed as escrows in the hands of the cashier of the First National Bank in Santa Barbara, with directions to said cashier that, if the plaintiff should die during the lifetime of said Joseph A. Kenney, he, the said cashier, should, on request of said Joseph A. Kenney or his agents, file the deed by the plaintiff to said Joseph A. of record in the county recorder's office in said county, and, if said Joseph A. should die during the lifetime of the plaintiff, said cashier, at the request of the plaintiff or her agent, should file said deed of Joseph A. to her in said recorder's office. This agreement was executed, and the deeds delivered to the cashier, as therein provided. These deeds were inclosed in separate envelopes, and these envelopes were similarly indorsed by the respective parties, the indorsement of the husband being as follows: "The inclosed deed, dated the 1st day of June, 1892, is herewith deposited in escrow with the cashier of the First National Bank of Santa Barbara, and the said cashier, who may be such cashier at my decease, if I should die during the lifetime of my wife, is hereby instructed and commanded, at my decease, on request of my said wife or her agent, to open this envelope at once, and to file the inclosed deed for record with the recorder of Santa Barbara county." Joseph A. Kenney died; whereupon his wife, the plaintiff, demanded of the cashier that his deed to her be recorded or delivered to her. This demand was refused, whereupon she inaugurated the present litigation, claiming title to the husband's property under his aforesaid deed delivered to the cashier of the bank.

The question presented is, has the title to the property described in the husband's deed passed to the wife? And the solution of this question depends upon the fact as to the sufficiency of the delivery of the deed by the grantor, the husband. The agreement entered into between the husband and the wife declares the two deeds are to be placed in the hands of the cashier as escrows. But so christening them did not have the effect of making them escrows. When placed in the hands of the cashier, they were in no sense escrows. Where an instrument is deposited with a third party to await the performance of some condition by the grantee, such instrument becomes an escrow. Civ. Code, § 1057. The evidence here presents no such case. Upon the contrary, we have a direct grant or no deed whatever.

Was the delivery of the husband's deed to the cashier sufficient to pass the title to the wife? Upon mature consideration, we have arrived at the conclusion that no title whatever passed. While it is not so expressed in the agreement, yet the intention of both parties is plain that the party surviving should have his or her deed returned in case the other party should die, and that no title to the property described in the deed of the party living should vest. In other words, the plaintiff having survived her husband, her deed is to be returned to her, and title to her property remain vested in her. Under the laws of this state, the title to the property vested presently when the deeds were delivered, or it did not vest at all. Yet, as to the plaintiff's property, it is apparent that no title ever vested in the husband under her deed. Such being the case as to her property, it is most difficult to see how title to his property, by his deed, ever vested in her.

The general principles of law involved in this case are quite fully discussed in Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338. In the decision of that case many authorities are cited supporting the conclusion declared, and with that conclusion we are entirely satisfied. It is there said: "The essential requisite to the validity of a deed transferred under circumstances as indicated in this case is that, when it is placed in the hands of a third party, it has passed beyond the control of the grantor for all time." In the present case, by the agreement of the grantor and grantee, it was understood that the grantor's deed was to be returned to him upon the happening of a certain event, to wit, the death of the other party. And at this time it may be assumed that the plaintiff's deed has been returned to her, or at least has been treated as of no force and effect. In the Bury Case it is also said: "In every case where the deed has been declared invalid by reason of failure of delivery, it will be found that the grantor reserved some rights over the instrument; that upon the happening of some event, or contingency, or condition, he had the right, if so disposed, to reach out and take it from the possession of the depository." The present case comes squarely within that description. Here the grantor reserved the right to recall his deed upon the happening of a certain event. When that event happened, he had the right to reach out and take back the deed, and such reservation is fatal to a valid delivery.

The all-controlling fact in this case, which defeats plaintiff's claim, is that, when the deeds were made and delivered to the cashier of the bank, the respective grantors did not absolutely part with all future dominion and control over them, but, upon the contrary, the actual intention and understanding of each grantor was that upon the death of the other the survivor should take back his own deed, and that no title should vest under it. The decision in Bury v. Young, supra, was rested upon a directly contrary state of facts, namely, that the grantor has parted with the control and possession of his deed for all time. It is declared in that case that the doctrine there laid down would not be enlarged. The validity of the deed here involved, and upon which plaintiff rests her claims, cannot be supported without greatly extending that doctrine. For the foregoing reasons, and under the authority of Bury v. Young, supra, Wittenbrock v. Cass, 110 Cal. 1, 42 Pac. 300, and Ruiz v. Dow, 113 Cal. 490, 45 Pac. 867, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

REID v. F. W. KRELING'S SONS' CO.
(S. F. 1,151.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1899.)
PARTNERSHIP — INCORPORATION — LIABILITY FOR FIRM DEBTS.

1. Where a partnership incorporates, and the company continues to use the firm books, and continues the various running accounts without break, it is estopped to set up the incorporation as a defense against one who, without notice of the change, sells it goods, and charges them to the firm.

2. That a portion of goods sold to a firm was used by the partners individually does not relieve a corporation which succeeds the firm from liability for the goods.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by J. S. Reid against F. W. Kreling's Sons' Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. A. McGowan, for appellant. Chas. Wesley Reed, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. Action to recover $1,004.44 for goods sold defendant by the S. F. Novelty Plating Works, a corporation, which assigned its claim therefor to plaintiff. The court below gave judgment to plaintiff for the amount sued for, and defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

We see no reason for disturbing the judgment, which is clearly a just one. There is no question about the amount of the goods furnished, or the actual balance due thereon. The whole defense is upon the ground that the members of a co-partnership, which had been dealing with the respondent's assignor, changed the co-partnership into a corporation, and continued to deal with said assignor as before, without his knowledge that such change had been made. For many years prior to the year 1894 F. W. Kreling & Sons had been carrying on a certain business as co-partners, and prior to and during the year 1894 they had a running account with plaintiff's assignor. Some time in 1894 they concluded to continue their business under the form of a corporation instead of a partnership, and for that purpose formed a corporation called F. W. Kreling's Sons' Company. It seems that they considered themselves a corporation in April, 1894, at which time they signed certain papers relating to the proposed change, and commenced at that time to conduct their business in the corporate name; but articles of incorporation were not filed until September 1st, and a certificate of the incorporation was not issued by the secretary of state until October 5th. But no matter at what time they assumed to change, or did legally change, from a partnership to a corporation, plaintiff's assignor had no notice of the change until a short time before the commencement of this action, and continued as usual to send them goods, and sent bills in which F. W. Kreling & Sons were named as purchasers and debtors; and these goods and bills were received by appellant, and their amounts entered on its own books, and payments were made from time to time to plaintiff's assignor without any objection whatever, and without any notification to him that what was formerly a partnership had become a corporation with substantially the same name. The corporation took the assets of the co-partnership, and, as the evidence shows, continued to pay the debts of the latter, and to conduct the business just as before. Indeed, the corporation used the very books which had been used by the co-partnership, and continued and extended therein the various running accounts without break. Under these circumstances, the appellant is estopped from setting up a defense founded upon the change from a co-partnership to a corporation, as against the cause of action here sued on. The fact that a small part of the goods was used by some of the Krelings individually in improving certain real property makes no difference. They were ordered and sold in the same manner as the other goods, and in like manner were credited and entered in the books of both parties; and, under the above views, payments made by appellant after September 1st were properly applied to indebtedness on the running account that had accrued before that time. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

(S. F. 822.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 19, 1899.)
APPEAL AND ERROR—QUESTIONS OF FACT—REMITTITUR OF EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

Where the evidence in a personal injury case is conflicting, the action of the trial court in granting a new trial on plaintiff's refusal to enter a remittitur will not be reviewed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Michael Joseph Doolin and wife against the Omnibus Cable Company. Judgment was for plaintiffs, and from an order granting a new trial on refusal to enter a remittitur the plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. L. Barnes, for appellants. Sullivan & Sullivan, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Defendant, a street-railway corporation, was engaged in the business of transporting passengers for hire on certain streets of the city of San Francisco. On November 17, 1891, the plaintiff Mary J. Doolin, wife of Michael J. Doolin, who joins with her in this action, was a passenger on one of defendant's cars. The driver in charge thereof lost control of the horses by which the car was drawn, and they pulled it from the track and down an embankment. Plaintiffs allege in their complaint that this was in consequence of the negligence of the defendant and its servant, the driver, and that thereby said Mary was violently thrown against the seat and floor of the car and sustained severe personal injuries, for which they pray damages. The trial of the action was commenced on September 25, 1893, and was concluded October 9, 1893. The evidence for plaintiffs tended to show that, as the result of said accident, Mrs. Doolin fell on the floor of the car, and sustained, besides some minor hurts, a concussion of the spine, which drew after it a train of evil consequences, such as great nervous debility, incompetence to walk without assistance, retention of urine, incoherence of speech, impaired vision, impaired memory, sleeplessness, hysterical and other effects, all of which, her counsel claim, "rendered her a physical wreck, and seriously impaired her mind and memory." She appeared at the trial as a witness on her own behalf. There was evidence for both sides that on May 8, 1893, an examination of Mrs. Doolin, with a view to ascertaining her physical and mental condition, was made by some medical gentlemen; three of them acting at the instance of the defendant, and three or four others on behalf of the plaintiffs. Several of them testified at the trial (both those for plaintiffs and those for defendant) that upon such examination they discovered that the patient had either a uterine or ovarian tumor (they differing as to its precise locality), which was then about the size of a coconut; and plaintiffs' family physician, who participated in such examination, testified that at time of the trial such tumor had become about four times as large as it appeared to be when first discovered. Most of the medical witnesses expressed the opinion that concussion of the spine would not produce the tumor, though one of those called for plaintiffs stated that "it could have been produced by a shock to the patient in this way; that, from the fact of a hemorrhage having followed from the blow, a certain amount of fluid may have been thrown out into the interstices of the womb, and that may have become a nidus for a tumor." For the defendant there was further evidence tending to show that the embankment down which the car was drawn was but slight, and that the car was not overturned; that Mrs. Doolin was not thrown down; that she then exhibited no signs of injury; that she stated to several persons then and on the following day that she was not hurt, but had been frightened and made a little nervous; and that the symptoms she subsequently manifested were those of hysteria, or other causes not dependent upon concussion of the spine, important among which causes was the tumor above mentioned. There was a verdict for plaintiffs in the sum of $20,000. Defendant moved for a new trial upon the grounds, among others, that the damages are excessive, and appear to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice; that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict; and newly-discovered evidence, material for defendant, which it could not with reasonable diligence have discovered and produced at the trial. At the hearing of the motion it was a fact admitted on both sides that 10 days after the trial, viz. on October 19, 1893, Mrs. Doolin gave birth to a child at full term, which, however, was stillborn, and that she had not been affected with a tumor at all. In an affidavit of Mrs. Doolin, she stated that she did not know of her pregnancy until a day or two before the birth of the child; that until then she was advised by reputable physicians, and believed, that her symptoms in that particular were due to the presence of a tumor. The court made an order that, unless plaintiffs remit the sum of $15,000 from the judgment, a new trial would be granted; the order concluding with the statement that it was made "on the sole ground that the verdict herein is excessive." Plaintiffs not complying with such condition, the court ordered finally that the motion for new trial be granted "on the sole ground that said verdict is excessive." This appeal is from both of said orders.

Plaintiffs contend that it is only when excessive damages appear "to have been given," in the language of the statute, "under the influence of passion or prejudice" (Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 5), that the court can make such excess the ground for a new trial, and that in the present instance the evidence so clearly shows the verdict to have been intrinsically reasonable that the action of the court in requiring the plaintiffs to remit $15,000 therefrom as the condition of denying a new trial was an abuse of discretion. To say that a verdict for damages was enhanced by passion or prejudice is one mode of saying that the evidence did not justify it; and the only means of discovering therein the element of passion or prejudice, within the meaning of the statute, is by comparing the amount with the evidence which was before the court at the trial. Harrison v. Railway Co., 116 Cal. 156, 47 Pac. 1019. Whatever may be the rule which should govern the trial judge, it is certain that when his action in granting a new trial on the ground of excessive damages, or requiring a reduction of the amount as the condition of denying one, comes to be reviewed on appeal, his order will not be reversed unless it plainly appears that he abused his discretion; and the cases teach that, when there is material conflict of evidence regarding the extent of damage, the imputation of such abuse is repelled, the same as if the ground of the order were insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. The record of the case just cited from 116 Cal. and 47 Pac. shows that precisely the same practice was pursued there as in the present case. The court ordered that defendant's motion for new trial be denied, provided the plaintiff would consent to a reduction of his verdict from $8,000 to $4,000. Plaintiff refused, and the rule was made absolute on the sole ground that the verdict was excessive. On appeal the plaintiff urged the same objections that plaintiffs make here,—that the record did not indicate passion or prejudice in the verdict of the jury, and that the trial judge had no proper control over it. But this court pointed out that there was evidence regarding the amount of damage, upon which the views of men might differ, and said, "Every intendment is to be indulged here in support of the action of the court below, and it will not be disturbed if the question of its propriety be open to debate." Accordingly the order was affirmed. See, further, Townsend v. Briggs, 88 Cal. 230, 26 Pac. 108; Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 411, 35 Pac. 1024; Lee v. Railroad Co., 101 Cal. 118, 35 Pac. 572; Mills v. Navigation Co., 102 Cal. 357, 36 Pac. 772. Since in the case before us the court below saw the person injured and heard her testimony, since the evidence was conflicting concerning the extent of the injuries she sustained at the time of the accident, and whether the distressing symptoms which she afterwards manifested were attributable to those injuries was in considerable measure a question of opinion, upon which experts differed, it is plain that the case is not such that we can say the court was without data upon which to revise the verdict.

Plaintiffs say, however, that the opinions which assigned the cause of Mrs. Doolin's illness in any degree to the presence of a tumor in her genital organs are shown to have been mistaken. This is a fact, and, as both sides rely on it to maintain their respective views touching the action of the court in requiring a reduction of the amount of the verdict, we are justified in considering it pertinent to that question, although it was developed by affidavit to support the branch of defendant's motion assigned on newly-discovered evidence. It must be remembered in this connection that some testimony of the same character for plaintiffs tended to attribute the supposed tumor itself to the shock of the accident. Since the time of Mr. Pope, it has been often inquired, "Who shall decide when doctors disagree?" The case shows that serious error may lurk in their conclusions, even when they have agreed, by which we mean no reflection upon the learned and very important profession of which the expert witnesses at the trial seem to have been respectable members; for all opinion evidence is, from its nature, fallible to a degree beyond that of most other kinds of evidence which the law deems competent. The evidence here for both parties having been so largely of that character, there seems to be on that account less reason for impugning the discretion which allowed a new trial. We cannot see that the orders appealed from were an abuse of such discretion. They should therefore be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the orders appealed from are affirmed.

BLACKBURN et al. v. BELL. (L. A. 475.) (Supreme Court of California. June 21, 1899.)

THRESHER'S LIEN—ENFORCEMENT.

The lien given by St. 1885, p. 109, for services for work on a threshing machine to extend for 10 days after the person shall cease such work, expires, unless suit on the claim is brought, within 10 days after the party ceases work.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county.

Action by J. W. Blackburn and others against M. Bell. From a judgment denying plaintiffs a threshers' lien and their claim for attorney's fees, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

P. O. Chilstrom and G. F. Witter, Jr., for appellants. Chas. A. Palmer (G. Ward Kemp, of counsel), for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. The plaintiffs were engaged in San Luis Obispo county as threshers, and the action is for their wages as such, and to enforce a thresher's lien, under the act of 1885 (St. 1885, p. 109). The act reads as follows:

"Section 1. Every person performing work or labor of any kind in, with, about or upon any threshing machine, the engine, horsepower, wagons or appurtenances thereof, while engaged in threshing, shall have a lien upon the same to the extent of the value of his services.

"Sec. 2. The lien herein given shall extend for ten days after the person has ceased such work or labor.

"Sec. 3. If judgment shall be recovered in any action to recover for said services for work or labor performed, and said property shall be sold, the proceeds of such sale shall be distributed pro rata to all judgment creditors who have, within ten days, begun suits to recover judgments for the amount due them for such work.

"Sec. 4. The lien shall expire unless a suit to recover the amount of the claim is brought within ten days after the party ceases work."

The findings of the court bearing on the question involved in the appeal are as follows: "First, that each and every one of the plaintiffs mentioned in said complaint was employed by the defendant to do and did perform work and labor in, with, and upon the threshing machine and appurtenances mentioned and described in said complaint while the same was engaged in threshing during the threshing season of 1896; second, that each and every one of said plaintiffs ceased such work and labor on September 16, 1896, between 11 and 12 o'clock a. m., and at no time since then has been engaged in such work and labor for defendant or any one on said machine; third, that no threshing has been done at any time with said machine since September 16, 1896; fourth, that such work and labor had ceased for more than 10 days before plaintiff commenced this action." The action was commenced September 28, 1896, and, as a conclusion of law, the court found in favor of the plaintiffs for their money demand in the aggregate sum of $416.65, but that plaintiffs had no liens upon, and cannot enforce the lien against, the threshing machine and appurtenances mentioned and described in said complaint, or at all. The plaintiffs appeal from so much of the judgment as declared that the said plaintiffs had no lien and were not entitled to an attorney's fee, and from the order denying said plaintiffs' motion for a new trial.

The evidence abundantly supports the findings of fact, and is all one way as to the time when work in the threshing ceased. Plaintiff Frank Kite, testifying in his own behalf, says: "We did no threshing for anybody after about noon of the 16th day of September, 1896. I did not know of anything further to do; supposed it was the last job." Plaintiff Ed. Copsey, in his own behalf, says: "The last day the machine was engaged in threshing was the 16th day of September, 1896. We quit about noon." Plaintiff Tom Fiers, in his own behalf, says: "The machine quit on the 16th of September, 1896, about noon. Did no work after the 16th that I know of." Defendant, Bell, says: "The machine has not done any threshing in this county for anybody since about noon, September 16, 1896." Witnesses W. D. Ashe and W. H. Brown, for defendant, testified to the same effect. Plaintiff Joe Copsey, in rebuttal, after stating that Bell had agreed to give them two days extra, says: "I knew the work was finished on the 16th day of September, 1896." William Mitchell, for plaintiffs, says: "We quit threshing about noon on the 16th day of September, 1896." This is all the testimony in reference to the time when the threshing ceased. The statute gives a lien for services mentioned therein "while engaged in threshing," and "the lien shall expire unless a suit to recover the amount of the claim is brought within ten days after the party ceases work." The lien in question is purely statutory, and the right to the same cannot be extended beyond the limits prescribed by the plain language of the law. The work while engaged in threshing having ceased on the 16th of September, the lien expired before the action was commenced, to wit, September 28th. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—CONTRACTS—COMPETITIVE BIDDING.

One cannot recover of the city and county of San Francisco for street work done for it in front of lands owned by it under a private contract awarded without competitive bidding, in violation of St. 1871-72, p. 804, requiring such contracts to be let to the lowest bidder, or of the Vrooman act, making a similar provision, if it should be regarded as having repealed said statute.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Petition for mandate by the City Improvement Company against William Broderick, auditor of the city and county of San Francisco. Judgment for defendant, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. G. W. McEnerney, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Petitioner brought mandate against the respondent. A general demurrer was sustained to his petition, and he appeals from the judgment thereafter entered. Petitioner did certain street work upon a street of the city and county of San Francisco, in front of Alamo Square, the property of the city. The cost of this particular piece of work is chargeable against, and payable out of the funds of, the city. The contract, however, was awarded without competitive bidding. Upon this ground the auditor refused to allow the demand, and it was upon this ground that the trial court sustained his general demurrer to the petition. The question involved is that of the power of the city and county of San Francisco to make a private contract, without competitive bidding, for street work in front of the lands owned by it.

The consolidation act of the city and county of San Francisco (St. 1856, p. 145) provided for the improvement of the public streets and highways of San Francisco. It made provision for the doing of street work by the municipality in front of the property owned by it, but it declared that such contracts should be let to the lowest bidder. Id. p. 156, § 38. This provision was repealed by a later act. St. 1871-72, p. 804. This statute also contained the same provision requiring the contract of the municipality for the doing of this work to be let to the lowest bidder. In Thomason v. Ashworth, 73 Cal. 73, 14 Pac. 615, it was held that the general street law (the Vrooman act) superseded the scheme provided for the city of San Francisco by the act of 1872. Under the decision in Thomason v. Ashworth, either the whole of the act of 1872 was "struck dead," or only such portion of it as was in conflict with the provisions of the Vrooman act. If the latter view be accepted, then the provisions of the act of 1872 requiring the city and county of San Francisco to let such contracts under competitive bidding is still in force, and the judgment of the trial court was therefore properly given. If, upon the other hand, the former view is to prevail, then one must look to the Vrooman act for the power of the municipality to let a contract of this kind, and herein it has been decided that no work can be done by the municipality under this law, except under competitive bidding. Pavement Co. v. Broderick, 113 Cal. 628, 45 Pac. 863. The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

1. The city of Santa Rosa is not liable to an officer and councilman thereof on an implied contract to pay for merchandise received from him, in view of Pol. Code, § 920, and charter of Santa Rosa (St. 1875-76, p. 255), prohibiting councilmen from being interested in "any contract" made by them, and page 257 of the charter, authorizing the council to allow claims, and Pen. Code, § 71, making it a crime for a councilman to be interested in a contract with the city.

2. Councilmen cannot validate a claim against the city under a void contract.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county.

Petition by mandate by F. Berka against J. G. Woodward, treasurer of the city of Santa Rosa. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

O. O. Webber and J. R. Leppo, for appellant. D. R. Gale and Campbell & Campbell, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in mandate ordering the treasurer of the city of Santa Rosa to honor and to pay two warrants issued in favor of plaintiff by the common council of the city. The warrants were in payment of lumber and materials "had and received by the city from Berka." At the times when the material was supplied, at the times when Berka presented his bills and demands for payment, and at the time when the city council allowed and approved his claims, Berka was an officer of the city and a member of its common council. These facts appear by the petition. The defendant interposed a demurrer, both general and special. This demurrer was "overruled without leave to answer," and a peremptory writ of mandate was ordered to be issued.

The question of first importance presented upon this appeal is that of the right of an officer of the city to recover upon an implied contract with the municipality. The following provisions of the law, and of the charter of the city of Santa Rosa, have direct bearing upon this consideration: "No councilman to be directly or indirectly interested in any contract made by them, or in any pay for work done under their direction or supervision." Charter Santa Rosa (St. 1875-76, p. 255). "All bills, claims and demands against the city shall be * * * filed by the city clerk, who shall present it to the council, and they shall allow or reject the same in whole or in part." Charter Santa Rosa (St. 1875-76, p. 257). "Members of the legislature, state, county, city and township officers must not be interested in any contract made by them in their official capacity, or by any body or board of which they are members." Pol. Code, § 920. "State, county, township and city officers must not be purchasers at any sale, nor vendors at any purchase made by them in their official capacity." Pol. Code, § 921. "Every contract made in violation of any of the provisions of the two preceding sections may be avoided at the instance of any party except the officer interested therein." Pol. Code, § 922. "Every officer or person prohibited by the laws of this state from making or being interested in contracts, or from becoming a vendor or purchaser at sales, or from purchasing scrip or other evidence of indebtedness, who violates any of the provisions of such laws, is punishable by a fine of not more than one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the state prison not more than five years, and is forever disqualified from any office in this state." Pen. Code, § 71. "That is not lawful which is (1) contrary to an express provision of law; (2) contrary to the policy of express law, though not expressly prohibited; or, (3) otherwise contrary to good morals." Civ. Code, § 1667. "The consideration of a contract must be lawful within the meaning of section 1667." Civ. Code, § 1607. "If any part of a single consideration for one or more objects, or of several considerations for a single object, is unlawful, the entire contract is void." Civ. Code, § 1608.

It would seem that the need of discussion is foreclosed by the mere quotation of our express laws, but respondent contends, and in his contention prevailed in the trial court, that these provisions have no application to an implied contract such as this admittedly is, and that in the case of implied contracts which are not malum in se, even though they may be against public policy, the rule is that, if the consideration has passed,—if the contract upon the one hand has been wholly executed,—the party who has so performed will be allowed a recovery upon quantum meruit or quantum valebat, as the case may be. The importance of this question, the right of an officer of the city to recover upon an implied contract with his municipality, its gravity and far-reaching consequence, demand something more than a passing consideration.

By subdivision 1 of section 1667 of the Civil Code, reference is had to contracts expressly prohibited. These will be discussed hereafter. Within subdivisions 2 and 3 of the same section are embraced the multitude of contracts which, though not expressly prohibited, are refused recognition upon grounds of public policy. These contracts, in contemplation of their subject-matter, may be divided into two distinct classes: The first, where the consideration is base and against good morals,—malum in se; the second, where the consideration is in itself lawful, but where the mode is unauthorized, or where, because of some fiduciary relation between the parties, the law will not permit the contract to be made, nor countenance it when made. As to the first, it is said in Blachford

v. Preston, 8 Term R. 95: "A plaintiff cannot recover in a court of justice whose cause of action arises out of a contract between him and the defendant in fraud or to the prejudice of third persons." Of the second Lord Mansfield and the court of king's bench, in Jones v. Randall, Cowp. 39, declared: "Many contracts which are not against morality are still void, as being against the maxims of sound policy." The first class of contracts embraces the infinite number of those made to further crime, or to interfere with the administration of the law, or to obstruct the course of justice,—all contracts affecting the rights and prerogatives of the government, as well as the personal rights of the citizen. In the second class no baseness is inherent in the essence of the contract, but there is either some defect in the mode of creation or the manner of performance, or some incapacity in one or the other of the parties because of nonage, mental disability, or the fiduciary relation which they sustain to each other. Within this second class, as has been said, are the contracts of one who stands in a fiduciary relation to another with that other. Because of the tendency to abuse, the temptation to take undue advantage, these contracts, even when not expressly prohibited by law, are still looked upon with disfavor, and they may be avoided at the instance of the other party in interest; but, where the trustee or other fiduciary agent has fully carried out the terms of the contract, the contract itself being fair, public policy, which is not punitive, is satisfied to leave the right of rescission to the other party. If he shall elect to rescind, he does so upon the equitable condition of restoring what he has received. If, however, he chooses to retain the consideration, he is not bound by the terms and conditions of the contract, but the courts permit an action to establish and to recover the reasonable value of the thing sold or the service rendered. Such, it may be said, is the general rule, but in this state the line has been more closely drawn. Such contracts are against public policy. Being against public policy, the making of them is not to be encouraged. But to permit a profit is thus to encourage them. Therefore, in this state, when a recovery is permitted, it is not for the reasonable or market value, which naturally includes within it the contemplation of a profit, but, where possible, the recovery is limited to the actual cost. Fox v. Mining Co., 108 Cal. 369, 41 Pac. 308.

Where contracts of public officials with their counties or municipalities have not been expressly forbidden by law, the principles which we have been considering have in some cases been applied, and a recovery has been permitted. In these cases it has been said that the demands of public policy have been satisfied by allowing the officer to recover, not according to the terms of his contract, but upon a quantum meruit or quantum valebat. Spearman v. Texarkana, 58

Ark. 348, 24 S. W. 883; Pickett v. School Dist., 25 Wis. 551; City of Concordia v. Hagaman (Kan. App.) 41 Pac. 133; Gardner v. Butler, 30 N. J. Eq. 702; Call Pub. Co. v. City of Lincoln, 29 Neb. 149, 45 N. W. 245; Mayor, etc., v. Huff, 60 Ga. 221; Currie v. School Dist., 35 Minn. 163, 27 N. W. 922; Mayor, etc., v. Muzzy, 33 Mich. 61. But in no one of these cases, nor indeed in any case which has come under our observation, have the courts entertained any contract, or any rights growing out of a contract, where either the consideration is base, or the contract is against the express prohibition of the law. Thus, in Call Pub. Co. v. City of Lincoln, supra, the publishing company had sued the city to recover for printing. Bushnell was a stockholder in the plaintiff company, and was chairman of the city council's committee on printing during the time of the publications in question. The court held that the statute of Nebraska prohibiting officers from being interested in any contract with their municipalities referred to express contracts; that the contract under consideration was an implied contract. It therefore concluded that the contract was not one expressly prohibited by law, and proceeded to discuss and decide the question upon the doctrine of public policy. In City of Concordia v. Hagaman, supra, the prohibitory statute was "An act to restrain state and county officers from speculating in their offices." The contract there was a contract made by Hagaman when he was a member of the city council, for the printing of the ordinances of the city. The court conceded that no recovery could be had if the contract were one expressly prohibited by law, but determined that the legislature had ex industria excluded municipal officers, and had limited the operation of the law to state and county officers. That being so, the contract was left to be considered upon the grounds of public policy alone. And in discussing that question the court says: "In considering the question of illegality of the contract, it is proper that a distinction be made between a contract which is illegal because its execution requires the performance of an immoral or unlawful act, or transgresses an express statutory prohibition, and one wherein the act to be performed is lawful, but the agreement is invalid because of the manner it was entered into, or because of incapacity to contract in either of the parties. * * * When the contract looks to the doing of a lawful act, but may be avoided by one of the parties to it because the other party at the time acted in a fiduciary capacity for the first, the rule is applied in order to avoid the possibility of reaping any undue advantage from the contract. When it has been executed without objection, and actual benefits have been received under it, all parties acting in entire good faith, the law is maintained and the ends of justice subserved by disregarding those parts of the express agreement wherein advantage might have been taken, and allowing compensation merely for the reasonable value of the benefits received under it. Considerations of public policy do not require the doing of less than this. The defense of public policy has no element of punishment in it, nor is it allowed out of consideration for the defendant. It is upheld by the consideration which the law ever entertains for the protection of the public, and the settled policy of the courts to give no aid to the enforcement of contracts whose general tendency is injurious to the public. Hence the courts refuse all relief to one who asks compensation for the doing of an act which is conclusively presumed to be hurtful to public interests or morals. When, however, the thing accomplished is proper and beneficial, and not placed under the ban of any penal prohibitory enactment, the reason for the rule fails, and it should not be applied any further than is necessary for the public good."

This, then, is the undoubted rule, that, when a contract is expressly prohibited by law, no court of justice will entertain an action upon it, or upon any asserted rights growing out of it. And the reason is apparent; for to permit this would be for the law to aid in its own undoing. Says the supreme court of the United States in President, etc., v. Owens, 2 Pet. 527: "No court of justice can, in its nature, be made the handmaid of iniquity. Courts are instituted to carry into effect the laws of the country. How can they become auxiliary to the consummation of violations of law? There can be no civil right where there can be no legal remedy, and there can be no legal remedy for that which is itself illegal." And again the same august tribunal, in Coppell v. Hall, 7 Wall. 542, says: "Whenever the illegality appears, whether the evidence comes from one side or the other, the disclosure is fatal to the case. No consent of the defendant can neutralize its effect. A stipulation in the most solemn form to waive the objection would be tainted with the vice of the original contract and void for the same reasons. Where the contamination reaches it destroys. The principle to be extracted from all the cases is that the law will not lend its support to a claim founded on its own violation." And in our own state it has been said (Swanger v. Mayberry, 59 Cal. 91): "The general principle is well established that a contract founded on an illegal consideration, or which is made for the purpose of furthering any matter or thing prohibited by statute, or to aid or assist any party therein, is void. This rule applies to every contract which is founded on a transaction malum in se, or which is prohibited by a statute on the ground of public policy." Nor in such cases does it matter whether the contract has been partially or wholly performed, or whether the consideration has passed or not. "The test," says Judge Duncan in Swan v. Scott, 11 Serg. & R. 164, "whether a demand connected with an illegal transaction is capable of being enforced at law, is whether the plaintiff requires the aid of the illegal transaction to establish his case. If the plaintiff cannot open his case without showing that he has broken the law, the court will not assist him, whatever his claim in justice may be upon the defendant." And this must be so; for, while, as a matter of private justice between individuals, it would be but fair that one, under such an illegal contract, should restore the consideration or should make the payment, the rights of the public are superior to any such private considerations, and the public's right is that the fountains of justice shall remain unpolluted; that no court shall lend its aid to a man who grounds his action upon an immoral or illegal act. Therefore there is no place for equitable considerations, presumptions, or estoppels. Fowler v. Scully, 72 Pa. St. 456. Ex turpi causa non oritur actio. Whenever such a contract comes before the court, the action must fail, and the parties will be left in the situation in which they may be found. Some slight attempt will be found in some of the cases to evade the application of this well-settled doctrine upon the ground of the hardship which sometimes results, but in no case, we think, has the existence of the rule been denied, or its justice as a matter commanding public necessity been questioned.

The rule, further, is that, where a statute pronounces a penalty for an act, a contract founded on such act is void, although the statute does not pronounce it void nor expressly prohibit it. Swanger v. Mayberry, 59 Cal. 93; Lumber Co. v. Hayes, 76 Cal. 390, 18 Pac. 391; Gardner v. Tatum, 81 Cal. 370, 22 Pac. 880; Merrill v. Nightingale, 93 Cal. 458, 28 Pac. 1068; Wyman v. Moore, 103 Cal. 214, 37 Pac. 230; Light Co. v. Sims, 104 Cal. 332, 37 Pac. 1042; Woods v. Armstrong, 25 Am. Rep. 671; Fowler v. Scully, 72 Pa. St. 456; Seidenbender v. Charles' Adm'rs, 4 Serg. & R. 151; Brooks v. Cooper, 50 N. J. Eq. 761, 26 Atl. 978.

Applying these principles to the contract before us, it is most manifest that it is not only against the express prohibition of the law, but that the law makes penal upon the part of a public officer the entering into it. We can yield no assent to the contention that our laws apply only to express contracts. The statute itself is general in its terms. Both in the charter provision above quoted, and in section 920 of the Political Code, these officers are forbidden to be interested in "any contract" made by them. The only difference between an express contract and an implied contract is that in the former all of the terms and conditions are expressed between the parties; in the latter some one or more of the terms and conditions are implied by law from the conduct of the parties. Generally, express contracts with a municipality are made under the system of competitive bidding. Usually this is made compulsory by law. To say that implied contracts were not prohibited would be to destroy the purpose and efficiency of the laws, and leave the people at the mercy of careless or unscrupulous officers. The case of Smith v. City of Albany, 61 N. Y. 444, is very similar to the one at bar. The council of the city, of which plaintiff was a member, appropriated $2,500 for defraying expenses of a Fourth of July celebration. Upon the day plaintiff furnished horses and vehicles for use in the celebration, and the fair value of their use was the sum of $139. The New York statute made it unlawful for a member of any common council to become a contractor under any contract authorized by the common council, and authorized such contracts to be declared void at the instance of the city. Here was an implied contract, but it was one prohibited by the statute law as well as by considerations of public policy, and the plaintiff was denied any recovery. Our statutes are general in prohibiting any officer from being interested in such contracts, and, if ever there was an occasion for its strict enforcement, it certainly exists in a case such as this, where the contractor is a member of the common council, whose duty it is to make such contracts on behalf of the city. He cannot be permitted to place himself in any position where his personal interest will conflict with the faithful performance of his duty as trustee, and it matters not how fair upon the face of it the contract may be the law will not suffer him to occupy a position so equivocal and so fraught with temptation. Note the situation here presented. This material was obtained from a member of the city council, and he, as a member of that council, sits in judgment upon the validity and amount of his own claim. If he does not act, still the city is deprived of its right to his services and judgment in determining these very questions.

The fact that the claim was allowed by the council does not give to it a validity which it otherwise did not possess. Pavement Co. v. Broderick, 113 Cal. 628, 45 Pac. 863. The duty of treasurer is to pay only legal demands against his funds. The law will not imply a promise to pay for services illegally rendered under a contract expressly prohibited by law. Gardner v. Tatum, 81 Cal. 370, 22 Pac. 880. For the foregoing reasons the judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to sustain the general demurrer to plaintiff's complaint.

PEOPLE v. HARRIS et al. (Cr. 512.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1899.)

JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE—MANSLAUGHTER—EVIDENCE.

Deceased inclosed a road crossing his premises, and threatened to kill accused if they attempted to pass over it. Shortly thereafter accused, armed with guns, started to pass over the road in a wagon, cutting the fence. Deceased left his plow, went to the house, and secured a rifle. Accused were about 200 feet away, each with a gun in his hand. Deceased started from the house towards a tree some distance in front of accused and near the road. There was evidence that accused ordered deceased to stop and drop his rifle, and that he ordered accused to turn and retrace their steps. As deceased was about to pass behind the tree, and while about 19 feet from it, accused fired at him and killed him, they being 65 feet distant. The evidence justified the jury in saying deceased did not have his rifle pointed at accused at the time. Held to sustain verdict of manslaughter.

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

J. I. Harris and George Cardwell were convicted of manslaughter, and they appeal. Affirmed.

R. A. Ling and F. E. Davis, for appellants. Atty. Gen. Ford, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendants have been convicted of manslaughter, and appeal from the judgment and order denying their motion for a new trial. It is insisted that the evidence shows a case of justifiable homicide. The facts, briefly stated, are as follows: The deceased, by a wire fence, closed a road extending across his premises. Two of his neighbors, these defendants, claimed the right to travel upon this road. Ill feeling arose, and deceased informed them that, if they attempted to pass over the road, he would kill them. Some days thereafter the defendants, in a wagon, armed with shotgun and rifle, a third man driving the horses, started to travel over the forbidden road. They cut the wires of the fence, passed on, and as they approached the house of the deceased he left his plow standing in the field, went to the house, and reappeared with his rifle in his hands. At this time defendants were about 200 feet distant. They continued upon their way, one or both of them upon the ground by the side of the wagon, each with a gun in his hand. The deceased started from the house, angling towards a large tree which stood some distance in front of defendants and near the road. There is evidence that at this point of time defendants ordered deceased to stop, and to drop his rifle. There is also evidence that deceased, at about the same time, ordered defendants to turn and retrace their steps. As deceased was about to pass from the view of defendants behind the tree, and some 19 feet distant therefrom, they fired at him, and he fell upon the ground, dead. This point was 65 feet distant from the wagon. The position in which deceased held his rifle at the time he was killed is not clearly disclosed, yet from the evidence the jury would have been justified in saying that it was not pointed towards defendants.

From the foregoing evidence the jury had a right to say that this affray arose between three desperate, determined men; that these defendants began their journey with the intention to travel over the premises of the deceased at all hazards; and that deceased, when he saw them, intended to stop them at all hazards. Upon such a state of facts, any question, legal or equitable, as to the respective rights of these parties in the road, becomes wholly immaterial. In this regard the case is similar to People v. Conkling, 111 Cal. 621, 44 Pac. 316, where the court said: "If it be assumed that at the time of the killing deceased was at the opening in the fence for the purpose of preventing the defendant at all hazards from going through, and if it also be assumed that defendant was there intending to pass through at all hazards, still the question of self-defense is presented to the jury, regardless of the respective rights of the parties to the road. Under such circumstances, the man who began the deadly affray—that is, who by some overt act caused the other as a reasonable man to believe that he was in danger of loss of life or limb—placed himself without the protection of the law, and must take the consequences, whether those consequences be his death upon the ground, or the penalty imposed after trial by judge and jury." Looking at this picture formed from the evidence, we deem the showing made ample to support the verdict. We see but little difference, viewed with the eyes of the law, in the relative positions of these three persons at the moment prior to the shooting. While, if the positions had been reversed, and deceased at that moment had fired and killed the defendants,—and such killing would have been manslaughter or worse,—still it does not follow that defendants may not be guilty. Certainly, if the purpose of deceased was to place himself in the road in front of defendants, and thereby try and stop them from proceeding further on their way, and his rifle was lying upon his arm, not pointed in the direction of the defendants, then they had no right to shoot when they did, for there was no overt act by deceased at that time which justified them in taking his life. Under the evidence, the jury were authorized in declaring the conditions to be such as here suggested. The theory of defendants probably was that deceased was about to use the tree for a barricade, and, safely ensconced behind it, shoot them down. Yet the deceased could well have used his house for that purpose, and never have ventured into the open at all. These things were all matters for the jury to weigh and gauge and reason upon, and matters upon which their conclusion cannot be set aside by this court. As already suggested, from the evidence the jury had a right to say that these three men were within a few hundred feet of each other, in plain view, guns in their hands, fingers upon the trigger, and with enmity and deadly determination in their hearts. The jury had the right to say that at this time they all stood upon common ground, and that the light of the law shone upon all alike. An overt act at this critical period was bound to cause a tragedy; and the jury were justified in saying, under the law and facts, that the defendants should not have fired the fatal shots. We have examined the instructions given and refused, and find nothing demanding a reversal of the judgment. There is no error in the record. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: VAN DYKE, J.; HARRISON, J.; McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.; TEMPLE, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. The claim upon the part of appellants that the verdict of the jury was against the evidence cannot be upheld. There was clear proof of a voluntary killing, from which the law raised a presumption of malice. To rebut this presumption, the burden of proving self-defense devolved upon defendants; and, since the jury were not bound to believe the testimony of their witnesses, it cannot be said, as matter of law, that the verdict is without evidence to sustain it. I cannot, however, agree with the view of the evidence taken in the opinion of the court wherein it seems to be held that, even if it is accepted as true, it does not make out a case of self-defense. The road in question was one which had been used by the defendants and others for years, and was the only means of ingress and egress to and from the valley for loaded wagons. The deceased, when he came to live on the place where he was killed, found the road open and in common use across the public land upon which he was merely a settler, and the evidence shows, without contradiction, that he sought and obtained the consent of his neighbors, including these defendants, to inclose this road upon the express condition that he should construct a new road outside of his inclosure in all respects as good as the old road. In pursuance of this agreement, he put a wire fence across the old road, and made a pretense of constructing a new one, but the evidence, which is wholly uncontradicted, abundantly shows that the new road was impassable for loaded wagons. It was with difficulty that half a load could be hauled over it, and defendants and others were obliged to make two trips to bring in one load. The defendants could not market their produce or obtain supplies for their families. Under these circumstances, they announced to deceased their intention to resume the use of the old road, whereupon he plainly told them that he would kill any man who attempted to pass that way. Emphasis was imparted to this threat by the notoriously bad character of deceased. The evidence shows abundantly, and without contradiction, that he was a quarrelsome, turbulent, and dangerous man, always armed and ready on every occasion to resort to violence. The defendants, on the contrary, were shown to have been men of quiet and peaceable disposition. This, then, was the situation of affairs: The defendants, by the wrongful act of the deceased, were shut off from the only practicable road by which they could take their produce to market or bring in supplies for their families. They were in urgent need of relief. They had a clear legal right to travel over the old road. The obstructions erected by deceased constituted a public nuisance, which they were authorized to abate; but they were warned by deceased that their lives were to be the forfeit if they attempted to exercise their rights. What were they to do? They had the choice to submit to a lawless invasion of their rights, or to assert them. They chose the latter alternative, and, in my opinion, made the proper and manly choice. Nor are they to be blamed for going armed, if their only intention was to defend themselves against a felonious assault, and there is not a particle of evidence that they intended to make any other use of their arms. The open threats of deceased, his notorious bad character, and his constant state of preparation for deadly hostilities warranted the apprehension that they might be called upon to defend their lives, and his subsequent conduct justified their precautions. They entered upon the road without any breach of the peace, and when deceased saw them he left the field where he was at work, proceeded directly to his house, without saying a word, armed himself with a repeating rifle, and made for the secure shelter of a large, live oak tree. But one construction could be put upon his conduct, and that was that he was seeking a position from which he would hold the others at his mercy, and no reasonable man could have avoided the conclusion that their lives were in imminent danger. He was shot when he had only six feet to go to shelter himself behind the tree, and after he had been repeatedly warned to stop by the defendants, according to the testimony of their witnesses. The wife of the deceased, the only other eyewitness of the affair, testified that she had heard no such warning, and to this extent and upon this point alone the evidence is conflicting. Upon the evidence, therefore, assuming it to be true, I consider the plea of self-defense to have been well sustained. But, as above stated, there was against this evidence a legal presumption of malice, from the voluntary killing; and, upon the theory that the jury discredited the testimony for the defense, the verdict may be upheld. I see no reason, however, why the evidence for the defense should have been discredited. So far as it appears upon the record, the witnesses were fair and disinterested, as they were wholly unimpeached. Their testimony makes out a case in which the deceased, a bad and dangerous character, was grossly in the wrong, in which he was clearly the aggressor, and in which the de-defendants, while peaceably exercising their legal rights, were forced to defend their lives. Such being the case, I think we are justified in scrutinizing closely the instructions of the court on the law of self-defense in order to discover whether they were as full and clear and explicit as the defendants had a right to demand.

As to most of the charge of the court there is no criticism to make; but there were three instructions proposed by the defendants in which the jury were told that, if they believed certain facts to have been established, then the killing was justifiable, and they must acquit the defendants. It is conceded that these instructions were correct as framed, but the court modified each of them by substituting for the direction to acquit the formula that (in the case supposed) the defendants "had the right to defend themselves even to the taking of the life of Hilton." This action of the court is defended upon the ground that the instructions meant just the same thing after the alteration as before. It is perhaps true that they do mean to a lawyer just as much in one form as in the other, but evidently the judge of the superior court thought that, in their modified form, they would carry some different meaning to the jurors, else why should he take the trouble to make the change? The question for the jury was what should be their verdict. In the instructions as prayed they were told, and correctly told, that their verdict, in view of certain supposed facts, should be not guilty. In the altered form of the instructions they were merely told that on the same state of facts the defendants had a right to defend themselves even to the extent of taking life. It is true that to any lawyer, and probably to most laymen, the conclusion from this proposition would appear inevitable that the defendants should be acquitted. But why, when an instruction is properly framed, and states the proper verdict to be rendered upon the hypothetical case, should the court emasculate it by striking out the conclusion and substituting in its place a proposition from which the conclusion can only be inferred? I think the defendants should have a new trial.

2. The provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 1616, is not affected by section 1618, providing that "in all cases" such further allowance may be made for extraordinary services as the court may deem reasonable, the cases referred to being those provided for in the first sentence of the same section, viz. "where no compensation is provided by will, or the executor renounces all claim thereto."

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

In the settlement of the estate of Solomon Runyon, deceased. There was an order settling the annual account of the executors, and they appeal. Affirmed.

A. P. Catlin, for appellants. Albert M. Johnson, for Ora Runyon-Buckman. White & Seymour, for Elmina Adeline Runyon.

HARRISON, J. Appeal from an order settling the annual account of the executors, and striking therefrom an item of $1,226.86 for extraordinary services claimed to have been rendered by one of the executors. The appellants are the executors of the last will and testament of the deceased, and in his will appointing them he made the following provision in reference to their compensation: "In lieu of the commissions allowed by law for executors, which I deem insufficient, I do hereby provide that my said executors shall be entitled to receive the sum of five thousand ($5,000) dollars each as and for full compensation for their services, respectively, as such executors, in addition to their actual expenses." Neither of the executors filed a renunciation of his claim for compensation provided by the will.

The personal estate of the testator was valued in the inventory returned by them at the sum of $245,405, and the real estate at $99,500, and in the account presented by them for settlement it appears that the estate of the decedent accounted for by them amounts to $422,244. The real estate consisted of four farms, not adjoining each other, and aggregating about 1,650 acres, the most distant being about 18 miles apart. A portion of this land was planted to fruit trees, and devoted to the culture and production of fruit, and a portion was rented to tenants. One of the executors (Dann) had been in the service of the testator for upwards of 10 years prior to his death, at a salary of $100 per month, as the active manager of all his farming operations, both in the culture of fruit and other produce, and upon the death of the testator the executors deemed it for the advantage of the estate that he should continue in this management; and he thereupon continued to manage the farms and business connected therewith. It is for this management that his claim for extraordinary services was made, computed at the rate of $100 per month. The court finds that Mr. Dann was well qualified to perform these services, and that they were beneficial to the estate, and that the income of the estate was increased thereby, and also that the services were not such as were in-

(Supreme Court of California. June 21, 1899.)
EXECUTORS — COMPENSATION — PROVISION IN WILL—RENUNCIATION—EXTRAOR-DINARY SERVICES.

1. A testator, deeming the commissions allowed by law insufficient, gave his executors $5,000 each in full compensation for their services as executors. One had been in his employ at a salary of $100 per month as manager of his farms, and continued so to act after his death, without renouncing the compensation allowed in the will. Held that, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1616, making the provisions in the will for executors' compensation full compensation unless renounced, he was not entitled to further allowance for extraordinary services.

cumbent upon him in the common course of his duties as executor.

Section 1616, Code Civ. Proc., provides that the executor "shall be allowed * * * for his services such fees as are provided in this chapter; but when the decedent by his will makes some other provision for the compensation of his executor, that shall be a full compensation for his services, unless by a written instrument filed in the court he renounces all claim for compensation provided by the will." As no renunciation of the claim for the compensation provided by the will was filed by either of the executors, the court was required under this section to hold that the provision thus made was a "full compensation for his services," and to deny his claim for any further allowance for extraordinary services. It will be observed that the amount of compensation provided in the will is largely in excess of the commissions to which the executors would have been entitled if no provision had been so made, and it is reasonable to suppose that when the testator appointed the manager of his farms to be one of his executors he had this fact in mind, and made the appointment in order that after his death his estate might continue to receive the benefit of his services and experience as such manager, and that he fixed the amount of his compensation in contemplation thereof. The statement in his will that he deemed the commissions allowed by law to be insufficient compensation implies that he expected that they would perform other duties than those ordinarily required of an executor.

We cannot assent to the proposition of the appellants that the provision in section 1618, Code Civ. Proc., "in all cases such further allowance may be made as the court may deem just and reasonable for any extraordinary services," authorized the court to disregard the provisions of section 1616. The cases here referred to are those provided in the first sentence of the section, viz. "When no compensation is provided by the will, or the executor renounces all claim thereto." The amount provided by the will must be taken as the measure of compensation which the testator deemed ample for all services to be rendered in the execution of the trust, and if the executors, either upon assuming their office, or by reason of unexpected circumstances occurring during the course of their administration of the trust, are called upon to perform extraordinary services, they must first renounce the compensation provided by the will before they can be entitled to any allowance for such additional services. The compensation of an executor, whether according to the rates fixed by the statute, or as determined by the testator, is not a gratuity, but is in consideration of the services he may render, and the amount fixed by the statute is deemed ample compensation for the services ordinarily required. If the executor would claim that his services entitle him to a greater compensation than that allowed by the statute, he must first renounce that provided by the will, and the court can then make him such allowance as will fully compensate him. Unless such renunciation is made, the provision in the will will be held, under section 1616, to be "full compensation" for his services.

The right of an executor to receive compensation for extra services, in addition to the statutory allowance, was very fully considered in Collier v. Munn, 41 N. Y. 143. In that case one of the executors was an attorney at law, and at the request of his co-executors, and upon their agreement with him that he should be compensated therefor, he rendered services as an attorney in certain important litigation for the protection of the estate, which were of great value and advantage to the estate. The court held, however, that, notwithstanding the services rendered did not devolve upon him as an executor, and were not such as could be required of him by virtue of his office, he was not entitled to any compensation therefor; that the commissions allowed by law must be his entire compensation for all the services rendered by him in the discharge of his trust. The order is affirmed.

BERGEN et al. v. FRISBIE. (Sac. 572.)

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—CONTRACTS—PUBLIC POLICY—"EXPEDITING" JUDICIAL DECISIONS.

1. Defendant, having a claim pending before the secretary of the interior for timber-land entries, employed attorneys to "secure a favorable and final decision," and agreed to pay them 10 per cent. of the value of the land should a patent be secured, and, failing that, 5 per cent. of the money already paid, if its return be secured. Held, that the contingent character of the fee did not render it an immoral contract.

2. The fact that the attorneys were to assist in securing a "favorable decision" did not taint the contract.

3. The fact that the attorneys did nothing but "expedite" the decision did not avoid the contract, there being nothing unprofessional or against public policy in influencing decisions of the land department in a proper way.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Shasta county.

Action by B. F. Bergen and Thomas Jewett against Edward Frisbie. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Garter, Dozier & Wells, for appellant. F. P. Primm, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendant, Frisbie, had certain matters pertaining to timber-land entries made by him pending before the secretary of the interior at Washington. He had paid $2,050 to the government upon these entries, and was desirous of the issuance of the patents to him for the land. These matters had been long delayed in the land department, whereupon defendant entered into a contract with plaintiffs whereby he engaged their services as attorneys for the purpose of having the said entries ratified and declared valid; and, if such ratification and confirmation could not be accomplished, then to take action to recover from the government the said sum of $2,050, paid as aforesaid. This contract provided: "In consideration of such services the said party of the first part has this day, * * * and in addition, provided said parties of the second part succeed in securing a favorable and final decision in favor of said entries, the said party of the first part will pay the said attorneys ten per cent. of the then value of the lands embraced in said entries, and should the said attorneys fail in securing such favorable decision, but in lieu of which they succeed in having the United States refund the said two thousand and fifty dollars to the said party of the first part, then and in that case the said party of the first part agrees to pay the said attorneys five per cent. of the amount so recovered." Under this contract plaintiffs wrote various letters to the land department at Washington, urging an early decision of the pending matters, and also retained a firm of attorneys at that place to assist in securing a favorable conclusion of the matters pending. In the course of time patents were issued to defendant, and thereafter plaintiffs brought this action under the contract to recover 10 per cent. of the value of the land as their compensation. Judgment went for plaintiffs, and defendant has appealed from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

Defendant declares that: "The contract relied upon by the plaintiffs was for services to be performed by them for the defendant by influencing the official action of public officers of the government favorable to the defendant on matters then pending before such officers, for compensation contingent upon success. Such a contract is void as against good morals and public policy, and the performance of the services under such a contract affords no ground of recovery." He attaches much importance to the fact that the fee fixed by the contract for the services to be performed was dependent upon success, namely, issuance of the patents. As tending to indicate the immorality of the contract, the contingent character of the fee works no such result. The contract is good or bad regardless of that question. Hoffman v. Vallejo, 45 Cal. 564; Stanton v. Embrey, 93 U. S. 548. We have carefully scanned the face of this contract, and find nothing whatever there to justify a judicial declaration that it is against good morals. There was no secrecy, no deception, no fraud, no corruption. It was an ordinary, everyday contract. Thousands of similar import probably have been made and executed.

The fact that plaintiffs were retained to assist in securing a favorable decision of the matters pending certainly does not taint the contract. Defendant would hardly engage their services for any other purpose.

It is next claimed that the evidence discloses that the plaintiffs did nothing under the contract except expedite the decision of the litigation. Even if it should be conceded that their labors were largely directed towards that end, still such labor upon the part of these attorneys is not of itself unprofessional. The means and manner to be employed are the all-important factors in marking the validity or invalidity of the contract. We see no one of its provisions that stamps it void as against public policy and good morals. Neither do we find anything in the evidence indicating any act done by the plaintiffs that to any degree could be construed improper. The employment of persons to influence legislation, or to influence decisions of the land department, or even the decisions of judicial tribunals, in a proper way, is not against sound public policy, and this, too, even though the compensation for the labor to be performed is contingent upon successful results. The means and methods to be used must be improper, or else such employment is perfectly legitimate in the eyes of the law. We do not see how a contract upon its face would be void as against public policy whereby attorneys were retained by a party litigant to assist in securing a favorable decision from this court upon litigation pending before it, even though the compensation of such attorneys was to be contingent upon success. In the absence of anything to the contrary, this court would certainly assume it to be valid and enforceable at law. If such be the rule of law as to contracts pertaining to the judicial action of this court, that law is good enough to be applied upon a contract in a matter pending before the secretary of the interior. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CRANDALL. (Cr. 489.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1899.)
HOMICIDE—PHOTOGRAPHS—COURT'S DISCRETION—EXPERIMENTAL TESTS—WITNESSES—PRACTICE—IMPEACHMENT.

1. It is within the court's discretion to admit photographs of the scene of the crime, in a murder trial.

2. It is not error to allow experimental tests in a murder trial to be made by the prosecuting officers, but it is the better practice to have such tests made by other witnesses.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, providing that a witness may be impeached by contradictory evidence, or by evidence that his reputation for truth, honesty, or integrity is bad, but not by evidence of particular wrongful acts, a witness cannot be asked on cross-examination as to particular acts of immorality on her part.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Frank Crandall was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Reversed.

W. H. Shinn and Earl Rogers, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

VAN DYKE, J. The defendant was tried upon a charge of murder, and convicted of manslaughter. He appeals from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial.

The homicide was committed at Ballona, on a lagoon near the beach, between Santa Monica and Redondo, in the county of Los Angeles. The only defense urged was that the life of the deceased was taken by the defendant in necessary self-defense. Some two weeks prior to the homicide, defendant rented from Hoagland a cabin having but one room, not far from the ocean beach, and near the cottage occupied by Hoagland and his partner, who were fishermen. Soon after, William White and Bowman (the deceased) joined Crandall, at his request, and occupied the cabin with him. On the Sunday preceding the homicide, they were joined by Mrs. Crandall, Mrs. Bowman, wife of deceased, and Maud Nelson, the mistress of White. The parties spent Sunday night at the cabin drinking. During the night a quarrel arose between Maud Nelson and Mrs. Crandall, into which Bowman and defendant were drawn. According to the testimony of the defendant and his wife, Maud Nelson asserted that defendant had made improper proposals to Mrs. Bowman, and, although Mrs. Bowman promptly denied the accusation, Bowman made some direful threats against defendant; and, as White sided with Bowman, defendant, who was an invalid, became alarmed, and left the cabin at about 2 o'clock in the morning. He and his wife went to Hoagland's cottage, where they spent the balance of the night. There they were told of other threats made by Bowman against the defendant. In the morning they rode with Hoagland on his fish wagon to Los Angeles; being afraid, as they testified, to remain at the beach. Nevertheless defendant arranged to return and stop at the cottage with Hoagland, and took along some implements for baking clams, and also took with him a revolver. And on the following Tuesday he procured a buggy from a livery stable, and returned to the beach with one Bremmerman. Then, having put up his horse, he and Bremmerman proceeded to the cabin to get some goods which Crandall had left. While collecting his things, he inquired of White and Maud Nelson for Bowman, and was told where he was. Bowman was at the time lying down upon the sand, some three or four hundred yards distant, and Crandall and Bremmerman then proceeded towards him. Bowman, having seen them coming, got up and met them. When they met, Crandall asked Bowman for a pair of suspenders which he had loaned him. Bowman took them off and handed them to Crandall, and thanked him for their use. All three then turned and walked together towards the cabin. Bowman soon began to complain that Crandall had refused to be security for him for a small bill at Los Angeles, and charged him, also, with having insulted his wife. When Crandall denied this last charge, Bowman suddenly turned upon him, put both hands upon his shoulders, and, "glowering down at him," said: "You lie, you God-damned son of a bitch. I will fix you." Crandall then asked Bowman to let him alone, and jerked away from his grasp, drew his pistol, and shot him. Bremmerman was a witness for the prosecution, and was the only person, other than the parties, who saw the affray, although there were several within hearing. There was a difference as to the number of shots. Defendant testified (and in this he was corroborated by Bremmerman) that two shots were fired as rapidly as could be from a self-cocking pistol. Defendant claimed that both shots were fired while Bowman was standing over him, and Bremmerman testified that they were not more than two or three steps apart when the last shot was fired. Other witnesses testified to four shots, and that defendant had admitted that he had fired four. Bowman turned to run as soon as possible after the firing commenced, and the prosecution contended that the fatal shot was fired while deceased was retreating, and while defendant stood upon a ridge of sand and deceased was running down. The prosecution's theory was that the bullet entered at the back of the neck, and passed downward toward the front, cutting the subclavical artery. The contention on the part of the defense was that the fatal bullet was fired from a point below, and before Bowman turned around to retreat; that it entered the breast near the armpit, and passed back and upward, coming out at the back of the neck. The prosecution seemed to have had two theories,—one, that Crandall bought the pistol and went to the beach to assassinate Bowman, and the other that, even if the first shot was justifiable, the fatal shot was fired after Bowman had, to the knowledge of the defendant, declined further controversy and was retreating. Considering the verdict, the latter was probably the theory adopted by the jury, although it may have been a compromise verdict. Defendant testified that he did not stand upon this ridge when he fired at the deceased, but that Bowman stood above and facing him, and, after the shots, passed over the ridge, falling about 100 feet away from him. To these questions the evidence was mainly addressed.

There had been a previous trial, and, to make things plain, the two deputy district attorneys who prosecuted the case took a camera to the beach, and had Bremmerman and Jacobs point out the localities to them, and took some photographs, which were introduced in evidence at the trial as diagrams. They marked upon the photographs where other witnesses said the dead body of Bowman was lying, and where such witnesses said defendant told them he stood when he shot Bowman. Such witnesses were sworn, and testified that they correctly pointed out such spots to said deputies, and the latter testified that the localities were correctly marked according to the information given to them, but the diagrams were not verified by the other witnesses. These deputy district attorneys also testified as to what could be seen from the window in a cabin, to support the testimony of White, whose veracity had been attacked by other evidence to the effect that the scene of the conflict could not be seen from the window. The defendant strenuously contends that the admission of the photographs and the testimony of the prosecuting officers was erroneous, chiefly on the ground that the evidence was hearsay, was manufactured by the prosecuting officers, and, as claimed by defendant, was a gross abuse of their semijudicial positions, to the prejudice of the defendant. The photographs were used only as diagrams, and, although more complete proofs of their correctness could well have been required, still it cannot be said the trial court abused its discretion in allowing them to be used. We may assume that every one now understands the limitations upon the use of the photograph. It presents but one point of view, and may sometimes make an unfair representation of the points at issue. Like any other diagram, its value must be determined by the jury from all the evidence. The evidence was no more hearsay than any evidence of a surveyor who makes a diagram to illustrate some theory of a case. Its value depends upon other evidence. The evidence was, in a sense, manufactured by the prosecution, but not in an offensive sense. Tests are sometimes made and proven to settle certain disputed possibilities. We are not prepared to say it was error to allow them to be made by the prosecuting officers, although, as a rule, since their office is quasi judicial, it would have been better had the proof been furnished by other witnesses. That the same person should be both advocate and witness is unseemly, and shocks our sense of propriety. There is no application of the recent decision in People v. Hill (Cal.) 56 Pac. 443, to this case.

The defendant's wife was called as a witness and gave important evidence in his behalf. On cross-examination, for the avowed purpose of impeaching her, the district attorney, against continuous objection and protest on the part of the defendant, was allowed to ask a series of questions, which, if answered affirmatively, would disgrace and degrade the witness. They were all wholly collateral and outside the issues in the case, and did not refer to the relation of the witness to the parties, to the subject of the action, or to the previous testimony of the witness. The asking of the questions implied, at least, an assertion of a belief on the part of the attorney that the witness had been guilty of gross immorality. It is charged by the defense that the questions were not asked for the purpose of getting before the jury the testimony of the witness upon the subject of investigation, but to insinuate damaging charges against the witness, which, by the rules of evidence, neither the witness nor the party could rebut, save by the denials of the witness, whose credibility was affected by the insinuations. That this charge was well founded is proven beyond cavil by the record. She was asked, by a great variety of questions, if she did not live by prostitution. She was questioned in reference to particular times and places, and to particular men, and as to whether she did not practice special modes of solicitation for immoral purposes. To all these questions the witness answered in the negative. The defendant's contention, that by the decisions in this state this line of cross-examination is not allowable, is correct. Section 2051, Code Civ. Proc., says: "A witness may be impeached, by the party against whom he was called, by contradictory evidence, or by evidence that his general reputation for truth, honesty or integrity is bad, but not by evidence of particular wrongful acts, except that it may be shown by the examination of the witness, or the record of the judgment, that he had been convicted of a felony." In other states there is apparently a conflict of decisions upon the subject. See Carroll v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 431, 24 S. W. 100, where the matter is discussed, and the cases cited. But, while there is a controversy as to whether such questions can be permitted, there is no difference in holding that, when allowed, the answer of the witness must be accepted as conclusive. In asking such questions the questioner takes that risk, and justly so, because, under the rules of evidence, no other witness can be allowed to testify upon the subject. Neither the witness whose character is assailed, nor the party the value of whose evidence is sought to be discredited, can sustain the witness on those points by other witnesses. The only evidence, therefore, which is allowed, must be conclusive, and should be taken in good faith as true. This court has held in a number of cases that the answer of the witness to this class of questions must be taken as final and conclusive, and its truthfulness beyond all attack by independent evidence; and it has further been repeatedly held that such collateral matters cannot be gone into, even upon cross-examination. Section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure expressly forbids the impeachment of a witness "by evidence of particular wrongful acts." People v. Hamblin, 68 Cal. 101, 8 Pac. 687; People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 180, 31 Pac. 45; People v. Un Dong, 106 Cal. 88, 39 Pac. 12; People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 462, 34 Pac. 1078; People v. Silva, 121 Cal. 668, 54 Pac. 146; Pyle v. Piercy, 122 Cal. 383, 55 Pac. 141; Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 673, 21 Pac. 26; In re James' Estate (S. F. No. 1,467, filed June 5, 1899) 57 Pac. 578. In People v. Un Dong, supra, the court say: "This whole course of examination by the prosecution was improper in the highest degree. The questions asked were not only in large part violative of defendant's rights to have his cross-examination confined to the subject-matter of his testimony in chief [referring to former cases], but the obvious purpose and undoubted effect of such course of examination was to degrade and injure the defendant in the estimation of the jury. Its allowance was therefore erroneous and clearly prejudicial. Nor was the error cured, or the prejudicial effect removed, by the negative answers to the questions allowed, or the sustaining of defendant's objection to others, where, as here, the manifest purpose and inevitable tendency of the questions was to injuriously affect the verdict. The error in such case lies in permitting an examination of that character. People v. Wells, supra." In the case under consideration, after the prosecuting officers had gone out of their way in putting such questions, which were negatively answered, and which answers, under all rules, are made conclusive of the facts, they proceeded in their argument to insinuate to the jury that the answers were not true. This demonstrated conclusively that the purpose of asking the improper questions was to make insinuations against the character of the witness, and not to impeach her testimony, and by this improper mode of procedure to prejudice the defendant. The attorney general argues that other testimony in the case tended to show that the witness belonged to a degraded class. If so, the district attorney should have relied upon such evidence, and should not, as he did, have voluntarily rebutted this theory by the answers of defendant's witness to his improper questions. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; McFARLAND, J.; HARRISON, J.

TEMPLE, J. I concur in the judgment and in the opinion of Mr. Justice VAN DYKE, except that I do not agree that questions irrelevant to the issues in a case, asked for the purpose of discrediting the witness, can never, in the discretion of the trial judge, be asked of a witness. It is said that sections 2051 and 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure prohibit such evidence. In express terms, these sections certainly do not. It is stated that a witness may be impeached (1) by contradictory evidence; (2) by evidence that his general reputation for honesty and integrity is bad; and (3) by proving inconsistent statements. Other modes of impeachment are not expressly prohibited, and, ever since the existence of the statute, other modes have been freely resorted to. Witnesses are constantly cross-examined as to their bias or their interest in the case, their relationship to the parties, and also as to their occupation and position in the community; also, as to what persons they have conversed with about the case, and whether they have been paid to attend court, etc. These are all matters of impeachment, and none of them fall within the modes specified in the statute. The statute has in fact never been treated as prohibiting other usual modes of impeachment; and, if it was intended that a witness could not be impeached except in the specified modes, there would have been no occasion for the one special negative, "but not by evidence of particular wrongful acts." As a general rule, the cross-examination should be confined to the subject-matter of the direct examination, but this rule necessarily cannot apply to matters of impeachment. We all agree that a witness cannot be asked questions merely for the purpose of degrading him, and, while there has been much controversy as to admissibility of such evidence, no one contends that a party has an absolute right to indulge in such examination. It is not permissible to go into the former life of a witness, and unnecessarily drag to light ancient scandals. The matter is almost entirely within the discretion of the trial court, and such examination should be permitted only when and so far as it seems to be required for the ends of justice. It is said that the earlier rulings were against allowing a cross-examination for the purpose of testing the character of the witness, and yet I find in a work as early as Roscoe's Criminal Evidence the following: "A witness may be questioned in cross-examination not only on the subject of inquiry, but upon any other subject, however remote, for the purpose of testing his character for credibility, his memory, or his accuracy. * * * The moment it appears that a question is being put which does not either bear upon the issue, or enable the jury to judge of the value of the witness' testimony, it is the duty of the court to interfere, as well to protect the witness from what becomes an injustice or an insult, as to prevent the time of the court from being wasted." Greenleaf states the rule pretty much in the same way. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 459. The question discussed by him, and which he says "has not yet been brought into direct solemn judgment," is, whether the witness is privileged, and may decline to answer. He expressly states that the question may be asked, and sees no good reason for allowing a privilege to the witness. Rice, in his work on Evidence, considers the question quite elaborately. He states the rule to be that "such questions should be allowed when there is reason to believe it may tend to promote the ends of justice, but they may be properly excluded when a disparaging course of examination seems unjust to the witness, or uncalled for by the circumstances of the particular case." He cites the case of President, etc., v. Loomis, 32 N. Y. 127, where the discretion of the trial court is asserted, and in which are cited three cases tried by Lord Ellenborough, in one of which, when a witness was asked if he had not been tried for theft, the court ordered the witness to answer, and told him he would be sent to jail if he did not. In another he told the witness he could answer or not, as he pleased, but said, if he were asked such a question, he would refuse to answer. In the third, the judge stopped the examination, and would not permit the question to be answered, although no objection was made by any one. The author makes it plain that there has been no such discrepancy in the English cases as has been supposed. They are nearly all cases ad nisi prius, and, whichever way the court held, it was within the rule which lodges the discretion in the trial judge. In the nature of the case, no fixed rule for the exercise of the discretion can be laid down. In White v. McLean, 47 How. Prac. 193, is a full discussion of this subject, as also in Carroll v. State, cited in the principal opinion. In 1 Thomp. Trials, § 458, it is said that the better rule is that the trial court may allow, limit, or refuse such examination, and its ruling is not subject to review except in cases of manifest abuse. See, also, Tayl. Ev. § 1314 et seq. In Stephens' Digest of the Law of Evidence it is said: "Where a witness is cross-examined he may be asked any question which tends (1) to test his accuracy, veracity, or credibility; or (2) to shake his credit by injuring his character. He may be compelled to answer any such question, however irrelevant to the fact in issue, and however disgraceful to himself, except where the answer might expose him to a criminal charge," and, under our statute, it may be added, where it tends to prove particular wrongful acts. In fact, except in this state, the rule is quite uniform that, in the discretion of the trial court, such questions may be asked. Nor do I admit that a different rule has been established here. Most of the cases cited have no bearing upon the general proposition. Of course, such examination is not allowable in every case. Where it is manifest, as in People v. Wells and in People v. Un Dong, supra, that the examination was not for the purpose of proving the immorality, but to prejudice by insulting questions, it should not be tolerated, and it would be error to permit it. In Pyle v. Piercy, 122 Cal. 383, 55 Pac. 141, an attempt was made to prove upon cross-examination of a married woman that she had been too intimate with her husband before their marriage. The purpose of this examination may well have been held to be to insult the witness. This court simply said, "A witness cannot be impeached in this way." Upon the authorities and upon principle, I think, the trial judge may permit such examination when he deems that the ends of justice would be promoted by so doing; but, if he refuses, his discretion will rarely be interfered with.

SCHEERER v. GOODWIN et al. (S. F. 1,130.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 20, 1899.)

EJECTMENT—EXECUTION—INJUNCTION—POSSESSION—COLLUSION—EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF—DEEDS—LEASES—ASSIGNMENTS—CONSTRUCTION—WITNESSES—IMPEACHMENT—EQUITY—VERDICT OF JURY.

1. In an action by one in possession of land to enjoin the enforcement of a judgment of ejectment in an action in which he was not a party, it will be presumed that he obtained possession under the defendants in the ejectment action, in the absence of evidence to the contrary.

2. He does not overthrow such presumption by proof that he obtained possession through a stranger to the action in ejectment, unless he shows that the stranger was in possession before the action in ejectment was commenced, or was entitled to possession under a title adverse to that of plaintiff in ejectment.

3. On the issue as to his right to remain in possession, he has the burden of showing that his possession was rightful, and under a title that had not been determined in the action in ejectment, or that possession was not taken by collusion with defendants in the action.

4. A lessee, selling and assigning the lease, together with all his right and interest in the property, thereby conveys all the title that he may have in the property.

5. In an action to enjoin a sheriff from ejecting a plaintiff under a judgment of ejectment against his father, plaintiff testified that he never heard of the action against his father, but he was shown to have been in the court room during a portion of the trial. He testified that he did not know whether his father was ever in possession of the land, but admitted that he had been living with his father, and had worked for him for several years. He obtained from his father, as general manager of a corporation in possession of the land, a conveyance of the personal property of the corporation, and testified that he agreed with his father to permit the corporation to remain in possession of the land without any charge for rent. He claimed to have taken possession under a deed executed by a director of the corporation shortly after the rendition of a judgment of the supreme court affirming the judgment of ejectment. Held, that plaintiff's possession was taken by collusion with his father.

6. On cross-examination of plaintiff's witness, it is proper, for the purpose of impeaching him, to show that his testimony is contradictory to that previously given in another action, though plaintiff was not a party thereto.

7. Instructions given to a jury in a suit in equity are not a subject of an exception, the verdict being merely advisory to the court.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Injunction by E. V. Scheerer against James W. Goodwin and others. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. G. Nagle, for appellant. Edward R. Taylor, for respondents. Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for sheriff.

HARRISON, J. The defendant Goodwin brought an action in ejectment against Joseph Scheerer and the city and county of San Francisco in 1892, in which judgment was rendered in his favor December 30, 1892, from which an appeal was taken, and the judgment affirmed in this court. 106 Cal. 690, 40 Pac. 18. After the remittitur had been filed in the superior court, he caused a writ of restitution to be issued upon the judgment; and while the sheriff was in the execution of this writ the plaintiff herein brought the present action against him and the sheriff for an injunction against its execution, and for damages, upon the ground that he was in possession of the property and the owner thereof. Upon the trial of the cause the court found that the plaintiff had never been the owner of the property, and that his possession thereof was taken by collusion with Joseph Scheerer, his father, for the purpose of evading the force of the aforesaid judgment. Judgment was accordingly rendered in favor of the defendants, from which the present appeal is taken.

Under the judgment in the action of Goodwin v. Scheerer, the sheriff was authorized to remove from the land the defendants in that action, and all persons found thereon whose possession was derived under the defendants therein, or either of them; and, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, it will be presumed that all persons coming into possession of the premises subsequent to the commencement of that action came in under the defendants therein. This presumption is not overthrown by showing that they came in under a stranger to the action, unless they also show that such stranger was in possession at or prior to the commencement of the action, or was entitled to the possession by virtue of a title adverse to that of the plaintiff in the action, which the court would be authorized to protect against the enforcement of the judgment. Upon the issue of their right to remain in possession, the burden is upon them to show affirmatively that their possession is rightful, and under a title that has not been determined in the action, and that such possession was not taken by collusion with the defendants in the judgment. Long v. Neville, 29 Cal. 131; Leese v. Clark, Id. 664; Wetherbee v. Dunn, 36 Cal. 147.

The findings of the court that the plaintiff never had any interest in the land, and that his entry upon the land was by collusion with his father for the purpose of evading the judgment against his father, necessitated a judgment in favor of the defendants. We are of the opinion, moreover, that the evidence before the court authorized it to make these findings. The plaintiff's claim of title to the land rests upon a conveyance to him by one Freund, and he can have no right to resist the execution of the writ by virtue of this conveyance, unless Freund could himself have resisted the writ. Freund's rights in the property are based upon a deed made to him by Joseph Scheerer in July, 1891, but Joseph Scheerer could convey no greater rights than he himself then had in the land. He testified that in 1875 he "bought out" the contracting firm of Brunt & Thurston, but there is nothing in the record showing that Brunt & Thurston had any possession of the premises or interest in the land, and it was shown that in December, 1890, Joseph Scheerer took a lease of the land from the city and county of San Francisco for the term of three years from that date; and, in the absence of any other evidence on the point, his possession thereafter would be referable to this lease. In February, 1891, he sold and assigned to the "Joseph Scheerer Company, a corporation," this lease, together with all his right and interest in the property described in the lease, so that at the date of his deed to Freund he had no interest in the property which he could transfer to him. The court was also authorized to find from the testimony of Freund that the conveyance to him by Scheerer was merely a security for Scheerer's indebtedness to him.

The court was also authorized to find that the subsequent entry of the plaintiff was collusive and fraudulent. He testified that he had never heard of the suit of Goodwin v. Scheerer, or of his father's litigation with the city, but it was shown that he was present in court during a portion of the trial of that action. He also testified that he did not know whether his father ever occupied or was in possession of the property, but he admitted that he had been working for his father for several years, and had been living with him during all the time. The case of Goodwin v. Scheerer was argued in the supreme court in February, 1895. March 16, 1895, the plaintiff took a bill of sale from the California Paving Company of all the personal property upon the lot. This bill of sale purported to be for the sum of $1,500, but he testified that it was given to him for wages due him from the paving company. His father, as president of the paving company, executed the bill of sale to him; and he testified that he then agreed with his father that the company could remain there without any charge for rent, if they desired it, and as long as they chose, but that he made no agreement on the subject with the company, and that the company continued to use the premises for its business. His father was the president and general manager of the company, and Freund was also a member and one of the directors of the paving company, but the plaintiff did not know whether he was the secretary of the company at that time or not. The judgment in Goodwin v. Scheerer was affirmed in this court April 3, 1895, and in the ordinary course of procedure the remittitur thereon would issue on the 3d of May. On May 1st the plaintiff received his deed from Freund, and assumed control of the property. The observations of the court in Wetherbee v. Dunn, supra, are appropriate here: "We are satisfied, as the court below must have been, that this case presents another instance of an indirect effort through other parties to evade the process of the court, and deprive the plaintiff in an action to recover land, after a long and successful litigation, of the fruits of his judgment."

Joseph Scheerer testified that he had not been in possession of the land since he gave the deed to Freund; that at that time he delivered the possession over to Freund. Upon cross-examination his testimony at the trial of the action of Goodwin v. Scheerer was called to his attention, and the plaintiff objected thereto on the ground that, as he was not a party to that action, he could not be bound by the judgment or proceedings therein. The court overruled his objection, to which an exception was taken, and allowed the witness to be questioned thereon. It was competent, upon the cross-examination of this witness, for the purpose of impeaching his testimony that he had delivered the possession to Freund, to show that he had given contrary testimony at the former trial. It is true that the judgment in that action would not be evidence against the plaintiff herein that Joseph Scheerer was in possession of the land at the time that action was brought, but it was competent to show as a fact herein that he was at that time in possession; and, if such fact could be shown, the judgment would be binding upon all persons thereafter coming in under him. It appeared that at the former trial he testified that he took possession of the premises about two years previous thereto under a lease from the city; that he was then put into possession by the superintendent of streets, and had been there ever since. Upon this testimony being called to his attention, he said that it referred to other property than that involved herein, but it was shown that the property described in the lease was the same as that described in the complaint in this action, and also in the complaint in the action of Goodwin v. Scheerer; and the witness also testified that this was the only lease that he had ever taken from the city. Under this evidence the court was fully authorized to find that he was in the possession of the land at the time of the former action, and, under its finding that the entry of the plaintiff herein was under him, he was bound by the judgment in that action.

The action herein is in equity, but the court called in a jury to aid it in its decision, and a verdict was rendered by the jury in favor of the defendants. It does not appear that there were any special issues submitted to the jury. The court, however, made its findings of fact, in which it adopted the conclusion of the jury. The appellant has objected to certain instructions given to the jury, but, as the verdict was merely advisory to the court, these instructions are not the subject of an exception. Richardson v. City of Eureka, 110 Cal. 441, 42 Pac. 965. The judgment and order are affirmed.

KYLE et al. v. CRAIG. (S. F. 1,259.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1899.)

PLEADING—DEMURRER—GROUNDS—COMPLAINT—CAUSE OF ACTION—SUFFICIENCY—EVIDENCE—LEADING QUESTIONS—RES GESTÆ—COMPETENCY—DEPOSITIONS—OBJECTIONS TO QUESTIONS—TAKING DEPOSITION IN SHORTHAND—APPEAL AND ERROR—FAILURE TO POINT OUT SPECIFIC ERROR.

1. A ground of demurrer "that said complaint sets up two counts for one cause of action" cannot be considered, as it is not a ground of demurrer, within Code Civ. Proc. § 430, providing what shall be grounds of demurrer.

2. Where a complaint alleges that the grantee named in a deed, for which there was no consideration, wrongfully got possession of it and placed it upon record, and claims to own the property, the grantor is entitled to relief, though it is also alleged that such deed was made by the grantor in contemplation of immediate death.

3. A complaint alleging that the transfers of property were made in view of immediate death, and that defendant was to carry out certain written instructions in case plaintiff should die, and asking for a reconveyance of the property, plaintiff not having died, is not uncertain and ambiguous, in that such written instructions are not set out, as the instructions are immaterial, the gist of the action being to compel a reconveyance.

4. The allowance of leading questions is in the discretion of the trial court, and a case will not be reversed on such grounds, unless there is a manifest abuse of discretion.

5. Where there is a question as to whether or not plaintiff transferred his property in contemplation of immediate death, a question calling for the conversation had by the witness with plaintiff just prior to and at the time plaintiff made the conveyance is relevant and material as a part of the res gestæ.

6. Where plaintiff, in contemplation of death, transferred his property to defendant, with the understanding that defendant should, after plaintiff's death, dispose of the property according to certain instructions, testimony of the plaintiff as to his intentions when he made the transfers is competent and material.

7. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2032, declaring that in taking a deposition, if the parties attend at the examination, no objection to the form of an interrogatory shall be made at the trial, unless the same was stated at the time of the examination, objections to leading questions in a deposition cannot be made at trial, where the record does not show that the objections were made at the time of taking the deposition, but shows that the counsel attended at the examination.

8. Where the certificate of the notary to a deposition shows that, when the deposition was transcribed into longhand, it was read by the notary to the witness, and subscribed by him, an objection to such deposition being read in evidence, on the ground that it was taken in shorthand by a shorthand reporter not appointed by the court, and transcribed into longhand by such reporter, is properly overruled.

9. Where it is claimed that the court failed to find on some of the material issues, but attention is not called to any material issue upon which there is no finding, and counsel fails to point out in his brief the particular issue or issues upon which there should have been a finding, the court will not search the record to discover such issue or issues.

10. Where the particulars in which the evidence is said to be insufficient to justify any particular finding or part thereof are not pointed out in the assignments of error, the assignment will not be considered.

11. Where counsel failed to point out in his brief or to call attention to the particular finding or findings claimed to have no support in the evidence, and the particulars in which such finding is not supported, the question will not be considered on appeal, though the specifications in the assignments of error are sufficient.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Thomas Kyle and B. Sarle, executors, etc., against Mary Craig to compel a reconveyance of property alleged to be held by defendant in trust for plaintiffs. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. Castelhun, for appellant. James H. McKnight and Chas. L. Patton, for respondents.

COOPER, C. This action was brought by one Robert Bright to have it adjudged that the defendant holds the legal title to certain real estate described in the complaint in trust for plaintiff, and that defendant be required to execute and deliver to plaintiff a good and sufficient deed to said real estate, and also to recover certain moneys that are alleged to be the property of plaintiff, and held by defendant in trust for him. The facts, as shown by the record and found by the court, are, in substance, as follows: The original plaintiff, Robert Bright, and the defendant were brother and sister, and for many years prior to June 7, 1895, they had lived together in the same house, and on the most friendly and confidential relations. The plaintiff was then about 78 years old, and the defendant about 76. About the 31st of May, 1895, the original plaintiff was afflicted with a severe stroke of paralysis, and became so ill that on the 7th day of June following he was in danger and expectation of immediate death, and while in such condition he assigned to defendant deposits amounting to about $17,000 in certain savings banks, and also executed and acknowledged a deed to defendant of certain real estate in the city and county of San Francisco, particularly described in the complaint. The assignment and deed were made with the understanding that defendant should, after the death of the original plaintiff, dispose of the property according to certain instructions given to defendant by said plaintiff. The deed was never delivered to defendant, but was placed in a drawer of a table in a room then occupied by said plaintiff, and afterwards, without the knowledge or consent of said plaintiff, defendant took the deed from the said drawer, and on January 7, 1896, placed the same of record with the county recorder of the city and county of San Francisco. There was no consideration for the said deed or the transfer of said bank accounts. After the 9th day of June, 1895, the plaintiff ceased to be in danger of immediate death, and afterwards he demanded of defendant that she deed, assign, and transfer the said property back to plaintiff, all of which she refused to do. She not only refused to reconvey the property, but claimed to be the owner of it and seised in fee of the real estate. The plaintiff on the 2d day of March, 1897, and before the trial of this case, died, and on the 8th day of March, 1897, the present plaintiffs, as special administrators of his estate, were substituted, and plaintiffs are now the executors of the last will and testament of the original plaintiff. After the date of the transfers of said real and personal property, and prior to the death of the original plaintiff, defendant had laid out and expended $2,000 for taxes, insurance, nursing of plaintiff, etc. Upon these facts the court below deducted $2,000 from the amount of the said deposits, and gave judgment against defendant for the balance, and that the defendant has no right, title, or interest in said real estate; and that defendant deliver up the said deed to be canceled, and be enjoined from setting up any claim to the lands therein described. A motion was made for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal by defendant is from the judgment and order. The record is quite voluminous, and counsel for appellant has filed a brief of 34 printed pages. Counsel for plaintiffs have not seen fit to file a reply, and thus the full labor of investigating all the questions raised in appellant's brief is thrown upon this court, with no assistance from plaintiffs' counsel.

Defendant's counsel urges that the demurrer to the amended complaint should have been sustained upon several different grounds. The complaint sets forth what are claimed to be the facts in two counts,—the first count being in regard to the real estate, and the second count in regard to the deposits in the bank. The main facts are set forth by the pleader "as having occurred June 7, 1895, as a part of the same transaction." The principal ground of demurrer, and the one first urged, is "that said complaint sets up two counts for one cause of action." This is not one of the grounds of demurrer laid down in the Code (Code Civ. Proc. § 430), and no others can be considered. Hentsch v. Porter, 10 Cal. 558; Bernero v. Insurance Co., 65 Cal. 386, 4 Pac. 382. The cases cited in appellant's brief relate to where a single act or transaction is made the subject of separate actions. Here we have only one action in regard to one transaction, although the same is set forth in two separate counts. The counts might be both considered together as a narration of the facts upon which plaintiffs rely for a recovery. If the facts are fully set out, although given in what the pleader calls "separate counts," each numbered into separate paragraphs, it can make no difference, and cannot injure or prejudice the defendant in any way. It is next claimed that the first count does not state a cause of action, because it is an attempt to have the court declare a transaction in regard to real property to have been donatio causa mortis, and that a gift in view of death applies to personal property only. The answer to this is that the pleader states that the deed was without consideration, and was never delivered to defendant. If a grantee named in a deed, to whom the deed was never delivered, and for which there was no consideration, wrongly gets possession of the deed and places it upon record, and then claims to own the property therein described, it seems to us that the grantor, upon stating and proving these facts, would be entitled to relief. The point is further urged that the complaint is uncertain and ambiguous, in that it avers that the defendant would dispose of the real and personal property in accordance with certain written instructions, and that the same are not set out, and it is impossible to determine what they were. The complaint sets forth that, as the transfers were made in view of immediate death, defendant was to carry out certain written instructions in case plaintiff should die. As the plaintiff did not die, but lived to claim his property, and as the gist of the action is to compel a reconveyance, the written instructions are immaterial. There is no claim that any written instructions should be enforced, and no claim as to anything caused by the want of such instructions being carried out. We think the demurrer was properly overruled. For the reasons given in regard to ruling upon the demurrer, it was not error for the court to refuse to compel the plaintiffs to proceed upon one count only of their complaint. It is claimed that the court committed many errors in overruling defendant's objections to testimony. There are 87 of these assignments of error in the transcript, argued under 27 different assignments in appellant's brief. In the first assignment it is said that the court erred in overruling the defendant's objections to three questions asked of the witness Dr. Mays. The witness had attended Robert Bright more or less for five years. He was called in to see him professionally about May 21, 1895, and attended him about twice a day until June 17th. The questions were then asked of the witness: "Q. Did you find him in the same condition during that time?" The witness answered: "His condition varied, improving slightly after a few months. During the first week following the 30th of May his condition became worse. Q. As a matter of fact, doctor, was Robert Bright in danger of death at that time?" The witness, in answer, said: "There was considerable danger of death. For some time I thought death might ensue at any time. * * * Q. Did he take these opiates in sufficient quantities to impair his capacity?" The witness answered: "No; simply sufficient to allay the pain." All these questions were objected to upon the sole ground that they were leading, and the objection overruled. This court would not reverse a case for error in the matter of admission of testimony, unless the errors were in regard to a material matter affecting the substantial rights of the parties. Kiler v. Kimbal, 10 Cal. 267. It is a well settled rule in this state that the allowance of leading questions is in the discretion of the trial court, and that a case will not be reversed on such ground, unless there is a manifest abuse of discretion. White v. White, 82 Cal. 452, 23 Pac. 276. We think, while the questions were leading, that there was not such an abuse of discretion as would warrant us in holding the rulings to be reversible error. One Capp had been for many years and was on the 4th of June, 1895, the agent and business manager of the said Robert Bright. He was sent for by Bright on said day, and for the purpose of having some disposition made of his property in case he should die. When called as a witness, after some preliminary questions, and after stating that, in response to a call from a messenger, he went to the house where Bright was staying, this question was asked: "Q. State what conversation you had with Mr. Bright on this occasion." This question was objected to upon the ground "that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial." The objection was overruled, and exception taken. It is said that this ruling was error, for the reason that the conversation was not had in the presence of defendant, and that, even if she had been present, it was irrelevant and immaterial; and, further, that a deed cannot be invalidated by subsequent declarations of the grantor. We think the evidence was relevant and material as a part of the res gestæ. The witness had been called upon to make certain arrangements about Bright's property in case he should die. It seems Bright wanted to make a will, and at first talked about that, but afterwards concluded to make a deed to his sister, and gave the witness a statement of what he wanted his sister to do with the property in case he should die. It was alleged in the complaint that the transfers were made without consideration and in expectation of immediate death. The answer took issue upon this. It was therefore necessary to inquire fully into the acts done by Robert Bright, and his motives and intentions. The very question to be determined was as to whether or not the transfers were made with a belief on the part of Robert Bright that he was nearing the presence of the monster, Death. The testimony was not as to what Bright said after the transfers, but what he said before he made them, and as a part of what was to be done. Where it is necessary to inquire into the motive of a particular act, and the intention of the person who did the act, proof of what the person said at the time of doing it is admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing its true character. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 108; 1 Rice, Ev. § 211b; 1 Phil. Ev. 233. In the case of Lund v. Inhabitants of Tyngsborough, 9 Cush. 43, the court, in a very learned and exhaustive review of the law as to the admissibility of hearsay evidence, said: "Perhaps the most common and largest class of cases in which declarations are admissible is that in which the state of mind or motive with which any particular act is done is the subject of inquiry;" and, after discussing the many rules and exceptions, laid down the rule: "When the act of a party may be given in evidence, his declarations, made at the time, and calculated to elucidate and explain the character and quality of the act, and so connected with it as to constitute one transaction, and so as to derive credit from the act itself, are admissible in evidence. The credit which the act or fact gives to the accompanying declarations as a part of the transaction, and the tendency of the contemporary declarations as part of the transaction to explain the particular fact, distinguish this class of declarations from mere hearsay."

It is earnestly contended that the court erred in allowing Bright to testify, under the objections of defendant, as to his intentions when he executed the deed and transfers of property to defendant. We think the testimony was competent and material. The intentions and motives of Bright were the material matters being investigated. In such cases the universal rule is to receive the witness' testimony as to his intentions. Whart. Ev. §§ 482, 508, 955; Snow v. Payne, 114 Mass. 526; Barnhart v. Fulkerth, 93 Cal. 499, 29 Pac. 50. The objections and exceptions in the transcript from the seventh to the eighty-seventh, inclusive, are to questions asked in the deposition of the plaintiff, which was admitted and read in evidence. A large number of the questions are objected to upon the ground that they are leading. It does not appear from the record whether or not the objections were made at the time of taking the deposition, but it does appear that counsel for defendant attended at the examination. The Code (Code Civ. Proc. § 2032) lays down the rule that in taking a deposition, if the parties attend at the examination, no objection to the form of an interrogatory shall be made at the trial, unless the same was stated at the time of the examination. We have examined all the assignments as to errors in receiving testimony, under the objections of defendant, and we do not find any one of sufficient importance that we think we would be justified in holding the rule prejudicial error. The deposition of Robert Bright was offered in evidence, and counsel for defendant objected to it being read, upon the ground "that it was taken in shorthand by a shorthand reporter not appointed by the court, and transcribed into longhand by such reporter, against the objections of defendant's counsel made at the time." The court below asked counsel for defendant if there was any claim that the deposition was not correctly transcribed, and counsel said: "That as to that he could not say." The certificate of the notary shows that, when the deposition was transcribed into longhand, it was by the notary carefully read to the witness, and, being by him first corrected, was subscribed by the witness in the presence of the notary. It is claimed that the words of the witness must be written down by the notary, unless the parties agreed upon a different mode,—citing Code Civ. Proc. § 2006.

Counsel says in his brief: "It is not claimed that the notary might not have employed a clerk to write down the questions and answers with a pen or machine, but it was improper to employ the sister of counsel for plaintiff." It does not appear, except in the brief of counsel, that the sister of counsel for plaintiff was employed as shorthand reporter. If the notary could employ a clerk to write down the questions and answers with a machine, we fail to see why a reporter could not take down the questions and answers. When a witness gives an answer, and it is written out in longhand, it could not be a valid objection that the answer remained in the memory of the writer until he committed it to paper. But, clearly, when an answer is given by a witness, it remains with the person writing and in his memory until it is transferred to paper. If the writer should take it down in characters only known to himself, and thus preserve the memorandum of each question and answer until he afterwards had time to write it down in longhand, we fail to see why, when finally transferred to longhand, it is not written down as completely as if done as the words fell one by one from the lips of the witness. We think the Code clearly contemplates this course. Code Civ. Proc. § 2038. The language is, "Upon the appearance of the witness the judge or justice must cause his testimony to be taken in writing," etc. It is also provided that the deposition, when completed, must be carefully read to the witness and corrected, if desired, and then subscribed by him. This makes the reading, correcting, and signing the necessary and material thing to be done, and it was done in this case. The object of requiring the witness to sign the deposition is to make him responsible for its phraseology, for by signing he adopts the language as his own. Weeks, Dep. § 321. It is claimed that the court failed to find on some of the material issues. Our attention is not called to any material issue upon which there is no finding, and, as counsel has not seen fit to point out in his brief the particular issue or issues upon which there should have been a finding, it cannot be expected that we will go through the record on an independent voyage of discovery.

Defendant's counsel assigns some 15 errors in which he claims the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings. The only specification wherein the evidence is alleged to be insufficient is, "The evidence is insufficient to justify," etc. Unless the particulars in which the evidence is said to be insufficient to justify any particular finding or part thereof are pointed out in the assignment of error, we cannot notice the assignments here. Code Civ. Proc. § 659; De Molera v. Martin, 120 Cal. 544, 52 Pac. 825. And, even if the specifications in the assignments of error were sufficient, counsel has not pointed out in his brief and called our attention to the particular finding or findings claimed to have no support in the evidence, and the particulars in which such finding is not supported by the evidence. In such case we do not deem it our duty to investigate the questions as to the insufficiency of the evidence. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

BANE v. PEERMAN. (S. F. 1,005.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 23, 1899.)

REPLEVIN—COMPLAINT—ALLEGATION OF OWNERSHIP—AIDER BY FINDING.

1. In claim and delivery, it is not sufficient to allege ownership and right of possession at some time previous to the beginning of the action. They must be alleged to exist at the time the action was begun.

2. In claim and delivery, the failure to allege ownership and right of possession by the plaintiff at the time the action was begun is not cured by a finding in favor of the plaintiff, notwithstanding the existence of an allegation of ownership and right of possession at some time previous to the beginning of the action.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county. Action in claim and delivery by Margaret E. Bane, administratrix, against M. H. Peerman. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. B. Ware and Thomas Rutledge, for appellant. R. M. Swain and Barham & Miller, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Since this appeal was taken respondent, D. C. Bane, died, and Margaret E. Bane, administratrix of his estate, has been substituted by this court as plaintiff and respondent. This action is in claim and delivery. Findings and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals from the judgment on the judgment roll. It is contended by appellant that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the findings are defective, and do not support the judgment. The complaint alleges: "That on the 9th day of July, 1896, said plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the immediate possession of all the following goods and chattels: * * * That the said defendant, on the 9th day of July, 1896, at Santa Rosa, Sonoma county, without plaintiff's consent, and wrongfully, took said goods and chattels from the possession of plaintiff, and has continuously retained the same." A demand is alleged to have been made "on the 9th day of July, 1896," for possession of said goods, and that defendant "still unlawfully withholds and detains said goods and chattels," etc. The complaint was sworn to and filed on July 23, 1896. The defects in the complaint in this case cannot be distinguished from those considered in Truman v. Young, 121 Cal. 490, 53 Pac. 1073, and upon the authority of that case, and others there cited, we conclude that it does not state a cause of action. Respondent contends, however, that the defective allegations in the complaint are cured by the findings. But here there is a total failure to allege that the plaintiff was the owner of the property and entitled to its possession at the time the action was commenced, and not a defective allegation that he was the owner and entitled to the possession at that time. Sufficient findings to support a judgment must have a basis in the pleadings, and never cure the absence of an essential allegation. Findings of fact must be within the issues, and there was no issue as to the ownership and right of possession when the action was commenced. The issue as to the ownership and right of possession on the 9th of July was immaterial. I advise that the judgment appealed from be reversed, with leave to the plaintiff to amend the complaint.

PEOPLE v. SHEA. (Cr. 509.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 19, 1899.)

RAPE—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for rape, evidence is admissible tending to prove that prosecutrix had previously had intercourse with other men.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Patrick Shea was convicted of rape, and from an order granting him a new trial the state appeals. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People. A. E. Mack and A. D. Lemon, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Information charging the crime of rape. Defendant was convicted, and on his motion the court made an order granting a new trial, from which order the people have appealed. The question involved in this appeal arises upon the admissibility of certain evidence. This evidence was offered by defendant, and tended to prove that the prosecutrix, previous to the time when the commission of the offense here charged was laid in the information, had consented to the having of sexual intercourse with other men. In the early case of People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221, this identical question was involved, and it was there held that such evidence was competent and admissible. In People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 39 Pac. 622, the Benson Case is cited, and the court said: "This class of evidence is admissible for the purpose of tending to show the nonprobability of resistance upon the part of the prosecutrix; for it is certainly more probable that a woman who has done these things voluntarily in the past would be likely to consent than one whose past reputation was without blemish, and whose personal conduct could not truthfully be assailed." It may be conceded that the weight of authority is opposed to the rule laid down in the Benson Case. Yet there is respectable authority supporting the doctrine as there declared. State v. Sutherland, 30 Iowa, 573; Benstine v. State, 70 Tenn. 175; State v. Patterson, 88 Mo. 91; People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. 190; Brennan v. People, 7 Hun, 171; Woods v. People, 55 N. Y. 515. The Benson Case was quite well considered. And in view of the fact that it has stood so many years as evidencing the law of this state upon the proposition, the reasons urged for its overthrow at this time are not deemed sufficient by the court. For the foregoing reasons, the order granting the new trial is affirmed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; TEMPLE, J.; HARRISON, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent for the reason that, in my opinion, the court erred in allowing evidence tending to show specific acts of adultery by the prosecutrix with other men. The general rule undoubtedly is that specific acts cannot be proven for the purpose of impeaching a witness, and I see no force in the reasoning that such acts are admissible because they tend to show that the prosecutrix probably consented at the time of the alleged rape. Such acts were no more admissible than would former assaults on others by a man charged with murder be admissible because they would tend to the probability that the defendant committed the murderous assault charged. In People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221, the court was evidently not sure of its position, because, having referred to section 214, 3 Greenl. Ev., where an exactly opposite rule is declared, and which, as the court say, was probably founded upon Rex v. Hodgson, Russ. & R. 211, and other English cases, it uses this language: "But, admitting the full force of the rule in Rex v. Hodgson, still we are of the opinion that the circumstances of this case modify the rule," and proceeds to say, in effect, that the prosecutrix in that case, being young and ignorant, probably had no general reputation. This reasoning is entirely unsatisfactory to me, and I think that upon principle and upon the great weight of authority People v. Benson should be held as improperly decided. The reason that specific acts cannot be proven, while general reputation may, is as old as the law, and founded upon the stable ground that a witness is supposed to be able to maintain his or her general reputation, while witnesses cannot be expected to be able to disprove testimony as to special acts to which their attention had not been called. I think that if counsel for defendant in cases like this are allowed to even ask questions tending to prove that a prosecutrix had sexual intercourse with another man, great injustice and wrong will follow. For this reason I think that the order granting a new trial should be reversed.

YORE v. SEITZ et al. (Sac. 510.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 21, 1899.)

APPEAL AND ERROR—REVIEW.

A finding supported by evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sierra county.

Action by J. J. Yore against F. J. Seitz and F. J. Seitz, administratrix of the estate of Anna Maria Seitz. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. D. Soward, for appellants. Frank R. Wehe, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to foreclose a pledge of 200,000 shares of the capital stock of the Butte Saddle Gold-Mining Company, a corporation. By appellants it is contended that the stock was the separate property of Anna Maria Seitz, the wife of appellant F. J. Seitz; that certain payments or advances made by the pledgee were not within the terms of the pledge; and that as to them he does not hold the stock as security. The court, however, found that the pledged stock was community property. This finding is attacked, but it cannot be overthrown. There is evidence sufficient to support it. The questioned payments were made at the request of the husband, F. J. Seitz, and under his contract the stock was made security for them. The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

CLUNE v. QUITZOW. (S. F. 1,004.)

DEFAULT—JUDGMENT ON THE MERITS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 594, providing that "either party may bring an issue to trial, or to a hearing, and in the absence of the adverse party, unless the court, for good cause otherwise direct, may proceed with his case, and take a dismissal of the action, or a verdict, or judgment, as the case may require," a defendant may proceed with the case upon the failure of the plaintiff to appear, and judgment may be entered on the merits.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by J. E. Clune against H. W. Quitzow. Plaintiff failed to appear at the trial, and judgment was entered for defendant on the merits. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

P. L. Koscialowski and Sullivan & Sullivan, for appellant. H. W. Quitzow, in pro. per.

HAYNES, C. This action was based upon three separate causes of action to recover certain sums of money. The defendant answered, putting the facts in issue, and sought to recover from the plaintiff $404.37. Plaintiff failed to appear at the trial. The defendant, as appears from the judgment, was sworn and examined as a witness, and the court thereupon entered judgment that plaintiff "do take nothing by his said action as against H. W. Quitzow, defendant, but that judgment be, and the same is hereby, entered herein in favor of the defendant for his (defendant's) costs and disbursements incurred in this action, amounting to the sum of ten dollars." The plaintiff appeals from the judgment, upon the judgment roll, contending that "plaintiff having failed to appear at the trial, having offered no proofs, and having, in effect, abandoned the case, the judgment should have been a judgment of dismissal, and not on the merits."

Appellant relies upon sections 581 and 582 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 581 contains six subdivisions, setting out the circumstances under which an action may be dismissed, or a nonsuit entered. Under subdivision 3 the defendant might have had the action dismissed, but he was not bound to do so. The plaintiff could not have had the action dismissed, under this section, without the consent of the defendant, because affirmative relief was sought by the answer. Section 582 provides, "In every case, other than those mentioned in the last section, the judgment must be upon the merits." Section 594, Code Civ. Proc., provides, "Either party may bring an issue to trial, or to a hearing, and in the absence of the adverse party, unless the court, for good cause otherwise direct, may proceed with his case, and take a dismissal of the action, or a verdict, or judgment, as the case may require." It was the right of the defendant, under the provisions of said section, to proceed with the case, and to have a judgment entered finally disposing of the case, and the court did not err in granting it. I advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

MESENBURG v. DUNN. (S. F. 1,035.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 23, 1899.)

JURY TRIAL—EQUITABLE ISSUES.

In an action to annul contracts to purchase land entered into by plaintiff, and to recover money paid to defendant thereunder, on the ground that such contracts were procured by fraud, when the answer denies merely the fraud, and not the amount paid, the defendant is not entitled to a jury trial.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Bill by Herman Mesenburg against James Dunn. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appealed. Affirmed.

Daniel Titus, for appellant. Otto Tum Suden, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and the only point made for a reversal is that the court erroneously denied appellant's demand for a jury trial. It is averred in the complaint that plaintiff was induced by false representations, which are set forth, to enter into certain written contracts with defendant, by which he agreed to purchase certain lands from the defendant, and that he paid to defendant as a part of the purchase price the sum of $760; and he prays for a decree of the court declaring said contracts null and void, and also that he have judgment for said $760. The demand for a jury was general, and embraced the whole case, the language being, "demands a jury, and that said cause be tried by a jury." The main purpose of the action, to wit, to have the contracts declared null and void, clearly brought that part of the action within equitable jurisdiction; and under no view was the defendant entitled to have the whole case tried by a jury. But, waiving that point, his demand for a jury was, upon general principles, properly denied. The recovery of the part payment made under the contract was merely incidental to the main issue, and the court, as a court of equity having jurisdiction of the main action, properly determined the whole controversy so as to prevent future litigation, no issue being raised except as to the matters upon which plaintiff founded his demand for the equitable interposition of the court. In his answer the appellant merely denied the alleged facts as to the false representation, and no issue is raised as to the amount of money paid on the contract; and therefore it is not a case where a legal defense strictly cognizable in a court of law is made to a complaint which is in form a bill of equity; and is unlike Donahue v. Meister, 88 Cal. 121, 25 Pac. 1096, Newman v. Duane, 89 Cal. 597, 27 Pac. 66, and other cases cited by appellant. The case at bar is within the principles declared in Crocker v. Carpenter, 98 Cal. 418, 33 Pac. 271, where some of the cases cited by appellant are reviewed, and distinguished from cases like the present one. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO
v. BRODERICK, Auditor. (S. F. 1,436.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 21, 1899.)

STATUTES—LOCAL AND SPECIAL LAWS—APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTIES AND ASSISTANTS BY COUNTY CLERK—COUNTIES—COMPENSATION OF EXTRA DEPUTIES AND ASSISTANTS.

1. St. 1880, p. 20, § 1, providing that in certain cases the county clerk of any city and county having over 100,000 inhabitants is authorized to appoint deputies, assistants, and copyists, and St. 1891, p. 5, re-enacting the former statute, except that its operation is limited to any city and county or counties having 120,000 inhabitants, since they create offices and fix the duties of the officers in but one class of counties, which class is arbitrarily created and designated by population, are in violation of Const. art. 11, § 5, declaring that the legislature, by general and uniform laws, shall provide for the election or appointment in the several counties of county clerks and such other county officers, and Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 28, forbidding the legislature from passing local or special laws creating offices or prescribing the powers and duties of officers in cities and counties.

2. Under St. 1893, p. 367, § 61 (St. 1897, p. 475, § 59), declaring that every county officer may appoint as many deputies as may be necessary for the prompt and faithful discharge of the duties of his office, the county clerk may appoint additional deputies and assistants if the needs of his office so require; but allowance of compensation of these extra deputies and assistants out of the treasury is prohibited, as being in violation of Const. art. 11, § 13, providing that no person shall be granted power to control, appropriate, supervise, or in any way interfere with county funds.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by the city and county of San Francisco against William Broderick, as auditor of the city and county of San Francisco, to enjoin defendant from allowing demands of certain assistant register clerks and copyists appointed by the county clerk. There was a judgment of dismissal, and petitioner appeals. Reversed.

H. T. Cresswell, for appellant. G. W. McEnerney, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was instituted to enjoin the auditor from allowing the demands of certain assistant register clerks and copyists appointed by the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco. The auditor demurred to the petition, and his demurrer was sustained. The city and county declined to amend, and a judgment of dismissal was entered. From that judgment this appeal is taken.

The principal question thus presented is not so much that of the power of the clerk to appoint, as it is the duty of the city and county to pay the salaries of, the appointees. At the time when the present constitution took effect there were upon the statute books certain acts affecting the office of the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco. These need not be particularized further than to state that they authorized the clerk to appoint certain deputy clerks, court-room clerks, register clerks, assistant register clerks, record clerks, and copyists, with specified salaries for each, payable out of the treasury. Whatever may have been the effect of the present constitution upon these acts, it is conceded that the act of February 13, 1880 (St. 1880, p. 5), an act passed after the adoption of the present constitution, was a general act, which revived and continued in force these earlier acts, and fixed the duties of the deputies and assistants appointed thereunder. Thereafter the legislature passed an act entitled "An act in relation to certain deputies" (St. 1880, p. 20), section 1 of which provided: "In all cases in which by statutes in force on the 31st day of December, 1879, the county clerk of any city and county having over one hundred thousand inhabitants is authorized to appoint deputies, assistants and copyists, in or in connection with the courts which are abolished by the constitution now in force, the county clerk may appoint four competent persons as such deputies, assistants and copyists, for each superior court, and where by law such superior court is entitled to more than one judge he may appoint three persons as such deputies, assistants and copyists for each additional judge; and such deputies, assistants and copyists, so appointed, shall be entitled to the same compensation as is provided in said statutes, and the same shall be audited and paid at the same time and manner, and from the same sources, as is provided therein. He may also appoint such additional number of copyists as the duties of his office shall in his discretion from time to time require," etc. In 1891 the legislature passed an act amendatory to this last statute, entitled "An act in relation to certain deputies, assistants and copyists of county clerks, approved April 2, 1880." St. 1891, p. 5. This act was a re-enactment of the act of 1880, saving that its operation was limited to any city and county or counties having over 120,000 inhabitants, and it created the office of chief deputy clerk, at a salary of $250 per month. It is not seriously questioned in this case but that these statutes last cited are in violation of the terms of the constitution, and void. Indeed, it cannot successfully be denied that such is the case. Section 5, art. 11, of the constitution declares that "the legislature by general and uniform laws shall provide for the election or appointment in the several counties of boards of supervisors, * * * county clerks, * * * and such other county, township and municipal officers as public convenience may require, and shall prescribe their duties, and fix their terms of office." Subdivision 28, § 25, art. 4, Id., forbids the legislature from passing local or special laws "creating offices or prescribing the powers and duties of officers in counties, cities and counties, cities, township, election or school districts." These acts are obnoxious to the constitution, then, in that they create offices and fix the duties of the officers in but one class of counties, which class is arbitrarily created, and designated by population, notwithstanding the fact that the constitution declares that this shall be done only by general law, and that the counties of the state may be classified by population only for the purpose of fixing the compensation of their officers. Earle v. Board, 55 Cal. 489; Rauer v. Williams, 118

Cal. 401, 50 Pac. 691. See, also, Farrell v. Board, 85 Cal. 408, 24 Pac. 868.

Notwithstanding the invalidity of these statutes, it is contended that the power to appoint these officers may be found in the county government act, itself admittedly a general law; that the county government act provides that in counties of the first class, to which San Francisco belongs, "the officers shall receive as compensation for the services required of them by law, or by virtue of their office, the salaries and fees fixed by law as compensation" (St. 1897, p. 547, § 188); and that reference may be had to these unconstitutional acts for the purpose of determining what salary is to be allowed (People v. Bircham, 12 Cal. 50; State v. City of Cincinnati, 52 Ohio St. 419, 40 N. E. 508). Section 61 of the county government act is the section containing the authority which it is contended authorized these appointments. It is a general section, and reads as follows: "Every county, township or district officer, except a supervisor or judicial officer, may appoint as many deputies as may be necessary for the prompt and faithful discharge of the duties of his office. Such appointment must be made in writing and filed in the office of the county clerk, and until such appointment is so made, and filed, and until such deputy shall have taken the oath of office, no one shall be or act as such deputy." St. 1893, p. 367; St. 1897, p. 475, § 59. This is certainly a grant of power from the legislature to the designated officers, authorizing them to appoint necessary deputies, but the question of the compensation of these deputies, when appointed, is quite a different matter. It does not follow that because deputies may be appointed their salaries must be paid by the county. It will not seriously be contended that this permission which the legislature has accorded is to be construed into a power placed in the hands of these officers to appoint deputies at will, and make their salaries a charge against the counties. Such a construction would result in a grievous interference with the county funds, and would come clearly within the purview of section 13, art. 11, of the constitution, which prohibits the legislature from delegating "to any 'individual' any power to make, control, appropriate, supervise or in any way interfere with any county, city, town, or municipal improvement, money, property or effects, whether held in trust or otherwise." Dougherty v. Austin, 94 Cal. 601, 28 Pac. 834, and 29 Pac. 1092; Tulare Co. v. May, 118 Cal. 303, 50 Pac. 427. The county government act, as the constitution ordains, classifies counties by population for the purpose of fixing the compensation of their officers. It declares in section 216 (St. 1893, p. 507, and St. 1897, p. 572) that: "The salaries and fees provided in this act shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers therein named, either as officers or ex officio officers, their deputies and assistants, unless in this act otherwise provided; and all deputies employed shall be paid by their principals out of the salaries hereinbefore provided, unless in this act otherwise provided." As to the payment of these officers and their deputies, a twofold plan or scheme is provided by the act. In certain counties, as in counties of the first, second, third, fifth, and other classes, the county clerk is allowed a salary for himself, and is given a certain number of deputies at fixed salaries, payable out of the county treasury. In counties of the fourth, seventh, eighth, tenth, and other classes the county clerk is allowed a fixed amount, out of which he is required to pay all deputies as well as himself. By both of these systems a fixed and determinate amount only can be drawn from the treasury in payment of the salaries of the chief official and his deputies. Both of these salary schemes have been upheld. Farnum v. Warner, 104 Cal. 679, 38 Pac. 421; Tulare Co. v. May, 118 Cal. 303, 50 Pac. 427. If this limitation were not imposed, and if the officers were allowed to appoint deputies at will, making their salaries a charge upon the treasury, the scheme itself would be in violation of the provisions of the constitution above quoted. Article 11, § 13. But it is precisely this which it is contended that the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco can do,—that he may appoint at will such deputies and assistants as he deems necessary under the provisions of section 61 of the county government act; and these appointees in turn may compel payment of their salaries out of the county treasury. But this may not be done. The county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco, by the act of February 13, 1880 (St. 1880, p. 5), is given a fixed salary, and is allowed a fixed number of deputies and assistants, whose compensation is a charge upon the treasury. He has the power, under section 61 of the county government act, to appoint additional deputies and assistants if the needs of his office so require, but in the present condition of the law the compensation of these extra assistants and deputies must be paid for by himself. The judgment is therefore reversed, with directions to the trial court to overrule the auditor's demurrer.

ROCHE v. REDINGTON et al. (S. F. 1,056.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 21, 1899.)

NEGLIGENCE—IMPUTATION — INSTRUCTIONS—APPEAL — EXCESSIVE DAMAGES — CON-FLICTING EVIDENCE—EARNINGS.

1. In an action for a personal injury caused by the collision of defendant's buggy with plaintiff, an instruction that even if it were proved that the ground was wet and slippery, and that, when defendant tried to turn out, the buggy slipped against plaintiff, yet this would not conclusively repel the presumption of negligence, is not erroneous.

2. In an action for personal injury, an instruction that if it was proved that the injury was immediately due to slippery ground, whereby defendant's buggy slipped against plaintiff despite his attempt to turn out, yet the imputation of negligence would not be conclusively repelled, does not contravene the statute forbidding a charge with respect to matters of fact.

3. Where the evidence is conflicting, and there is some evidence to support the verdict, it will not be disturbed on appeal.

4. A verdict for damages will not be set aside merely because it is excessive, but only where it appears to be the result of prejudice or passion.

5. Where plaintiff, who was employed as a street sweeper, had his leg broken by a collision with defendant's buggy, and a permanent shortening of the leg resulted, rendering him less able to earn a living, a verdict for $4,000 is not so large that it will be set aside.

6. Plaintiff in an action for personal injuries was asked if he had been able to earn any money since the accident. Held that, as it appeared from the testimony of plaintiff that the question referred to his injury, it was relevant and properly admitted.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1.
Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action for personal injury by Thomas Roche against W. P. Redington and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chickering, Thomas & Gregory and Van Ness & Redman, for appellants. Charles F. Hanlon, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action for personal injury. Trial by jury, and verdict for plaintiff, awarding him $4,000 damages. Defendants appeal from the judgment upon the verdict, and from the order denying motion for a new trial. On September 10, 1895, plaintiff was in the employ of the city and county of San Francisco as a street sweeper. An employé of defendants in the course of his employment was driving a business buggy or vehicle, drawn by one horse, along Kearny street, and, while so driving, the hub of one of the hind wheels of the vehicle struck plaintiff, breaking his thigh bone, and otherwise seriously injuring him. The evidence tends to show that the driver of the vehicle (one Goddard) was the solicitor of defendants, and was engaged in the discharge of his duties as such at the time of the accident; that plaintiff, about 10 o'clock a. m. of September 10th, was lawfully in the employ of the city, and was rightfully engaged in the discharge of his duties, and was standing near to, but just outside, the east rail of the west track on Kearny street, about 35 feet north of the north crossing of Jackson street, and was in the act of pushing the debris southwesterly from within the west track towards the west side of the street, with his back turned north, towards Pacific street. He was an old man, of 73 years, but in good general health, and vigorous and strong for one of his age, and able to do a good and satisfactory day's work as a street sweeper. Goddard took the west track on Kearny street with his wagon at Pacific street, and drove at a speed of about five or six miles an hour towards Jackson street, and where plaintiff was working. Plaintiff's feet were outside the track, but he was stooping over, and his head and body were over the track. At a distance of about 200 feet from plaintiff, Goddard noticed plaintiff, and he testified that he called out to plaintiff; but plaintiff testified that he heard no call and no noise, although his hearing was good, until the horse was beside him. He straightened up, and endeavored to protect himself with his broom, but the wagon struck him immediately, and so soon that it was not possible for him to get out of the way. Goddard did not slacken his pace as he approached plaintiff, until he got quite near to him, when, observing that plaintiff did not move, he pulled his horse to the right, out of the track, and the hind wheels of the buggy held the track and "slewed" forward, one of them striking plaintiff, causing the injury. There was evidence tending to show that it had rained that morning, and that the track was wet; but it was not raining at the time of the accident, and the evidence tended to show that it had not rained after 9 o'clock.

It is urged (1) that the evidence does not justify the verdict; (2) that the verdict (four thousand dollars) is grossly excessive; and (3) that the court erred in instructing the jury, and its rulings upon evidence.

1. The court instructed the jury as follows: "There has been considerable evidence in this case in respect to the weather at or prior to the time of the injury in question, relative to the track,—whether it was wet or not. In respect to that matter, I will instruct you that if you should find from the evidence that the driver of the defendant endeavored to avoid injuring the plaintiff, by turning out of the railroad, roadbed, or place whereon he was driving, and that, in consequence of the wet rails or wet street, the wheels of the vehicle slipped, that such slipping would not conclusively repel any imputation of negligence." The words in italics present the part of the instruction claimed to be error. The court had just previously instructed the jury as to the definition of "negligence," and stated: "It [negligence] is always relative; that is to say, it depends entirely upon the nature of the situation and surroundings." And the court followed the instruction complained of by the statement: "If the condition of the street is such that a prudent driver would exercise more care in driving through a public highway, lest he should injure another, then the party driving is required to exercise such care; and that is what I mean by saying that negligence is relative in its character, depending always upon the time, situation, and circumstances wherein the parties may be placed." In the instruction complained of, we think the court, in effect, instructed the jury that it cannot be said that the mere slipping of the wheels, if they find such slipping, as matter of law, would repel the imputation of negligence. It was only another way of saying that the circumstance, if found to exist, would not justify a conclusive presumption, or show conclusively that there was no negligence. Such an instruction was proper, and was not a violation of the constitutional prohibition to charge the jury with respect to matter of fact.

2. Upon some points the evidence was conflicting, but there was evidence tending to show that Goddard drove at considerable speed almost onto plaintiff before he pulled the horse out of the track, and that the injury was the result of want of ordinary care and prudence, if not of recklessness, on the part of the driver, and without the fault of plaintiff, who was oblivious of his danger. We think there was evidence sufficient to justify the verdict.

3. Defendant devotes much attention to the claim of excessive damages, and counsel on both sides have brought to our attention, with much industry, a large number of cases bearing upon this question. The injury to plaintiff was serious, and resulted in a permanent shortening of the broken leg, and in rendering plaintiff less able than formerly to do a day's work. He had not entirely recovered at the time of the trial, and was then suffering pain from the injury. The attending physician, Dr. Kenyon, testified: "My best impression is that it does not seem to me that this man will ever be able to do a fair day's work. * * * It is now a year and a quarter since his injury, and he is not in a condition to-day to do that kind of work" (referring to such work as street sweeping). The rule in this class of cases has been many times stated in this court, and it is that, while the verdict of the jury "is subject to review by the court, it will not be disturbed merely upon the ground that the damages are excessive, nor because the opinion of the court differs from that of the jury, but only where it appears that the excess has been given under the influence of passion or prejudice." Lee v. Railroad Co., 101 Cal. 118, 35 Pac. 572. We cannot say that the verdict in this case was given under the influence of passion or prejudice.

4. The plaintiff was asked, and, over defendants' objection, was allowed to answer, the following question: "Have you earned any money since the accident, or been able to earn any money since?" It is urged that this was error, because plaintiff's inability to earn money might have had no connection with the accident. I think it appears from the evidence of the plaintiff, given before and after this question, that it had reference to his condition as the result of the accident. Discovering no reversible error, it is advised that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. June 22, 1899.)

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—ACTION FOR SERVICES—DEFENSES—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

1. Where a written agreement, relied on as a defense, is not denied by affidavit, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 448, its genuineness and due execution are admitted for all purposes of the trial.

2. Defendant, in an action by attorneys to recover for services, relied on an agreement, executed by a member of the firm, undertaking in the firm name to perform the services without charge. Plaintiffs claimed that the firm was dissolved prior to the making of the agreement, and that such member was without authority to bind them; but they did not deny the execution of the agreement by affidavit, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 448. Held that, having admitted its execution, and the authority of such member to sign, by the failure to deny it, they could not avoid its effect by a dissolution of the firm.

3. Where the genuineness of a writing set out in the pleading is admitted, a formal offer in evidence of the original instrument is not necessary.

4. Where, in an action by attorneys to recover for services, defendant relies on an agreement, executed by a member of the firm, undertaking to perform the services without charge, a contention that defendant did not allege that the services performed were under the agreement is unavailable, where the matters alleged were equivalent to such an allegation, and evidence was introduced to that effect without objection.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by R. H. Knight and another against Rosa L. Whitmore. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Knight & Harpham, for appellants. J. G. Rossiter and Ben Goodrich, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Plaintiffs have brought this action to recover for legal services, and, judgment going against them, have appealed to this court.

They rely upon an alleged oral contract of hiring. As a defense the defendant set out an agreement in writing, which is in the following language: "Pasadena, Cal., April 8, 1895. In the Matter of the Estate of George S. Foster, Deceased. Agreement as to Compensation. We do hereby agree with Mrs. Rosa L. Whitmore, administratrix of said estate, that we will proceed immediately with the above estate in the superior court, and will push the same as fast as possible, and will pay all extra costs in said case occasioned by an error upon our part; and, when the case is entirely completed, and the property distributed, and she is properly discharged as such administratrix, she shall determine for herself what our compensation as attorneys shall be, and we will make no charge or demand against her or said estate for our services as attorneys. [Signed] Knight, Simpson & Harpham, by C. M. Simpson." The aforesaid agreement was not denied by affidavit, as provided in section 448 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Therefore its genuineness and due execution must be deemed admitted for all the purposes of the trial. Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 429, 51 Pac. 630.

Simpson was a member of the legal firm of Knight, Simpson & Harpham for a year immediately prior to April 1, 1895; but it is now claimed by plaintiffs that this firm was dissolved upon said April 1st, and that, therefore, Simpson had no authority to bind them by the contract he entered into in behalf of the firm with defendant. It seems to be somewhat strange that a member of the bar should enter into a contract purporting to bind a firm of which he had been a member, and which had been in existence at a very recent date, if the firm was not in existence at the time the contract was made. This fact alone might be deemed sufficient to create a conflict in the evidence upon the question as to whether or not the firm of Knight, Simpson & Harpham was dissolved in fact at the time this contract was entered into. But we need not rest alone upon this proposition. The contract upon its face shows that Knight, Simpson & Harpham agreed to perform the services specified without charge or demand against defendant or said estate. Plaintiffs admit the genuineness and due execution of this contract. Such admission carries with it the genuineness of the signatures and the fact of its execution, and also, necessarily, the further fact that Simpson had authority to sign the names of these plaintiffs to the document. It follows therefrom that this contract bound plaintiffs to do this work equally with Simpson, and they could not evade the force and effect of its provisions by a dissolution of the firm after that time. If such a firm was in existence, they were bound as a firm. If it was thereafter dissolved, they were bound individually. Even conceding that plaintiffs alone did all the work, it makes no difference. It would require very clear evidence to indicate that there was a second contract entered into by plaintiffs with defendant, under which they performed this labor, and that this written contract was displaced thereby. The jury declared to the contrary, and we are entirely satisfied with the view they took of the facts.

The trial court refused to give the jury the following instruction: "The jury are instructed that the only effect of the failure to deny under oath the contract of April 8, 1895, is to admit its due execution and genuineness; but this does not dispense with its introduction in evidence, and, as the defendant did not offer the contract in evidence, the jury are not to take the same into consideration in forming their verdict in this case." This instruction was properly refused. The writing having been set out in the pleading, and its genuineness and due execution having been admitted, a formal offer in evidence of the original document was not necessary. Rosenthal v. Bank, 110 Cal. 198, 42 Pac. 640; Brooks v. Johnson, 122 Cal. 570, 55 Pac. 423.

The point is made that there is no allegation in the affirmative defense alleging that the services performed by plaintiffs were performed under the said written contract. Even conceding such an allegation necessary, we deem the matters set out are fairly the equivalent of such an allegation, and evidence was introduced to that effect without objection.

There is no merit in the remaining questions raised by the appeal. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

WALLER v. WESTON. (S. F. 1,568.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 22, 1899.)

JUDGMENT—DEFAULT—JURISDICTION—COSTS—
FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW.

1. Upon motion to set aside a default for want of service of summons upon the defendant, the relief should not be conditioned upon the payment of costs by defendants, as in cases where relief is sought from the party's own error or mischance, wherein Code Civ. Proc. § 473, provides relief may be granted upon "such terms as may be just."

2. An order upon a motion to set aside a default for want of jurisdiction should not be accompanied with findings of fact and conclusions of law, as Code Civ. Proc. §§ 632, 633, provide for such findings and conclusions only in cases where there is a trial of a question of fact by the court, followed by a judgment; and, under section 590, an issue of fact arises only upon allegations in a complaint being controverted by the answer, or upon new matters in an answer.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county.

Action by J. B. Waller, plaintiff, against F. F. Weston, defendant, for the foreclosure of a mortgage. A motion by defendant to set aside a default entered against him was overruled for the failure of defendant to pay costs, and he appeals. Reversed.

Fitzgerald & Abbott, for appellant. J. T. Pidwell and Black & Leaming, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. F. F. Weston was defendant in an action to foreclose a mortgage. Summons was issued, and a return made by the sheriff showing personal service upon him. Upon his failure to answer, judgment was taken against him, and a decree of foreclosure entered. A sale was had, and a deficiency judgment docketed. The judgment was entered on the 16th day of October, 1897; and on the 15th day of February, 1898, Weston gave notice of his motion, supported by affidavits, to set aside the default and judgment and quash the service of summons, upon the ground that service of summons had never been made upon him, and that the court had never obtained jurisdiction over him. Upon the hearing it seems to have been satisfactorily established that the defendant had never been served in the action, but that the sheriff by mistake had served his brother in his stead. After hearing, the court made a conditional order vacating the judgment and quashing service of the summons, provided that defendant pay to plaintiff within 10 days the sum of $109. The defendant refused to comply with the terms of the order imposing costs as a condition to the vacation of the judgment. This provisional order vacating the judgment and quashing service of summons upon terms was made upon April 1, 1898. After Weston's refusal to comply with its conditions, the court, upon the 25th day of April, 1898, made and filed certain findings of fact, conclusions of law, and a so-called judgment, by which last order or so-called judgment, the minute order of April 1, 1898, and Weston's refusal to comply with its terms being recited, his motion was denied absolutely. Defendant moved to strike from the files the so-called findings of fact and conclusions of law, which motion was also denied. He then appealed from the minute order of April 1, 1898, vacating and setting aside the judgment, and quashing service of summons provisionally and upon terms; from the so-called judgment and order of April 25, 1898, finally and absolutely denying his motion; and from the minute order of April 25, 1898, denying his motion to strike out the findings of fact and conclusions of law.

Appellant's motion was made, not upon the ground that the judgment had been taken against him through mistake, surprise, or his excusable neglect, but solely upon the ground that he had not been served with process at all. In making its conditional order quashing service of summons, the court must have determined the fact to be in accordance with appellant's contention. Such being the case, appellant was not a suitor before the court, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, seeking relief from his own error or mischance, and becoming entitled to such relief only by compliance with such proper terms as the court might exact. He was not seeking to be permitted upon terms to come in and answer.

He was before the court, insisting that it had never obtained jurisdiction over him, and that a judgment against him, void for want of jurisdiction, should be set aside. His case is like those considered in Norton v. Railroad Co., 97 Cal. 388, 30 Pac. 585, and 32 Pac. 452, and Mott Iron Works v. West Coast Plumbing Supply Co., 113 Cal. 341, 45 Pac. 683. Knowledge—even actual knowledge of the suit against him—was not the equivalent of legal notice and process, and did not make it compulsory upon him to appear in the action, or warrant the court in entering judgment against him for his failure so to do. In re Central Irr. Dist., 117 Cal. 382, 49 Pac. 354. Under these circumstances, it was not within the power of the court to impose terms upon him as a condition to granting him an absolute right. For the right was absolute, if the application for relief was timely presented. The motion was made within six months after the entry of judgment, and this is sufficient. People v. Temple, 103 Cal. 447, 37 Pac. 414; People v. Dodge, 104 Cal. 487, 38 Pac. 203; Young v. Fink, 119 Cal. 107, 50 Pac. 1060. The foregoing renders unnecessary any especial consideration of the second order, wherein the rule was made absolute upon appellant's refusal to comply with the terms. As it was error for the court to impose terms, the later order must fall with that determination.

Upon the appeal from the court's refusal to strike out its findings of fact and conclusions of law, it may be said that the issues of fact upon which findings are permitted or required are those specified in section 590 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Sections 632 and 633 of the same Code provide that upon the trial of a question of fact by the court, and in giving its decision, the facts found and the conclusions of law must be separately stated, and judgment upon the decision must be entered accordingly. Notwithstanding the somewhat hasty declaration to be found in the very early case of Semple v. Burkey, 2 Cal. 321, it is contemplated by our law that findings of fact shall be made only upon issues joined by the pleadings, under section 590 of the Code of Civil Procedure, where the decision of the court following the findings is a judgment. Findings of fact and conclusions of law, therefore, had no proper place in this proceeding. The orders appealed from are reversed.

APPEAL—REVIEW—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—RECORD—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—DELAY AFTER NOTICE.

Where there is nothing in the bill of exceptions or the record on an appeal from the judgment and an order denying a motion for a new trial, made on a statement of the case, to account for or excuse delay to move for the new trial within 10 days after service of the notice, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 659, unless further time is allowed, the statement will not be examined, and the judgment and order will be affirmed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county.

Action by C. C. Wheeler against Mary Ellen Karnes and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. P. Thompson and G. G. Goucher, for appellants. Horace Hawes and H. H. Welsh, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Action to recover judgment on a promissory note and for the foreclosure of a mortgage given to secure the same. Findings were filed, and judgment ordered for plaintiff. The judgment was entered November 19, 1896. Defendants made a motion for a new trial, which motion was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and order. There is no attack made by defendants upon the judgment, and no claim made that the judgment is not the legal conclusion from the facts found. It is sought to review an order denying a motion for nonsuit, certain findings as not being supported by the evidence, and certain alleged errors of law occurring at the trial, on appeal from the order denying a motion for a new trial. These alleged errors can only be reviewed upon a properly authenticated statement or bill of exceptions. The motion was made upon a statement of the case settled by the judge of the court below. We are met at the threshold with the objection that the statement cannot now be considered on this appeal, for the reason that it was not served upon plaintiff's counsel within the time prescribed by statute, and we think the objection will have to be sustained. The notice of intention to move for a new trial was served and filed November 28, 1896. The statute says (Code Civ. Proc. § 659): "If the motion is to be made upon a statement of the case, the moving party must, within ten days after service of the notice, or such further time as the court in which the action is pending or the judge thereof may allow, prepare a draft of the statement, and serve the same, or a copy thereof, upon the adverse party." The proposed statement was served January 6, 1897. It does not appear that the time for the service of the statement had been extended either by stipulation or order of the court, nor that any amendments were proposed by plaintiff to said proposed statement. On the 18th day of March, 1897, the statement was settled, the plaintiff objecting to the settlement of the same on the ground that it was not proposed or presented to plaintiff within the time allowed by law. The learned judge of the court below thought that he did not have the power or authority to sustain the objection, and settled the statement subject to the objection, so that this court might pass upon the validity of the objection. Plaintiff saved an exception to the action of the court in settling the statement, and it was accordingly settled subject to said exception. The same objection to the statement was made upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial, and the same ruling, and plaintiff excepted. In Higgins v. Mahoney, 50 Cal. 445, the bill of exceptions was presented after the time had expired, and respondent objected to its settlement on the ground that it was presented too late. The judge of the court below settled the bill, but incorporated the objection and exception in the statement. This court held that it had no power to consider the bill of exceptions, and in the opinion said: "The right of the appellant to present a bill of exceptions, after the entry of judgment, is limited in point of time to the period of 30 days. After the expiration of that period, unless further time had been in the meantime obtained, the right to present the bill of exceptions is taken away. If, therefore, the respondents, objecting to the settlement of the bill of exceptions, rely upon the lapse of the period limited by the statute, it becomes the duty of the appellant, in answer to the objection, to incorporate into the bill the matter, if any, going to excuse his apparent delay; otherwise, the exceptions, though settled, cannot be considered here." In this case, the objection being made, and there being nothing in the bill or record accounting for or excusing the delay, we must follow the rule laid down in Higgins v. Mahoney. The rule has been adopted and applied in the following cases: Wills v. Rhen Kong, 70 Cal. 548, 11 Pac. 780; Bunnell v. Stockton, 83 Cal. 319, 23 Pac. 301; Connor v. Road Co., 101 Cal. 429, 35 Pac. 990; Tregambo v. Mining Co., 57 Cal. 503; Henry v. Merguire, 106 Cal. 144, 39 Pac. 599. As we cannot examine the statement, it is presumed that the findings are supported by the evidence, and that the rulings on the trial were correct. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

MONTGOMERY et al. v. RAUER. (S. F. 1,197.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 24, 1899.)

TRUSTS—GUARDIAN AND WARD—RELEASE BY GUARDIAN—PLEADING.

1. Where one has received from a guardian money belonging to the ward, knowing whose money he was receiving, he cannot justify his retention of the money upon the ground that he has applied it to a personal debt due to him from the guardian.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 2219, which provides that any person who assumes a relation of personal confidence with another becomes a trustee for all persons over whose affairs, by that confidence, he has obtained control, one who receives money belonging to a ward from the guardian, with whom he stands in relation of personal confidence, is a trustee for the ward, and consequently cannot apply the trust money to a personal debt owing to him by the guardian.

3. In an action to recover money intrusted by plaintiff's guardian to defendant, the defendant denied that any money remained due to the ward, and, in support of it, relied upon a release executed by the guardian covering all claims against the defendant. Held, that the ward was entitled to prove that his interests had not been protected in the transaction, and that the release was a fraud upon his rights, notwithstanding the fact that no issue was made upon the validity of the release.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Queen Montgomery and others against J. J. Rauer. There was judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

G. H. Perry and Fisher Ames, for appellant. M. Rosenthal, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiffs, who are minors, sued defendant by an action in form for moneys had and received. Defendant answered, alleging that "the above-named minors have received all of the moneys deposited by their said guardian, Agnes S. Montgomery, with this defendant." He followed this averment by a denial that the sum of $4,000 demanded in the complaint, or any other sum of money, was due, owing, and unpaid from him to the plaintiffs. The action was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict against him in the sum of $1,500. From the judgment and from the order denying him a new trial he appeals.

The following are the salient facts: Mrs. Montgomery was a widow and the mother of the plaintiffs. Defendant, Rauer, possessed her confidence, and managed many of her business and legal affairs. She was guardian of the estates of her children. She put into Rauer's hands $2,000 of her own money, and $5,000 of the money of the children. Rauer received these funds with full knowledge of their origin, character, and ownership. He knew that the $5,000 were the trust funds of the minors, and so received same. Other moneys of Mrs. Montgomery passed into his hands. Over these there is a conflict in the evidence; over the others, none. Defendant contends that he paid back to Mrs. Montgomery more money than he received; also that, in adjusting the accounts and finding the balance, allowance of many sums which should have been credited him was improperly withheld, on the ground that they could not be charged against the minors' moneys. He insists that he was justified in offsetting against all the moneys which he had received from Mrs. Montgomery all the payments which he had made to her, and all items chargeable against her, and that he was not accountable to the minors for their separate funds as such. But Rauer received the children's moneys from their guardian, knowing its character. Knowing them to be trust funds, and having received them as such, he could not charge them with the individual debts of the guardian. Wallace v. Brown, 41 Ind. 436; Baughn v. Shackleford, 48 Miss. 255; Austin v. Wilson's Ex'rs, 21 Ind. 252. Yet this in many instances is precisely what he attempted to do. Moreover, there being evidence to establish the fact that a voluntary relation of personal confidence and trust existed between Mrs. Montgomery and Rauer, Rauer became a trustee for the minors, under section 2219 of the Civil Code, which declares that "every one who voluntarily assumes a relation of personal confidence with another is deemed a trustee within the meaning of this chapter, not only as to the person who reposes such confidence, but also as to all persons of whose affairs he thus acquired information which was given to such person in the like confidence, or over whose affairs by such confidence he obtained any control." Therefore, if Mrs. Montgomery personally became indebted to him, it was not permissible to charge such debts against the minors' funds. If he repaid the minors' money or any part of it to the guardian, he is of course not concerned with the future disposition which she might make of it, nor is he accountable therefor, but he cannot set off against these trust moneys Mrs. Montgomery's individual liability to himself. The court upon this matter correctly instructed the jury. But whether the amount due be estimated upon this basis, or whether it be computed by subtracting from all the moneys in Rauer's hands all payments made by him to Mrs. Montgomery, and all items chargeable against her individually, in either case the evidence supports the verdict.

But for a further defense appellant relies upon two written instruments signed by Mrs. Montgomery before the commencement of this action. One is in form a receipt for the repayment of the sum of $5,000, and is signed by Mrs. Montgomery as guardian of the minors. The other is a longer document, and recites that whereas, Mrs. Montgomery individually, and as guardian of her children, and J. J. Rauer, have settled all of their accounts, "upon which settlement it is mutually agreed and understood that the sum of one hundred dollars is at this present date due and owing from said J. J. Rauer to said Agnes S. Montgomery in her capacity as above stated": Therefore, in consideration of the receipt of the sum of $100, Agnes Montgomery releases and discharges Rauer from all claims, demands, and charges, from the beginning of the world until the present date. It is contended by appellant that this release is absolutely binding upon the parties, except it be avoided upon some ground of equitable cognizance; that this action is not an action to annul the instrument upon the ground of fraud or mistake; and that, therefore, the judgment is erroneous. But it is to be noted that the defense does not set up an accord and satisfaction, nor tender an issue upon the release in any way. It rests simply upon a denial that any sum is due from the defendants to the plaintiffs, coupled with an averment that all of the minors' moneys which had come into defendant's hands had been repaid by him. This is an action by the minors to recover their money. Mrs. Montgomery's individual demands against Rauer are in no wise involved. If Rauer relied upon the release as an estoppel, he should have pleaded it; but in such a case as this it is only when the settlement has been fair and free from fraud and mistake, and one by which the rights of the minors have been fully protected, that it can operate to bind them. Mrs. Montgomery admitted that she signed these documents, but contended, and supported her contention by evidence, that her signatures were procured through mistake, misrepresentation, and fraud. This was accompanied by evidence to the satisfaction of the jury that the settlement was not fair, because, as they found, there was $1,500 of the minors' money still in Rauer's possession. It was therefore permissible for the minors to go behind this settlement, and show the facts. So showing, they have their election to pursue either the guardian, his sureties, or the person with whom the settlement was made. This is their right, independent of any statute requiring a guardian to obtain the consent of the court to such a settlement. Hayes v. Insurance Co., 125 Ill. 626, 18 N. E. 322; Culp v. Lee, 109 N. C. 675, 14 S. E. 74; Hagy v. Avery, 69 Iowa, 434, 29 N. W. 409; Lundy v. Thomas, 26 Ga. 537. And it matters not whether the burden of proof to impeach the settlement is upon the ward, as seems to have been held in Torry v. Black, 58 N. Y. 185, or whether the duty of showing its fairness is upon the debtor, as laid down in Hagy v. Avery, 69 Iowa, 434, 29 N. W. 409; for in this case the wards took upon themselves that burden, and successfully carried it. Nor may the further objection of appellant be sustained that the plaintiffs, not having pleaded an avoidance of the release, should not have been permitted to prove it. They were not compelled to anticipate defenses. If the release and discharge had been set out in bar of the action, still, under our system of pleading, which permits no replication, the defense of fraud would have been open to the plaintiffs without special averment. Equally is it open to them to rebut the effect of the release by the same evidence when, though not pleaded by defendant, it is offered and admitted in evidence. The case was tried upon the principles announced, and we perceive no just ground for criticism of the court's instructions. The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

INSOLVENCY—AUTHORITY OF ASSIGNEE TO SUE—JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK—ORDER STRIKING OUT PLEADING—FRAUD.

1. Under Insolvent Act, § 22, making a certified copy of the assignment conclusive as to the assignee's authority to sue or defend, his authority cannot be impeached by proof that the signers of the insolvency petition were not actually creditors of the insolvent in the amount required by the statute.

2. Aside from the statute, the judgment of an insolvency court, regular on its face, cannot be thus collaterally attacked.

3. A motion to strike out parts of answer specifically quoted the parts of the pleading attacking the validity of insolvency proceedings sought to be struck out, and the order was that the motion "be, and the same is hereby, granted as to all those portions of the answer which attack the validity of the insolvency proceedings referred to therein." Held that, though it would have been better if the order had quoted in full the parts ordered stricken out, or referred to them by line and page, still it clearly indicated what was meant, and, in the absence of proof of prejudice, it would be presumed harmless.

4. A finding that transferees knew that a transfer was being made with intent to prefer creditors, and to prevent the property from coming to the assignee in insolvency, is not inconsistent with a finding that they were free from actual fraud, and believed their conduct lawful; actual fraud not being essential to avoid a transfer in violation of the insolvency act.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Raymond Riego, assignee of Briare & Kenny, against Samuel Foster and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Edwin L. Forster and A. J. Bruner, for appellants. Barrett & O'Gara, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The plaintiff, as assignee in involuntary insolvency of Briare & Kenny, insolvent debtors, brought this action to recover the value of certain property alleged to have been assigned by said insolvents to the defendants within one month prior to the filing of the petition in insolvency, and in violation of section 59 of the insolvent act of 1895. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment. The points made for reversal arise upon the pleadings and findings, and a short bill of exceptions showing a certain ruling of the court striking out part of the answer. No other ruling of the court not shown by the judgment roll is before us, nor is any evidence brought up.

The petition of creditors to have the persons named declared insolvent, the decree adjudging them insolvent, and all the proceedings in insolvency down to and including the assignment by the clerk to the respondent, were regular on their face. But the appellants, in their answer in this present case, set up as a defense, among other things, that the signers of the petition were not actually creditors of the insolvents in the amount required by the act, and that, therefore, the proceedings were void, and conferred no authority on respondent to maintain this action. On motion of respondent the court struck out that part of the answer, and the principal contention of appellants is that this ruling was erroneous. This contention, however, cannot be maintained. Section 22 of the insolvent act expressly provides that "in suits prosecuted or defended by the assignee a certified copy of the assignment made to him shall be conclusive evidence of his authority to sue or defend." See Fitzgerald v. Neustadt, 91 Cal. 603, 27 Pac. 936; Luhrs v. Kelly, 67 Cal. 289, 7 Pac. 696. Moreover, on principle, and under the general authorities, the judgment of an insolvent court, regular on its face, like other judgments, cannot be thus collaterally attacked. In Notes of Decisions (Bump, Bankr. [9th Ed.] p. 545) many authorities are cited to the principle there stated, as follows: "Neither the validity of the adjudication of bankruptcy, nor the existence, sufficiency, or validity of the debt of the petitioning creditor, can be collaterally drawn in question. In all suits brought by an assignee, the assignment is conclusive evidence of his right to sue." In Michaels v. Post, 21 Wall. 398, the United States supreme court states the principle (we quote from the syllabus) as follows: "If on a petition and other proceedings regular in form a decree in bankruptcy is made in such a case, and an assignee in bankruptcy is appointed in a way regular on its face, the decree of bankruptcy, though it be a decree pro confesso, cannot, in a suit by the assignee to recover from a preferred creditor the property transferred, be attacked on the ground that the party petitioning had released his debt, was no creditor, that his petition was accordingly fraudulent, and that the decree based on it was void."

We see nothing in the point that the order of the court below striking out part of the answer was too indefinite. The motion to strike out specifically mentioned and quoted all the parts of the answer which respondent sought to have stricken out, and the order of the court was that the motion "be, and the same is hereby, granted as to all those portions of the answer which attack the validity of the insolvency proceedings referred to therein; otherwise, the motion is denied." It would have been better, perhaps, if the court had, in its order, quoted in full the parts intended to be stricken out, or had referred to them by line and page; but it clearly indicated what was meant, and we do not see how appellants could have been deceived or prejudiced by the form of the order, and, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, we will presume, in favor of the judgment, that appellants were not so deceived or prejudiced.

The contention of appellants that the judgment ought to be reversed because the seventh and the eighth findings are contradictory cannot be maintained. By the eighth finding the court found that the assignment and transfer were not made in the usual and ordinary course of business, and that at the time of the assignment defendants knew and believed, and had reasonable cause to know and believe, that the firm was insolvent, and that the transfer was being made with intent to prefer certain creditors represented by appellants, and with a view to prevent the property from coming to the assignee in insolvency, and to delay the operations and evade the provisions of the insolvent act, etc.; and appellants contend that this finding is inconsistent with the latter part of finding 7, that "defendants were free from actual fraud, and believed their conduct to be lawful." "Actual fraud" was not an element in the case, and "if the provisions of the insolvent act are violated, the transfer is void, and this is true regardless of any question of honesty and fairness, good faith, or actual fraud." Matthews v. Chaboya, 111 Cal. 440, 44 Pac. 169. The finding of specific facts in finding No. 8 is not weakened by the finding in No. 7 touching the appellants' notion or belief as to the law. Moreover, the averments in the complaint of the facts found in finding No. 8 are not denied by the answer. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

LILIENTHAL et al. v. BALLOU et al. (L. A. 413.)

PLEDGES—POSSESSION—VALIDITY.

A transfer of personal property to trustees, as security for a debt, under an agreement that said trustees are to conduct the business of the grantors, through one of the latter as their agent, for six months, when, if found unprofitable, they are to sell the goods, and providing that, when certain creditors shall have received 50 per cent. of their claims, and all costs and expenses, then the trust shall be terminated, and the assets remaining shall be transferred to the said grantors, is a pledge; and, if actual possession is not taken by the trustees, as required by Civ. Code, §§ 2986, 2988, it is invalid, as against a subsequent attachment of the property by a creditor of the pledgor.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In bank. Reversed.

For opinion in department, see 55 Pac. 251.

TEMPLE, J. This is an action for the recovery of personal property, brought against the sheriff, Ballou, and Orman, an attaching creditor. Defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order refusing a new trial. The property was levied upon under a writ of attachment against Phillips Bros. & Co. On and prior to September 8, 1896, Phillips Bros. & Co. were engaged in merchandising at Arroyo Grande, in San Luis Obispo county. At that time their property was attached by various creditors, and remained under attachment until October 23, 1896, when it was released, in pursuance of an agreement made with all the creditors of the firm except Orman, and transferred to plaintiffs in trust for such creditors. The terms are expressed in the agreement. On the 1st day of December, 1896, Orman commenced suit to recover a debt due him from the firm, and the goods were levied upon, and the defense in this case consists of a justification under that writ. The question is whether plaintiffs, under their transfer, can hold against Orman, who was a creditor of the firm before the goods were transferred, and also prior to the attachments of the creditors for whom plaintiffs held as trustees.

Phillips Bros. & Co. is a partnership, composed of Adolph Phillips and L. A. Phillips. Adolph Phillips had always been the managing partner, L. A. Phillips residing in San Francisco. The agreement was signed by Phillips Bros. & Co., and by 61 of their creditors, and, among other things, provided, in effect: (1) That the parties appoint plaintiffs trustees, "to receive, manage, operate, use, and dispose of all the aforesaid property of the aforesaid parties of the first part, upon the terms and conditions hereinafter mentioned. (2) Parties of the first part will, within 30 days, convey to trustees all of their property, except that which is exempt. (3) The trustees shall receive, manage, operate, use, and conduct the merchandise business of said parties of the first part at Arroyo Grande, Cal., and all assets of property connected therewith, as to them (the said trustees) shall seem meet and proper," with requisite authority, including power to replenish stock for cash from the receipts from the said business. (4) To collect debts due the firm and compromise claims. (5) To conduct the business for 6 months, and, if then found unprofitable, may terminate the trust, and sell the goods at public or private sale. (6) All "recoveries" to be distributed through the board of trade to the undersigned creditors. (7) During all the time they conduct the business, Adolph Phillips, one of the partners, "shall be employed by said trustees, and shall give his exclusive time and services to said business, under the supervision of said trustees, and shall receive as remuneration and compensation for his services the sum of $125 per month." (8) Whenever the creditors receive 50 per cent. of their claims, and all costs, expenses, etc., "then this trust shall be terminated, and all the aforesaid assets, property, and effects, or the replenishments, remaining in the hands of the said parties of the second part, shall be transferred and surrendered unto the said parties of the first part or their nominees." There were further enumerated conditions, which I do not deem important here. Transfers were made in pursuance of the agreement, and the goods were at once released from attachment, and the store was opened by Adolph Phillips, with the same employes which he had previously had, except the bookkeeper. The store buildings were marked very conspicuously with the signs of Phillips Bros. & Co., which were permitted to remain, but a new sign, much less conspicuous than the others, was put up containing the names of the trustees, and, under the names, the words, "Trustees, Successors to Phillips Bros. & Company." The firm advertised quite extensively. After the transfer, as before, the business was advertised as that of Phillips Bros. & Co., without mention of any change. Money received was deposited in the county bank in the name of the trustees, and the old billheads and receipts were used; the names of the trustees being added by the use of a rubber stamp.

It is evident, from the language of the agreement, that the transfer to the trustees, who were simply the agents of the first attaching creditors, was for security only. It was not a sale, or an absolute transfer of title, even if its validity be conceded. In no event was the property to become the property of the trustees, and they were never to have any rights with reference to it, except to have it sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of their debts, which still were to continue to exist as debts until they were paid, or all the property had been sold, and the proceeds applied in payment of the debts and costs. Phillips Bros. & Co. still remained the owners of the property, subject to the rights of the trustees to hold it as security, and still had a leviable interest in it, and the only question was how the levy should be made. It was not a chattel mortgage under the statute, and, therefore, the statutory provisions in regard to levies upon personal property mortgaged do not apply. If it was a valid pledge, or chattel mortgage dependent on possession, the goods could not be seized, but garnishment was the proper mode. If it was not a valid pledge, it was properly attached, and the justification was fully made out. A pledge is a deposit of personal property as security (section 2986, Civ. Code), and is dependent on possession, and is not valid until the property is delivered to the pledgee (section 2988, Id.). The delivery must be as complete as is required in case of sales of personal property by section 3440 of the Civil Code, and change of possession must be continuous and open. George v. Pierce (Cal.) 55 Pac. 775. In the agreement it was stipulated that the business should be managed by Adolph Phillips under the supervision of the trustees, but the trustees not only did not take personal possession, but they could not take such possession until after the expiration of six months; for they were bound to carry on business for that length of time, and also bound to employ Phillips as manager, and, in fact, the business did go on, as though nothing had happened, under the management of Adolph Phillips, who had always been sole manager for the firm. That this is not a sufficient change of possession is evident. No other authority is required, except the case of George v. Pierce, above cited. If, in case of a sale, there need not be an immediate delivery, when the property is not in the possession of the vendor, that will not help plaintiffs here, for this was not a sale. If the debtors were not then in control of the property, they were in no condition to make a pledge, and, in any event, it would have no validity until possession was given, and that possession must not be constructive. A change of possession is not effected merely by having the former owner manage the property as the servant, agent, or clerk of the pledgee; and this is especially so where there is so little outward sign of a change of ownership. Public policy requires a real and substantial compliance with the statute, and a failure should not be condoned for the hardships of a particular case. The judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent, and adhere to the views expressed when the case was decided in department, which need not be here restated. 55 Pac. 251. The point upon which the majority decision seems to rest—that the transfer from Phillips Bros. & Co. to the plaintiffs was not an absolute sale, but was in the nature of a pledge—was not raised at the trial, and has no place in the transcript. The appellants defended under section 3440 of the Civil Code, upon the theory that Phillips Bros. & Co. were in possession at the time of the transfer to the respondents, and that, therefore, if there was not an immediate delivery, followed by an actual and continued change of possession, the attempted transfer was void, and the court so instructed the jury; but there was no question raised, so far as I can discover, about the character of the transfer touching the nature of the title or right which passed by it. It appeared that Phillips Bros. & Co. made an absolute deed of the real estate to the respondents, and gave an absolute bill of sale of the personal property, and there was no question as to the transfer being a mere pledge. Moreover, section 3440 refers to "every transfer," without reference to the kind of title or right which passes by the transfer, and declares it void for want of change of possession only where the party making the transfer is in possession. In the case at bar the jury must have found, under the instructions of the court, that Phillips Bros. & Co. were not in possession at the time of the transfer; and therefore section 3440 does not apply. George v. Pierce (Cal.) 55 Pac. 775, in my opinion, has no applicability to the case at bar. It was merely held in that case that there could not be a valid pledge of property without surrendering possession.

PORTER v. ELIZALDE. (S. F. 894.)

ATTORNEY'S AUTHORITY TO EMPLOY COUNSEL—EVIDENCE—RATIFICATION.

1. An attorney at law has no general authority, by virtue of his retainer, to employ counsel or assistants, at the expense of his client, without previous authority, or assent on the part of the client.

2. The authority of an attorney to employ counsel cannot be established by his own declarations, in the face of evidence that he had no authority.

3. Where an attorney has agreed with his client to pay all the expenses of the litigation, and the client gives him no authority to employ other counsel, the knowledge of the client that he has engaged another attorney to assist him, consulting with such attorney and accepting the benefit of his services, without objection, will not render the client liable for his fees.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by one Elizalde against one Porter. From an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appealed. Reversed.

E. P. Cole and Graves & Graves, for appellant. S. M. Van Wyck, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant upon an action assigned to him by Mr. James L. Crittenden, for services rendered as counsel upon the trial of a contest of the will of her husband. A motion for a new trial was made upon the ground that the finding by the court of an employment by her of Mr. Crittenden was not sustained by the evidence. The motion was denied, and the defendant has appealed.

The defendant had filed a contest against the probate of her husband's will in the county of Santa Barbara, and for that purpose had employed as her attorneys Messrs. Graves & Graves and Mr. John J. Boyce, upon an agreement with them that they would advance and pay all the costs and expenses to be incurred in the contest, and that, if successful, she would transfer and convey to them one-half of the property she might recover thereby. Some months after this contest had been filed, Mr. Ernest Graves employed Mr. Crittenden to assist him at the trial of the contest; and, in pursuance of the employment, Mr. Crittenden attended at the trial, and acted as leading counsel therein. The trial lasted about two weeks, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the contestant. Mr. Crittenden had no interview with the defendant until he went to Santa Barbara, a day or two before the trial began, nor did the defendant know until that time that he was to have anything to do with the case. He was then introduced to her by Mr. Graves as the gentleman who was coming there to assist in the trial. After his arrival at Santa Barbara, he discussed the case with her, the evidence that could be given, and who were her witnesses, and from that time on through the trial had frequent interviews with her concerning the testimony and witnesses, and also with the witnesses in the case,—usually in company with Mr. Graves or Mr. Boyce, or both. Mr. Crittenden never had any conversation with her about the terms of his employment, except that he told her at the time of his introduction to her that he was employed to try the case. Nor did he at any time say anything to her, or she to him, on the subject of his compensation, or by whom he was to be paid. Neither did he at any time say anything to her about paying him for his services, until the day the present action was commenced,—about two years after the trial of the contest,—when he sent her a telegram requesting payment, to which she replied by directing him to see Mr. Graves about it. When Mr. Crittenden was employed, he was informed by Mr. Graves that his fee in the matter was contingent upon success; and, although no definite amount was agreed on as his compensation, a sum was named which was satisfactory to both. He was also informed that Mr. Graves was to pay all the expenses of the litigation, and Mr. Graves did in fact pay Mr. Crittenden's expenses at Santa Barbara during the trial of the contest. Nothing was said by Mr. Graves as to who was to pay Mr. Crittenden, but on one occasion, after the trial, he requested payment from Mr. Graves. It is not claimed that there was any direct employment of Mr. Crittenden by the defendant, and he testified that it was his understanding that his employment was by Mr. Graves, as her agent. There was no evidence that Mr. Graves was ever authorized by her to employ him, and the defendant testified that she never employed him as her attorney, or authorized any one to employ him on her behalf, and Mr. Graves testified that he had no authority from the defendant to employ Mr. Crittenden, but that he employed him upon his own account, and that the understanding between them was that he would pay him when the estate was distributed and he received his contingent fee. Upon this evidence the court was not justified in finding that the services of Mr. Crittenden were rendered to the defendant at her special instance and request, or that he was employed by her as counsel upon the trial of the contest. An attorney at law has no general authority, by virtue of his retainer, to employ counsel or assistants at the expense of his client, without previous authority or assent on the part of the client. Paddock v. Colby, 18 Vt. 485; Young v. Crawford, 23 Mo. App. 432; Voorhies v. Harrison, 22 La. Ann. 85; Mechem, Ag. § 813; Weeks, Attys. at Law, § 246. The statement of Mr. Crittenden that it was his understanding that Graves represented the defendant is insufficient to render the defendant liable. The authority of an agent cannot be established by his own declarations, in the face of evidence that he had no authority.

The respondent contends, however, that the appellant is liable for the value of the services rendered by reason of having accepted them without objection; that as she was present at the trial, and made no objection to having Mr. Crittenden act in her behalf therein, she is under an implied obligation to pay their value. It is undoubtedly, in general, the rule that when one knows that another is rendering him services, and tacitly assents thereto, if nothing more appears the law will imply a provision on his part to pay for such services. The rule is not uniform or absolute, however, but will be recognized or refused according to the circumstances of the particular case in which it is invoked. See Moulin v. Columbet, 22 Cal. 508. And when it appears that the services were rendered under an express employment by an agent, or by a third person who assumed to act in the interest of the one in whose behalf they were rendered, the authority of that person, and the terms of the employment, become important factors in determining the liability or the right of recovery. The mere silence of the party will not be held to constitute such assent or acquiescence in the acts of the agent as to amount to a ratification or adoption of these acts, without also considering the circumstances under which the silence existed. Especially in a case like the present, where there was no authority in the defendant's attorney to engage counsel at her expense, and where he had agreed with her to pay all the expenses of the litigation, will the law refuse to imply from her mere silence a promise to pay for the services rendered under such employment. In Price v. Hay, 132 Ill. 543, 24 N. E. 620, it was held that the acquiescence of a client in the appearance of an attorney and performance of services by him in the case is not legitimate evidence from which a jury may infer an implied contract between them to pay for such services, where the client has previously employed other counsel therefor at a fixed fee. Similar rulings have been made in Holmes v. Board, 81 Mo. 137; Young v. Crawford, 23 Mo. App. 432; Bank v. Benton, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 240; Evans v. Mohr, 153 Ill. 561, 39 N. E. 1083; Ennis v. Hultz, 46 Iowa, 76.

The respondent has cited certain cases in support of his contention, but in each of the cases where this question was presented for decision there was some controlling circumstance upon which the court relied to determine the liability of the client. In Briggs v. Town of Georgia, 10 Vt. 68, the attorney who had the management of the suit was the agent of the town, as well as its attorney at law; and in Paddock v. Colby, supra, this fact was alluded to by the court as distinguishing the case from the general rule that an attorney cannot employ counsel at the expense of his client, without his consent. In King v. Pope, 28 Ala. 602, the attorney had informed the client of the employment of counsel, and he not only expressed no dissent, but afterwards conferred with him about the case at the trial. In Jackson v. Clopton, 66 Ala. 29, the liability of the client was placed upon his "recognition of the relationship during the progress of the trial." In Hogate v. Edwards, 65 Ind. 373, the liability of the client was maintained upon the ground that his conduct at the trial amounted to a ratification of the employment by his attorney. In none of these cases had the attorney made an agreement with the client to pay all the expenses of the litigation. In Ennis v. Hultz, 46 Iowa, 76, where there was an agreement between the client and his attorney for a contingent fee, the court said, "The plaintiff in the case at bar cannot be allowed to say that the defendants looked on and saw him do work for them, and therefore impliedly agreed to pay him, because the plaintiff had an express contract with Dixon," and distinguishes the case from McCrary v. Rud-dick, 33 Iowa, 521, cited by the respondent herein, in that in the earlier case McCrary was employed by one of the co-defendants in the action, and the facts were such that he had the right to assume that he was employed by all of the defendants.

It was testified herein that, in his argument to the jury, Mr. Crittenden stated that the contestant, the defendant herein, would pay all the attorney's fees in the case; that she was present at the time, and neither then nor at any subsequent time repudiated or disputed this statement; and this fact is relied upon by the respondent as a reason for holding her liable herein. It is only upon the ground of an estoppel that she can be held liable by reason of not having disputed this statement, and it is manifest that there are here no elements of an estoppel. It was not a case where she was under any obligation to deny the statement, nor was the statement made with any view to obtain an assent or dissent from her, upon which Mr. Crittenden was to determine his course of action. Moreover, the place and conditions under which the statement was made were not such as to permit her to express any dissent. See Wilkins v. Stidger, 22 Cal. 231. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

DAVIS v. POST, Auditor. (Sac. 516.)

COUNTIES—SUPERVISORS—ROAD COMMISSIONERS—COMPENSATION—VALIDITY OF STATUTE.

1. Pol. Code, § 2641, as amended in 1893, provides for the payment of all road commissioners at 20 cents a mile. Act 1893 fixes the salaries of supervisors, and allows them an additional amount as ex officio commissioners in some counties, but is silent as to other counties, and provides that the salaries provided for in the act are in full for all services as officers or ex officio officers. Held, that under the act of 1893 the intention was not to pay extra salaries as road commissioners to the supervisors in those counties in which they were not provided for, and, the act being subsequent in point of time to section 2641, prevailed over it.

2. County Government Act 1893, § 195, is not unconstitutional.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county.

Action by Alfred Davis against C. A. Post, auditor, etc. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

P. J. Hazen, for appellant. L. W. Fulkerth, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The opinion of the trial court in this case is clear, concise, and conclusive upon all the questions involved in this appeal, save a single one, and that question is now raised for the first time. That opinion is as follows: "This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the defendant, the county auditor, to draw his warrant in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of thirty-four dollars and twenty cents, claimed by plaintiff to be due him for mileage as road commissioner for the month of April, 1897. On the argument the contention of the plaintiff was that he was entitled to receive for his services as road commissioner twenty cents a mile, not exceeding in any year three hundred dollars, as provided by section 2641 of the Political Code, as amended in 1893; while defendant claimed that plaintiff is entitled to receive only his actual expenses while supervising the roads of his district, not exceeding ten dollars in any one month, as provided by subdivision 15 of section 191 of the county government law of 1897. The county government law of 1897, being the latest enactment on the subject, must control, if it be a valid law. But plaintiff contends that section 191 was never passed by the two houses of the legislature; that the court can examine the journals of the houses to see if the section was duly passed; and further, that, if duly passed, the law of 1897 is in contravention of the constitution. On none of these propositions do I express an opinion, because it may be conceded that no law was passed on the subject in 1897; and still I do not think plaintiff is entitled to the writ. Section 2641 of the Political Code was amended March 9, 1893, and the amendment took effect immediately. The county government law of 1893 was passed March 24, 1893, and took effect in January, 1895. That portion of the act of 1893 relating to this county declares that supervisors shall receive a salary of six hundred dollars a year and mileage in going to the place of meeting of the board, and makes no provision for any compensation for their services as ex officio road commissioners. By the act of 1893 the salary of supervisors, as such, is fixed at a certain sum and an additional amount allowed them as road commissioner in a number of counties, and these additional amounts are different from the compensation fixed in the section of the Political Code, and the reasonable construction of the act is that, where the intention was to pay them anything for their services as ex officio road commissioners such intention found expression in the act itself. Indeed, section 216 provides that 'the salaries and fees provided for in this act shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers therein named, either as officers or ex officio officers, their deputies and assistants, unless in this act otherwise provided.' And section 236 declares that 'all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.' The supervisors are ex officio road commissioners. This act of 1893 provides for the payment of the road commissioners in some counties of a per diem, in others of mileage, and in others, of which this county is one, simply for the salary of the supervisor with the general provision that the salary provided for is to be in full for all services rendered by the officers named in the act, either as officers or ex officio officers. The section of the Political Code provides for the payment of all road commissioners at the rate of 20 cents a mile. The laws are clearly inconsistent in this matter, and the act of 1893, being the latest, will prevail. I do not say that the county government law of 1893 is now the law, but only that, if the law of 1897 was not really passed by the legislature, then the law of 1893 will prevail over the section of the Political Code, because the latest expression of the legislative will."

It is now insisted that the county government act of 1893 is unconstitutional, and therefore the aforesaid section of the Political Code was not repealed by that act. We find no constitutional objection to section 195 of the county government act of 1893. The objections made by appellant to subdivision 15 of section 191 of the act of 1897, even conceding them to be sound in law, cannot be taken to the act of 1893, as there are no such provisions in that act. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

a sum of money due from a sale of raisins by defendants for plaintiff, alleges in the first count

a delivery to defendants as commission agents under an agreement to make returns of proceeds at a given price, and the second count is laid on quantum meruit, and the third count alleges an agreement to sell and deliver for a given price, plaintiff is not obliged to elect upon which count he would go to trial.

2. Where a complaint contains an allegation that defendants agreed that plaintiff would receive from defendants three cents a pound for each pound of raisins delivered, testimony of plaintiff's agent that defendants agreed to take the crop, and give three cents, or see that plaintiff got three cents, a pound, or probably better, tends to sustain the allegation, though one of the defendants testifies that no such agreement was made, so that a finding for plaintiff on the issue will not be disturbed.

3. Where a contract does not show on its face that the person named was acting as agent of anybody, and no reference is made to the alleged principal, and on trial no offer is made to prove that the person named in the instrument was acting for the alleged principal, and with his authority, in executing the contract, and the person named in the contract testifies that he had no authority to sign it for the alleged principal, such contract is inadmissible in evidence against the alleged principal.

4. In an action to recover a sum of money due from a sale of raisins by defendants for plaintiff, where there is evidence that the agreement between plaintiff and defendant called for raisins of a good quality, and there is evidence tending to show that the raisins were sold in the F. market, and were to be delivered at F., evidence of the quality of the raisins and of the market value at F. is admissible.

5. Instructions upon questions of fact are properly refused, as invading the prerogative of the jury.

6. A refusal to give an instruction covering a certain point is not error, where such point is fully covered by other instructions.

7. An instruction referring to a contract, it being impossible to say whether the contract referred to is the contract alleged by plaintiff or defendant, is properly overruled, as being misleading, and of no aid to the jury.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county.

Action by the Estrella Vineyard Company against A. B. Butler and William Forsyth, partners under the style of the Raisin-Growers' Packing Association. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

L. L. Cory, for appellants. H. H. Welsh and Geo. E. Church, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to recover the value of 255,000 pounds of raisins, alleged to be worth $7,650, on account of which plaintiff had received only $4,090.82, leaving due the sum of $3,559.18. The cause was tried by the court with a jury, and plaintiff had a verdict for $2,840, upon which judgment was entered. The appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying motion for a new trial, and comes here on a statement of the case. The complaint sets forth three separate causes of action: (1) That between September 1, 1894, and January 1, 1895, at Fresno, Cal., plaintiff delivered to defendants the raisins in question, to be sold by defendants as commission agents of plaintiff; and that defendants agreed, in consideration of said delivery, and prior thereto, that plaintiff would receive from defendants for the sale of said raisins a price not less than three cents per pound, and that defendants would account to plaintiff, and pay plaintiff as the proceeds of said raisins a price not less than three cents per pound. (2) Alleges the delivery of the raisins at the request of defendants, that they afterwards sold the same, and that the reasonable value thereof was $7,650, no part of which has been paid, except $4,090.82. (3) Alleges the delivery of the raisins to defendant upon an agreement that they would pay plaintiff three cents per pound therefor. Defendants answered, specifically denying most of the material allegations of the complaint, but admitted the delivery of the raisins, and alleged that they were so delivered "to be handled, marketed, and sold by said defendants upon commission, and as the agents and representatives of plaintiff, upon commission." In an amended answer defendants set up a contract in writing, dated May 11, 1894, between one G. W. Taft and defendants, under which it is alleged that the raisins were delivered to defendants, and not otherwise. This contract provided, in brief, that defendants were to receive the raisins in the sweat box, and pack and otherwise prepare them for market, and sell them upon a commission of 5 per cent. of the proceeds of this sale.

1. Defendants allege error in refusing their motion to compel plaintiff to elect. In the first count or cause of action plaintiff alleges delivery to defendants as commission agents, under a specific agreement by defendants to make returns of proceeds at a given price. The second count is laid on quantum meruit. The third count alleges an agreement to sell and deliver for a given price. Plaintiff, upon such complaint, was not obliged to elect. Code Civ. Proc. § 427; Cowan v. Abbott, 92 Cal. 100, 28 Pac. 213.

2. It is claimed that "the evidence is insufficient to sustain the allegation that defendants agreed that plaintiff would receive from defendants three cents a pound for each pound of raisins delivered." It appears from the testimony of Taft that he was the agent of plaintiff, and disposed of the raisins for plaintiff. He testified that he spoke to William Forsyth, one of defendants, in May, 1894, about raising some money on plaintiff's crop, and was told that defendants would supply what money they wanted if defendants were allowed to handle the crop. Witness replied: "I will give you a show at it, if you will do as well by me as anybody. He says: 'All right; we will give you the $2,000, and take a crop mortgage on the crop.'" The crop mortgage was drawn, and is dated May 14th, and witness sent it to plaintiff company for execution, and it was executed and delivered, and was recorded May 24th. He testified: "He [Forsyth] handed me some contracts for me to send to the company, to be signed by the president and secretary. I sent them down to be signed, and they were signed and sent back to me. It was probably a week before they came back to me. After they came back from Bakersfield I kept them." This is a contract similar in form to that under which defendants claim they received and handled the raisins. It was executed by plaintiffs, but the evidence is that it was never delivered to defendants. This phase of the case will be noticed later on. Taft testified that, after getting the money on the crop mortgage, he did not see Mr. Forsyth until August. As to what then took place he testified: "I saw Mr. Forsyth, and we got to talking about the crop. He wanted to know how much there was going to be,—wanted to know if he was going to handle it. I told him that he would handle it if he would get me just as much as I could get anywhere else, or a little better, and he promised me that he would do as well by me as anybody else, and a little better. * * * He said he wanted the crop, knew it would be good, knew I understood curing, that it is a good large crop, and that he wanted it, and would give me three cents, or see that I got three cents a pound, and probably better. He said he had got to have the crop,—had sold 500 cars, and was depending on these large crops. I says: 'All right, Colonel; three cents is what I want, and that is what I am figuring on.' * * * He says: 'All right, Taft; you go ahead.' I informed the company of the matter by letter. I subsequently saw the secretary of the company, probably a week or ten days after, and before the raisins were delivered." The deliveries began September 22d, and continued to October 1st, amounting to 255,000 pounds. The testimony of this witness was that the agreement was to take all the crop of good raisins, and that all that were delivered were of No. 1 quality. There was other evidence that the market price for similar raisins at Fresno ranged from 2½ to 3 cents per pound. It was admitted that defendants had disposed of all the raisins, and the undenied allegation of the verified complaint is that they had made returns of only $4,090.92. Defendant Forsyth testified that he made no such agreement as was testified to by the witness Taft. It is not within the province of the court to say which one of these witnesses the jury should have believed. The evidence of plaintiff tends to sustain the allegations complained of.

3. Defendants offered in evidence the contract set forth in the answer, but the court excluded it, and defendants excepted, and claim that the ruling was error. As this evidence tended to show an entirely different agreement from any claimed to have been made by plaintiff, it becomes important to determine whether the court erred in refusing the evidence. Defendant Forsyth testified as to the advance of $2,000 secured by mortgage, and, continuing, said: "At that time and place certainly there was something said about the execution of some papers by myself and Mr. Taft. He was to indorse the Estrella Vineyard Company's note for $2,000 after he had signed the contract. He went with me to the office of Butler & Forsyth, and signed the contract that day. (Paper handed witness.) That is the contract Mr. Taft signed on the 11th day of May. That is George W. Taft's signature. I saw him sign it." Plaintiff objected to the admission of the contract as irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, and on the further ground "that it purports to be an indenture of mutual covenants, that it was not executed by the party defendant, and that it has never been delivered." The witness continued: "There must have been two papers signed at that time. There is generally the duplicate and this one. My signature, I presume, was on the other one,—the signature of Butler & Forsyth. There were two papers. I handed one to Mr. Taft and kept the other. They were identical. It was an oversight I didn't sign this paper before yesterday. I didn't think it was necessary. I had Mr. Taft's signature on that document, and it was all I supposed was necessary." The objection was then sustained, and defendants excepted. This agreement is dated May 11, 1894, and purports to be between George W. Taft, of the county of Fresno, and defendants. Throughout the contract the party of the first part is Taft, and the conditions in terms are to be performed by him on the part of first party, and the agreement is signed, "G. W. Taft." Forsyth further testified, without objection: "The contract under which I received those raisins is the paper marked 'Defendant's Proposed Exhibit No. 1' (the contract last referred to). After the execution of that contract I never entered into, or attempted to enter into, any other contract with Mr. Taft in relation to the delivery of these raisins." Upon cross-examination of Forsyth, plaintiff handed him a contract, dated May 16, 1894, in all particulars identical with that testified to by Forsyth, except that the party of the first part is plaintiff, instead of Taft. Forsyth recognized his signature to the contract of May 16th, but was unable to remember anything about its execution. He testified that he had "forgotten all about it." As to the contract of May 16th, when asked where it had been since its execution, Taft testified: "Part of the time at my office, and part of the time at Mr. Welsh's. It was never delivered to Butler & Forsyth, because I had instructions from the company, at the time they sent it to me, not to deliver it unless it was for the best possible means that I could do in the way of disposing of the raisins." He had already testified to the subsequent parol agreement of August. Taft further testified: "If at any time during the month of May, June, or July, and before August 15th, I signed a raisin contract to the Raisin-Growers' Packing Association, I had no authority to sign it from the company,"—and in that connection said: "I spoke this morning of some papers having been drawn and sent down for execution to Bakersfield. They were contracts between Butler & Forsyth and the plaintiff corporation. That was a little after this chattel mortgage was sent down. I think, probably, within a week." The mortgage was dated May 14th.

Defendants' counsel claim that the contract was admissible because (1) it appeared by its terms to be in duplicate; (2) Taft did not deny that he executed it; (3) Forsyth testified that he saw Taft sign it; (4) that Forsyth said he presumed that the signature of Butler & Forsyth was on the other copy; (5) Forsyth testified that defendants received the raisins under this contract. The general rule, subject to some exceptions, is that, in order to bind the principal, and to make it his contract, the instrument must purport on its face to be the contract of the principal, and his name must be inserted in it and signed to it, and not merely the name of the agent, even though the latter be described as agent in the instrument, or, at least, the terms of the instrument should clearly show that the principal is intended to be positively bound thereby, and that the agent acts plainly as his agent in executing it. Story, Ag. § 147. It is not necessary to point out the distinction made between instruments under seal and not under seal, nor to show what classes of instruments fall under the exceptions to the rule. There was nothing on the face of the instrument to show that Taft was acting as agent of any person. No reference whatever is made to plaintiff as principal or otherwise, and no offer was made to prove that Taft was acting for plaintiff, and with its authority, in executing the contract. It was not enough to show that defendants received the raisins under this contract. It was necessary also to show, or offer to show, before it was admissible to bind plaintiff, that the latter authorized Taft to make the contract, or the plaintiff delivered the raisins to defendants with knowledge, actual or implied, that the contract was so entered into on its behalf. As an exception to the general rule as above stated, evidence is admitted, not to contradict the written instrument, or deny that it binds the person whom on its face it purports to bind, but to show that it also binds another, because the act of the agent in signing the agreement, in pursuance of his authority, is in law the act of the principal. Story, Ag. § 160a and notes; Id. § 270 and notes. The only written contract of which there is any evidence that plaintiff had knowledge, or signed, or authorized to be signed, was the contract of May 16th; and as to this contract the undisputed evidence is that it was never delivered by plaintiff, and defendants make no claim under it, and Taft testified that he had no authority to sign the contract of May 11th. We cannot say that the court erred in excluding the latter contract.

4. The trial court admitted evidence of the quality of the raisins under the first cause of action, and, generally, of their market value at Fresno; and these rulings are assigned as error. Taft testified that the agreement called for raisins of good quality, and we think it was competent to show that they were such. As to the evidence of market value at Fresno, we think it was admissible. The evidence tended to show that the raisins were sold in that market, to be delivered at Fresno. Taft testified: "I did not know what he was going to do with them [the raisins]. I did not know that they were to be shipped on consignment. Couldn't tell whether to ship east, or where. * * * I did not care what they done with them." There was evidence tending to show that there was a market value for raisins at Fresno, and several witnesses testified what that market value was. The evidence presents a different case from that of Pugh v. Porter Co., 118 Cal. 628, 30 Pac. 770, relied upon by defendants, in which the raisins were sold to be marketed at Chicago.

5. The court instructed the jury on its own motion. Thereupon defendants submitted 10 additional instructions, all of which the court refused to give; and this is assigned as error. Our attention is invited to the sixth, seventh, tenth, eleventh, fourteenth, and sixteenth. The instructions marked 7, 10, and 14 are clearly an invasion of the prerogative of the jury, being instructions upon questions of fact. The sixth gives the rule as to burden of proof, upon which the court fully instructed the jury. The eleventh instruction refers to a contract under which the raisins are assumed to have been delivered, but it is impossible to say whether the contract referred to was the contract alleged by plaintiff or by defendant. As offered, the jury could not have been aided by the instruction, and might have been misled. There is no point in the sixteenth instruction not covered by the instructions given quite as favorably as defendants could fairly ask. Indeed, we think the court erred, if at all, in giving instructions under which the jury could render a verdict (as it evidently did) for less than the contract testified to by Taft would have warranted. It is advised that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

DARROUGH v. HERBERT KRAFT COMPANY BANK et al. (Sac. 581).¹

SUBROGATION.

Where the owner of premises pays off a senior lien, without actual knowledge of the existence of a junior lien, it will be presumed that he made the payment for his own benefit; and for the protection of his interests, and equity will treat such owner as the assignee of the original senior lienholder, and will revive and enforce it for his benefit.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county.

Action by C. H. Darrough against the Herbert Kraft Company Bank, the Bank of Tehama County, and others. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and from the judgment plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Johnson & Chase, for appellant. Coffman & Coffman, for respondents.

GRAY, C. A demurrer to the complaint as amended was sustained. Plaintiff refused to further amend his complaint, and the judgment was entered against him, from which he appeals.

From the complaint and amendments thereto it appears that on May 13, 1893, the defendant Halley executed a note for $1,050 to the defendant Bank of Tehama County, and on the same date, to secure the payment of said note, said Halley executed a trust deed of certain real estate to the defendants Brown and Cahoon, as trustees. Thereafter, and on the 26th of April, 1895, Herbert Kraft recovered and docketed a judgment against said Halley for $611.71. On April 29, 1895, this judgment was assigned to defendant the Kraft Company Bank. On the 13th of May, 1895, appellant purchased from Halley his equitable interest in said real estate for $112, receiving a grant deed therefor, under which he has been in possession of said premises ever since. On May 15, 1895, appellant paid the balance due to the Bank of Tehama County on said note, amounting to upward of $1,100, and the said trustees named in said deed of trust made a deed of reconveyance of said real estate to appellant, and appellant had the same duly recorded, and the note was marked "Paid" by the bank, and surrendered to Halley. Appellant paid this note and took this deed under a mistake of fact. He, knowing nothing of the judgment of Kraft, believed the premises to be free from that incumbrance. Had he known of the judgment, he avers, he would have taken an assignment of the note, and directed the trustees to sell the said real property to satisfy the same. Appellant seeks in this action to be treated as the equitable assignee of said note, and to be subrogated to all the rights that the Bank of Tehama County had therein and in said trust deed, to have the said real property sold to satisfy said note, and to have the rights under the aforesaid judgment subordinated to appellant's rights under the trust deed and promissory note, and also to have the Herbert Kraft Company Bank enjoined from selling said real property under execution under said judgment. It appears further that the said real property is of less value than the amount claimed to be due to appellant as equitable assignee of said note.

I am of opinion that the facts stated bring the case within the principles laid down by this court in Matzen v. Shaeffer, 65 Cal. 81, 3

Pac. 92, Shaffer v. McCloskey, 101 Cal. 576, 36 Pac. 196, and Hines v. Ward, 121 Cal. 115, 53 Pac. 427, and that the demurrer should have been overruled. The above cases seem to hold that a junior lienholder shall derive no advantage over a senior lien, where such senior lien has been paid off and canceled by the owner of the premises to which the liens attached without actual knowledge on the part of such owner of the existence of such junior lien, and that it will be presumed that such owner made the payment for his own benefit, and not for the benefit of the junior lienholder, and for the protection of his interests equity will treat such owner as the assignee of the original senior lienholder, and will revive and enforce such senior lien for his benefit. The cases cited above treat altogether of mortgage liens, but I take it that the same doctrines of equity therein discussed are applicable to trust deeds given to secure the payment of promissory notes. I find this same doctrine of "equitable assignment" applied to a trust deed by the supreme court of Illinois in Young v. Morgan, 89 Ill. 199. In that case the court held that where a party sold land subject to a deed of trust, which was a prior lien to that of a judgment, the purchaser assuming the payment of the debt secured by the trust deed as a part of the purchase money, and the purchaser paid the same, taking a release of the trust deed instead of an assignment thereof, in equity the lien of the trust deed was not extinguished in favor of the judgment creditor, but that the purchaser was entitled to assert the same for his own protection, and have a sale under execution issued on said judgment set aside. The court said in that case: "The payment of the debt secured by the trust deed was not a voluntary payment by a stranger, but it was a payment which appellant was compelled to make in order to the protection of his title to this land which he had purchased." Respondent cites Guy v. Du Uprey, 16 Cal. 197, in support of the judgment; but that case differs as to the facts from the case at bar, for the court therein say, "The person who advanced the money had no interest in the payment of the debt or the release of the mortgage;" and further, "He was fully advised of the facts." In the case under consideration the appellant clearly had an interest in the payment and discharge of the debt which was an incumbrance upon the land he had bought, and, besides, he was not "advised of the fact" of the existence of the subsequent judgment lien. The constructive notice inferred from the docketing of the judgment is of no value here, and does not estop the appellant to urge that the note was canceled and not assigned because of his mistake arising out of an absence of all knowledge as to the existence of the judgment. Shaffer v. McCloskey, supra. In Persons v. Shaeffer, 65 Cal. 79, 3 Pac. 94, and Richards v. Griffith, 92 Cal. 493, 28 Pac. 484, cited by respondents, the prior liens were canceled of record prior to the time the subsequent liens attached, so that the subsequent lienholders and purchasers were in position to claim the rights of bona fide purchasers without notice. In this case, however, no such claim can be made, as the trust deed was a matter of record, and the land had not been redeeded or the note paid at the time the judgment was docketed and the judgment lien became attached to the land. Respondents were not misled to their prejudice by any act of appellant, and, notwithstanding it be held herein that the appellant is entitled to the relief asked in his complaint, their judgment lien is of no less value to them on that account than when it first attached.

Those objections to the complaint, other than such as are based on the ground of insufficiency of facts to show a cause of action, do not require treatment in this opinion. The propriety of an injunction is not here discussed. For the foregoing reasons, I advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause be remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: BRITT, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

CLARK v. ALLEN. (L. A. 487.)

'Supreme Court of California. July 7, 1899.)

REAL-ESTATE BROKER—TAKING COMMISSIONS FROM BOTH PARTIES—EXCHANGE OF LANDS—NEW TRIAL—EVIDENCE—VARIANCE.

1. If the duty of a real-estate broker is simply to bring together two persons who desire to exchange their lands, and the broker's entire duty is performed when he has brought them together, he is a mere middleman, not representing conflicting interests, and may receive compensation from both parties.

2. An order granting a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings will not be disturbed on appeal, where the evidence is at all conflicting.

3. An employment of a real-estate broker to find a purchaser, and an allegation in his complaint in an action for commissions that a purchaser was found, are satisfied by evidence that a party was found, with whom defendant exchanged lands,—especially where all the evidence introduced that tended to show an exchange of lands was offered and received without objection.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county.

Action by Thomas M. Clark against Charles W. Allen. From an order granting a new trial after judgment for plaintiff, he appeals. Affirmed.

E. A. Rogers and B. E. Vickery, for appellant. W. A. Harris and L. T. Eggers, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This action is brought to recover commissions for an exchange of real estate. Judgment went for plaintiff, and a new trial was granted upon motion of defendant. The appeal is prosecuted by plaintiff from the order granting a new trial.

For a defense to the action, defendant claimed that plaintiff's assignors, the brokers, received compensation for their services from the other party to the trade, without his (defendant's) knowledge, and for that reason he now insists that the brokers are barred from recovering any compensation from him. In other words, it is claimed that the law will not allow the brokers to act as the agents of both parties, and a contract of that kind for compensation will not be recognized by the courts. As a general principle, this contention is sound; but there are circumstances where a party may act for two persons, and charge compensation from both for his services. If the duty of the broker was simply to bring together two men who desired to exchange their lands, and the broker's entire duty was performed when he had brought the two men together, then we see nothing against good morals and a sound public policy in allowing compensation to the broker from each of the parties. In such a case the broker is in no sense representing conflicting interests. He has nothing whatever to do with the trade. Under the contract, his advice and assistance to either party are not called for. Upon the state of facts here assumed, the broker may be termed a "middleman," and not an "agent," in the strict sense of the term. In speaking to such a state of facts, the court said in Manders v. Craft, 3 Colo. App. 239, 32 Pac. 837: "In this case there was technically no purchase or sale. No money passed. It was an exchange of one kind of real estate for another. With the prices, details, and trade, the agent had nothing to do, and the arrangement was that he should not have. His sole action and employment terminated with bringing the parties together, which he did. The trade was made by the parties. Consequently the agent is not obnoxious to the charge of double employment, under the law. There was nothing in the relation of the agent to either to prevent compensation from both, if both agreed to pay." In Green v. Robertson, 64 Cal. 76, 28 Pac. 446, this court said: "The matters set up in the answer as to the employment of plaintiff by Tucker do not constitute a defense. The plaintiff made no bargain for the sale of the property. He was not authorized to make a bargain. He undertook to bring the buyer and seller together, and he did so. They made their own bargain, and after plaintiff had rendered his services and brought them together, and after they had made their bargain, the defendant executed the instrument in suit."

If the brokers in this case were merely middlemen, as in the cases above cited, the defendant could not defeat plaintiff's cause of action upon the ground that the other party to the exchange of property had paid him a fee for the services rendered. This question was essentially one of fact, and one upon which the trial court found in favor of plaintiff. Yet, while the evidence was ample to support such a finding, there was some evidence to the contrary,—possibly sufficient evidence to justify a finding the other way, if one had been made. The new trial appears to have been granted upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings; and, where the evidence is at all conflicting, we cannot disturb the order which grants the new trial. For these reasons the order appealed from must be affirmed.

By the brokers' contract with the defendant in this case, they were employed to make a "deal" for him respecting a certain piece of property. By plaintiff's complaint, he alleged that under this contract the brokers procured a purchaser able and willing to purchase the land. Under the contract, and under this allegation of the complaint, evidence was introduced showing an exchange of land, rather than a purchase. We do not deem such evidence at variance either with the terms of the contract or with the allegations of the complaint. An employment to find a purchaser and an allegation that a purchaser was found are satisfied by evidence that a party was found, with whom the contracting party exchanged lands. Especially should that be held in this case, where all the evidence introduced tending to show an exchange of lands was offered and received without objection. For the foregoing reasons, the order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

PEOPLE v. CLARK.

(Supreme Court of California. June 28, 1899.)
CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—STAY OF PROCEEDINGS.

Petitioner having appealed from a judgment of imprisonment, and the judge before whom he was tried, and likewise the presiding judge, being absent, and the judge temporarily acting in his place having refused a stay pending return of the trial judge, the supreme court will stay proceedings till the trial judge returns and hears application for a certificate of probable cause, or till some other judge of the same court appointed to act in his place has heard and decided it.

Application by Joseph Clark for a stay of proceedings. Granted.

L. P. Boardman, for petitioner.

BEATTY, C. J. It appears by an affidavit filed herein that the defendant above named has appealed to this court from a judgment of imprisonment in the state prison imposed by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, that the judge before whom he was tried is absent from said city and county on vacation, that the presiding judge of said court is also absent, and that the judge temporarily acting in his place refuses to grant any stay of proceedings pending the return of said trial judge. The result is that the defendant is compelled to apply here for relief to which he was clearly entitled on application to the superior court, and that, unless he can obtain a stay of proceedings here, he must be deprived of an undoubted statutory right,—the right, that is to say, of having it determined by the trial judge or by a justice of this court whether there is probable cause for his appeal, and, in case it is found that there is such probable cause, to have the proceedings stayed. Pen. Code, § 1243; In re Adams, 81 Cal. 163, 22 Pac. 547.

It is beyond question that a part and a very important part of the right of appeal, in cases of this kind, is the right to a stay of proceedings in a proper case; and if the judge of the trial court refuses or neglects to pass upon the question whether there is probable cause for the appeal, or improperly denies a certificate to that effect, the appellant has the right to apply to a justice of this court for such certificate, and, as we have said more than once, is entitled to a reasonable stay of proceedings until the record can be made up and certified here for examination. For these reasons, and because some judges of the superior court have refused to grant the stay necessary to enable the appellant to present his application to a justice of this court, we have been compelled, in the exercise of our appellate jurisdiction, to make such orders ourselves. The present case, however, presents the matter in a new aspect. Owing to the absence of the trial judge on vacation, no application can be made to him, and other judges of the same court, although they undoubtedly have the power to stay the proceedings during his absence, refuse to do so. We will not, therefore, make the usual order staying proceedings until the record can be presented to a justice of this court, but will make such order as should have been made in the superior court, viz. an order staying proceedings until the trial judge returns and hears the application for a certificate of probable cause, or until some other judge of the same court, appointed to act in his place, has heard and decided it. It is so ordered.

PATCH v. MILLER et al. (S. F. 1,477.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1899.)
FINDINGS—APPEAL—WHEN LIES.

1. Findings that, for and during the period of two years immediately preceding decedent's death, plaintiff performed work, labor, and services for him, and that the same were of the value of $25 per month, mean that plaintiff worked for deceased said two years, and that the value of such work was $25 per month.

2. Remedy for inconsistency between judgment and finding may be had under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, providing for an appeal from final judgment; no intention to repeal or modify this section appearing in sections 663, 663½ (St. 1897, p. 58), providing a remedy by motion in the trial court to vacate and set aside the judgment and enter another and different judgment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Hattie Patch against Charles A. Miller and others, executors. From a judgment for plaintiff for less than asked for, she appeals. Reversed.

Marcus Rosenthal, for appellant. Wm. H. Schooler and Jacob Samuels, for respondents.

GRAY, C. Action for work and labor. Plaintiff claimed $720 to be due her, and appeals from a judgment in her favor for $200.

The defendants are sued as executors of the last will and testament of J. M. Miller, deceased. The court found in the second finding as follows: "That, for and during the period of two years immediately preceding the time of the decease of said J. M. Miller hereinafter mentioned, the said plaintiff, at the special instance and request of said J. M. Miller, rendered and performed certain work, labor, and services to and for the said J. M. Miller, and that such work, labor, and services were and are of the reasonable value of twenty-five dollars per month." The seventh finding is to the effect that no part of the claim has been paid. The above is all that is said in the findings as to the length of time that plaintiff worked for deceased; and, while it is not as clear a statement of the fact as might have been made, yet we think a fair construction of its language will make the finding mean that the plaintiff worked for deceased two years or twenty-four months, and that the reasonable value of such work was and is $25 per month. Upon this construction of the findings the judgment should have been for $600 in plaintiff's favor.

It is insisted that plaintiff's remedy for an inconsistency between the judgment and finding is not by appeal from the judgment, but is to be obtained under the provisions of the new sections added to the Code of Civil Procedure in 1897, and numbered 663 and 663½ (see St. 1897, p. 58), by a motion in the trial court to vacate and set aside the judgment and enter another and different judgment. We do not find anything in these added sections to indicate that it was the intention of the legislature to repeal or in any way modify section 963, Code Civ. Proc., which provides for an appeal from a final judgment. It would therefore seem that an appeal from a final judgment entered in the superior court has the same effect, and is to be heard and determined in the same way, as before the enactment of the added sections. We hold that those sections were not intended to affect the remedy by appeal already existing, but were intended to provide a remedy in addition thereto, and advise that the judgment be reversed, and that the cause be remanded, with directions that the court below enter judgment for plaintiff for $600 and costs.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions that the court below enter judgment for plaintiff for $600 and costs, the same to be payable in due course of administration of the estate of J. M. Miller, deceased.

SANTA CRUZ BANK OF SAVINGS &
LOAN v. TAYLOR et al. (S. F. 981.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 28, 1899.)
CHANGE OF VENUE—DISQUALIFICATION OF JUDGE.

A motion to change place of trial for disqualification of judge, though it should have been granted immediately by him, not having been acted on till his term had expired, and one not disqualified had succeeded him, is properly denied.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county.

Action by the Santa Cruz Bank of Savings & Loan against Arthur A. Taylor and others. Defendants' motion to change place of trial was denied, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. B. Younger, for appellants. Wm. T. Jeter, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This action was brought in the county of Santa Cruz, to foreclose a mortgage, on the 5th day of July, 1895. The defendant Mary P. Taylor appeared and filed a demurrer to the complaint December 17, 1895. On the 30th day of January, 1896, which was within 10 days after the service of summons upon the said Mary P. Taylor, she again appeared and filed her affidavit of merits, and moved the court to change the place of trial because the judge of the court was disqualified. When the motion to change the place of trial was submitted does not appear, but it is stated in the bill of exceptions that it was submitted while Hon. James H. Logan was superior judge of the county. Perhaps it was submitted near the end of Judge Logan's term; but, at all events, the motion was taken under advisement by Judge Logan, and was never passed upon by him, although it was admitted upon the hearing of the motion that Judge Logan was disqualified. In March, 1897, counsel for plaintiff called up the motion before Hon. Lucus F. Smith, who had succeeded Judge Logan, and the motion was by him denied, and defendant excepted. It was not claimed that Judge Smith was disqualified. Undoubtedly it was the duty of Judge Logan promptly to transfer the cause to the nearest and most accessible county, where the like objection did not exist, and he had no discretion in the matter except to determine which court was the proper court under the statute. Krumdick v. Crump, 98 Cal. 117, 32 Pac. 800. But Judge Logan went out of office without taking any action in the matter, and when he ceased to be judge there was no foundation for the motion. It was no longer true that the superior judge of the county was disqualified, and the statute no longer authorized or required the transfer of the cause. The fact that Judge Logan had no discretion, and could not have retained the case, or have called in another judge, did not deprive that court of jurisdiction; and, when the judge himself became qualified to try the action, it was his duty to retain the case as against such a motion. The statute does not authorize a transfer because a person who is not a judge of the court, and could not sit as judge in the case, could not act as judge, if he had in fact been judge. The reason why the judge of the county cannot call another to try the case is stated in Krumdick v. Crump. It is that the judge shall neither try his own case nor select his judge. This case is not within the evils provided against by that rule. Judge Smith's ruling must be tested by the conditions which existed when it was made. The order is affirmed.

KNOWLES v. BALDWIN. (S. F. 1,045.)

BUILDING CONTRACT—LIEN—DEMURRER—INTEREST—APPEAL—RECORD.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, providing that by the terms of a building contract 25 per cent. of the contract price shall be made payable at least 35 days after completion of the contract, and section 1187, providing that the contractor, at any time after completing his contract, till expiration of 60 days, may file his notice of lien, he may file notice of lien before expiration of the 35 days; and the provision of a contract to do work for $3,000, that the last payment of $750 shall be paid 35 days after completion, provided the building is free from liens placed thereon by the contractor or any one claiming to have furnished him labor or material, is not a stipulation that the contractor shall not file a lien within 35 days.

2. A general demurrer to complaint to recover balance on a building contract, and to have it declared a lien, is ineffectual, where the complaint is good at least as to all but one payment.

3. Interest on respective payments under a building contract should be allowed from the time they are due.

4. Entries in the transcript purporting to be minute orders cannot be noticed on appeal; they having been inserted after the certificate of the clerk to the judgment roll, and not being certified as a part of it, and under Code Civ. Proc. § 670, not being a part of it, even if so certified.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by William Knowles against E. J. Baldwin. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry I. Kowalsky and George Hayford, for appellant. Wm. H. Jordan, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Action to recover for balance due on contract for repairs, labor, etc., and to have the same declared a lien on premises described in complaint. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals from the judgment on the judgment roll alone.

The principal point on which defendant relies is the order of the court below overruling defendant's demurrer to the complaint. The complaint was in two counts, and alleged, in substance: That on the 25th day of August, 1896, the plaintiff entered into a written contract with defendant, by the terms of which plaintiff was to make certain improvements and changes in the building known as the "Baldwin Hotel," situate in the city and county of San Francisco, upon the premises described in the complaint, for the sum of $3,000, to be paid as follows: $750 when the basement should be ready for plastering, $750 when the plastering should be completed, $750 when all should be completed and accepted; and the final payment, "seven hundred and fifty dollars, thirty-five days after completion and date of acceptance, provided said building and premises were free and clear from any and all liens and incumbrances arising from or created or placed thereon by the said contractor, or any person claiming to have furnished him labor or materials for the erection and completion of said work." That the work was fully completed, according to the contract, on December 8, 1896, and that $1,500 had been paid, and no more. That on the 4th day of January, 1897, plaintiff duly filed his notice of lien with the county recorder, which notice stated the statutory requirements. That the premises described in the complaint were necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the building thereon. The second count alleged that the plaintiff did certain extra work, at the request of defendant, of the reasonable value of $275, no part of which had been paid, and contained like allegations as to description, filing of lien, etc. The complaint and each count thereof were demurred to upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The defendant contends that the complaint does not state facts sufficient, for the reason that the contract upon which the lien is sought to be foreclosed provides that no lien shall be filed for 35 days after the completion of the contract. Such construction is sought to be placed upon the clause quoted from the complaint. The complaint was filed February 12, 1897, and there is no question but that the full amount of the contract price, according to the complaint, was overdue at the time of the commencement of the action. The only question is as to the last $750, which was to become due 35 days after the completion and date of acceptance of the contract, "provided said building and premises were free and clear from any and all liens and incumbrances arising from or created or placed thereon by said contractor." It is claimed that the clause last quoted is equivalent to an express agreement that no lien shall be filed by the contractor till after the expiration of the 35 days. We do not think so. The Code (Code Civ. Proc. § 1184) provides that by the terms of the contract at least 25 per cent. of the contract price shall be made payable at least 35 days after the final completion of the contract. In this case there is no question but that the contract complied with the said section. Section 1187 provides that the contractor, at any time after the completion of his contract, and until the expiration of 60 days, may file his notice of lien. Reading the two sections together, it is plain that by the terms of the contract at least 25 per cent. of the contract price must not become due until 35 days after its completion, and that at any time after the completion, and before the expiration of the 60 days, the notice of lien may be filed. In fact, the giving of credit for a longer period would not affect the time within which the notice of lien must be filed. This is shown by section 1190, which provides that suit must be brought to enforce a lien within 90 days after filing the lien, unless by the terms of the contract credit was given, and in such case within 90 days after the expiration of the credit. Moreover, the demurrer was general, and in such case it should be overruled if the complaint entitles the plaintiff to any relief. Fleming v. Albeck, 67 Cal. 227, 7 Pac. 659. The defendant's argument as to the demurrer in this case does not apply to any portion of the complaint except the last payment of $750 in the first count. If we should hold that a special demurrer would lie to that portion of the first count which set up the time when the last $750 payment would be due, we would still have a good complaint as to the third payment of $750, and as to the $275 for extras.

It is claimed that the judgment directed interest from March 23d, instead of April 30th, the date of filing the findings. The plaintiff was entitled to interest at the legal rate upon the respective payments from the dates they become due. The findings directed interest from February 12, 1897, which was less than the interest to which plaintiff was entitled. The decree which was entered directed interest from March 23, 1897, which was less than directed by the findings. The findings and decree recite that the action came on for trial March 23, 1897, and we must presume they speak the truth.

We cannot notice the entries in the transcript purporting to be minute orders. They are inserted after the certificate of the clerk to the judgment roll, and are not certified as being a part of it, and, if so certified, they would not be a part of it. Code Civ. Proc. § 670. It appears to us that this appeal is entirely devoid of merit, and we advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

SWAIN v. JACKS. (S. F. 1,103.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 23, 1899.)

CONTRACT—REDEMPTION OF MORTGAGE—TENDER IN MORTGAGEE'S ABSENCE—RESCISSION.

1. An agreement between a mortgagor and mortgagee, in which time was the essence of the contract, provided that, upon payment of a certain sum by the former to the latter, he would bid in the premises at foreclosure for the full amount of his claim, and, if some third party should redeem the premises within a certain time by paying his claim in full without the aid of such sum, then the same should be repaid to the mortgagor. There was no other provision for repayment of the money, and no redemption was made. Held, that the sum paid to the mortgagee could not be recovered.

2. Where a mortgagee is absent from the state during the period of redemption, the tender to redeem must be made as required by Civ. Code, § 1489, providing that the tender may be made at his residence or place of business, if the same can be found, and, if not, at any place within the state.

3. The failure of a mortgagee to offer to perform a contract providing for the redemption of the premises, and his absence from the state in parts unknown during the redemption period, do not constitute a rescission of the contract.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county.

Action by Lucinda J. Swain against David Jacks. Defendant had judgment on demurrer, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. V. Morehouse and F. J. Hambly, for appellant. Frs. E. Spencer, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. A demurrer to the amended complaint was sustained in the court below, and judgment went for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

The action is to recover \$2,000, alleged to have been received by defendant for the use of plaintiff. The alleged cause of action is founded upon a written contract, set out in full in the complaint, between defendant and one Devendorf (plaintiff's assignor), executed February 14, 1892. The contract is, in substance, as follows: It recites that Jacks had brought an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed to him by Devendorf and one Capp, dated June 22, 1887, for \$4,000, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum, compounded semiannually, and that Jacks proposed to proceed to judgment, and have the mortgaged premises sold. Then Devendorf agrees to pay Jacks \$2,000 upon the latter's agreement to bid in the premises at the foreclosure sale for the amount of the judgment; and Jacks agrees that, upon the payment to him of the \$2,000, he will bid in the premises "for the full amount of his judgment, claim, interest, costs, and expenses of said action." Jacks further agrees that, in the event that no redemptioner shall redeem from the sale within six months, if Devendorf, within the redemption period, shall pay him the full amount which he had bid, less the said sum of \$2,000, with interest on the balance, etc., he will assign to Devendorf the certificate of purchase. Jacks further agrees that in case no redemption is made, and Devendorf also fails to pay said balance within the six months, Jacks will, at any time within 30 days after he shall receive a sheriff's deed, upon payment to him by Devendorf of the full amount of the original bid, with interest, taxes, etc., execute and deliver to Devendorf, or any one he may appoint, a deed conveying all the interest and estate in the premises acquired by him by the sheriff's deed, Devendorf, however, to pay all taxes, costs, expenses, etc., which Jacks may have incurred, with interest on the same at $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum, and all costs and expenses for drawing and recording papers, etc.; and Jacks also agrees that he will receive in part payment of the purchase money the promissory note of the purchaser for the sum of not exceeding \$4,000, payable two years after date, with interest, and with other conditions not necessary to be named, the promissory note to be secured by a first mortgage on the premises. It is then provided as follows: "Time is of the essence of this contract; and, after the expiration of thirty days from the date of said sheriff's deed, all the rights of said Devendorf accruing by virtue of this agreement shall absolutely cease and determine." It is also further provided that, "in case a redemption shall be made from said Jacks by any party entitled thereto within the time allowed by law, and for the full amount bid by said Jacks at said sheriff's sale, with two per cent. per annum thereon, up to the time of redemption, then and in that case said Jacks shall repay the said Devendorf the sum of two thousand dollars. It is further provided that, if said real estate shall be bid in by any other person at said sheriff's sale for the full amount of said Jacks' judgment, interest, costs, and expenses, then this agreement to be void and of no further effect." It is averred in the complaint that thereafter, on or about April 22, 1892, Devendorf assigned all his rights and equities under the contract to the plaintiff herein; and that Jacks recognized the plaintiff as such assignee, and placed her in possession of the premises as a person entitled to all the rights of Devendorf under the contract. It is further averred that thereafter the sheriff's sale took place, and Jacks bid in the land for the full amount of his claim, and that the plaintiff paid \$2,000 to him on or about the said 22d day of April, 1892, and that, no one having redeemed within the statutory period, the sheriff executed the deed of the premises to Jacks. It is then averred that, within 30 days after the execution of the sheriff's deed, plaintiff "was ready, willing, and able to comply in all respects with the above-quoted terms, conditions, and provisions of said contract, and repay the moneys therein required to be paid, and to receive said conveyance of said premises from said Jacks, and to make and execute and deliver to him the note and mortgage provided to be given by her; but the said plaintiff, Lucinda J. Swain, avers that the said Jacks, on his part, utterly failed and neglected to perform, or offered to perform, his part of said contract, or make or execute or deliver, or offer to deliver, said deed, but, on the contrary, by his acts and negligence, made impossible the performance of said contract by said plaintiff." The said "acts and negligence" are then averred to be these: "That during said period of 30 days, and for some weeks prior thereto, and for several months thereafter, the said Jacks was absent from the state of California in some portion of the Eastern states unknown to said plaintiff, and that during his said absence the said Jacks left and had no agent or attorney in fact within the state of California empowered to execute any of the terms of said contract, or to make or deliver said deed, or receive said money or said note and mortgage of said plaintiff;" and that during said 30 days she "made every reasonable and proper effort, by correspondence and by inquiry, to find and communicate with said Jacks, and to procure the completion of the terms of said contract and the title in her to the said property, and she was totally unable so to do." It is then averred that, "by reason of the facts aforesaid," plaintiff was prevented from performing her part of the contract, and defendant failed to perform or offered to perform his part thereof, and thereby "elected to rescind" said agreement, and that the same was thereby rescinded, and that "the failure of both plaintiff and defendant to comply with the terms thereof within 30 days, as therein provided," terminated the contract, and that the same has thereby become at an end. It is then averred "that, by reason of the facts aforesaid, plaintiff alleges that said defendant received from said plaintiff the sum of \$2,000 to the use of said plaintiff."

The demurrer was properly sustained. It will be observed that there is in the contract an express provision that Jacks shall repay the $2,000, and the contract shall end, in the event of a redemption by a third party, and that there is no other provision whatever for the repayment of the money. There was evidently a consideration for the payment of the $2,000 by Devendorf in the fact that Jacks was to bid the whole amount of his claim, and thereby relieve the former from any deficiency judgment; and, as a corollary to this, it was agreed that if some third person should redeem by paying the full amount of Jacks' bid, with interest, percentage, etc., so that Jacks' entire claim should be satisfied without the aid of the $2,000 paid by Devendorf, then the last-named sum of money should be repaid to Devendorf. But this event, upon the happening of which the money was to be repaid, never occurred. Therefore appellant is not justified in taking the position that the contract should be treated as an ordinary simple contract to sell land, where there has been part payment of the purchase price. But, if this view could be taken of it, still the complaint is insufficient, because no tender of performance of her part of the contract was made within the 30 days, or at any time. See Townsend v. Tufts, 95 Cal. 257, 30 Pac. 528, which, on this point, is nearly identical with the case at bar; also Scott v. Glenn, 98 Cal. 168, 32 Pac. 983, and cases there cited. No sufficient excuse is alleged for not making the tender. Section 1489 of the Civil Code prescribes how a tender shall be made, under the circumstances set forth in the complaint. Samuel v. Allen, 98 Cal. 406, 33 Pac. 273. The facts averred do not constitute a rescission of the contract by respondent. Haile v. Smith, 113 Cal. 661, 45 Pac. 872, and cases there cited; Glock v. Colony Co. (Cal.) 55 Pac. 713. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

In re WALKER'S ESTATE. (S. F. 1,327.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 28, 1899.)
ADMINISTRATOR—ACCOUNTING—DEBT FROM SELF.

Though an administrator should be charged with a debt from himself to the estate, existing before his appointment, as money on hand, yet he never, while administrator, having had the means to pay any part of it, the decree settling his accounts should show this, that he may not be charged with contempt for not paying it over as directed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county.

In the matter of the estate of John Walker, deceased. From a decree settling the final account of J. M. Walker as administrator, he appeals. Modified.

J. M. Thompson, for appellant. J. R. Lepo, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. The appellant, J. M. Walker, is the administrator of John Walker, deceased, and the appeal is from the decree settling his final account as administrator, he having resigned his trust. Before the death of John Walker, appellant was indebted to him in the sum of $8,000, with interest, and alleges that he was at the time of his appointment, and ever since has been, entirely insolvent. Upon the settlement of his final account he offered evidence to prove his insolvency, and that the debt due from him to the estate remained uncollected, without his fault. An objection was made to the offered evidence on the ground of incompetency, irrelevancy, and immateriality, and because the matter has been adjudicated and settled in the decree settling the annual account. For the purposes of this appeal, therefore, the evidence rejected must be deemed sufficient to establish the fact that the debt was uncollectible, and the controversy is as to its materiality. It may be remarked here, however, that insolvency might not be a reason for not charging the administrator, even if the view contended for by the appellant be correct. One may be insolvent, and yet be able to pay a particular debt. He may have some property, and yet not enough to pay all his debts, and if, in law, he could prefer one creditor over another,—which ordinarily he may,—then it was his duty, as administrator, to pay this debt so far as he could. The appellant admits that the general rule is that the administrator is to be charged with a debt due from him to the estate as money on hand, but contends that he may show, at least on his final settlement, that he has never at any time while administrator had the means to enable him to pay the debt, or any part thereof. Further than this, unquestionably, the contention could not logically go, since, as he cannot sue himself, and yet it is his duty to collect the debt for the estate, he must be held officially liable for any money he could have so applied at any time during his official term. If he has not so applied it, he has not faithfully executed the duties of his trust according to law, and his sureties may also be held; for it is so nominated in the bond. But in this case it stands, for the purposes of this appeal, admitted, that the administrator has at no time during his term had one dollar which he could have so applied; and the decree finds and adjudges that he has something over $10,000 in cash on hand, which decree renders him liable to be imprisoned for contempt for not paying over as directed, and perhaps liable to prosecution for embezzlement, and constitutes an estoppel against his bondsmen, who will, in consequence, be required to pay money to the estate which has not been lost by the administrator, and which otherwise the estate would never have received. They have not only become liable for the faithful discharge of his duties,—which is all they expressly undertook,—but also that the administrator is solvent, and will pay his indebtedness to the estate. In other words, they are held liable, although the administrator has in fact faithfully performed the duties of his trust according to law, because of a fiction of the law that money due from an administrator shall, as against him, be deemed money in hand. All fictions of the law, we have been taught, were created to enable the court to do justice, and where, to indulge a fiction, is to cause injustice, its just limit has been found. "In fictione juris semper æquitas existit."

The courts have not considered the debt from an insolvent administrator or executor to the estate money in hand for all purposes. When an application is made to sell property to pay debts, it is no reply to say that the administrator has sufficient money in hand for that purpose, if this be fictitious money, consisting of a debt due from an insolvent executor. It is then regarded as an uncollectible asset. In re Georgi (Sur.) 47 N. Y. Supp. 1061. Even in Massachusetts, where the doctrine is more strictly adhered to, and where it is held that the sureties are bound for the debt of an insolvent administrator (Stevens v. Gaylord, 11 Mass. 269; Winship v. Bass, 12 Mass. 199), it was nevertheless held that, if the debt is secured by a second mortgage, the estate could redeem from a sale made under the first (Kinney v. Ensign, 18 Pick. 232). Of course, if the money had been paid, the lien was discharged, and the estate had no right to redeem; but Judge Shaw said: "The taking of administration by a debtor is not, in fact or in law, to all purposes, payment of the debt. As between the administrator himself and those beneficially interested in the estate, he is held to account for it as a debt paid, from convenience and necessity, because the administrator cannot sue himself, and cannot collect his own debt in any other mode than by crediting it in his administration account. On technical grounds, as well as on considerations of policy, an administrator is not permitted to show that he could not collect a debt due from himself. But this is in the nature of an estoppel; and it is a well-settled rule that, although a party is bound by an estoppel as of a fact proved or admitted, yet it shall not be taken as a substantial fact, from which other facts can be inferred, * * * but such a legal fiction will never be allowed to work wrong and injustice." So the estate was allowed to redeem, which it would have had neither the occasion nor the right to do if it already had the money due from its debtor. The force of the last case may be somewhat weakened by the subsequent case of Tarbell v. Jewett, 129 Mass. 457. No question is raised in that case, however, as to the effect the insolvency of the administrator might have upon the question. I am not disposed to deny that, so far as the administrator has the means to pay, he and his sureties may be charged with the money as in the hands of the administrator. In the case of Baucus v. Stover, 89 N. Y. 1, while the court strenuously insists that the debt must be deemed collected, it nevertheless holds that it will not, for all purposes, stand on the same footing as money collected. He (the administrator) cannot be committed for a contempt for not paying it over in pursuance of a final decree.

Here it is interesting to ask, why? It has been solemnly adjudged that he actually has the money in hand, and, of course, that being so, he can and should pay it over. Is not the mistake in allowing a decree so absolute to be entered? In fact, it was also said that it would be well for the surrogate in the decree charging the executor with the debt as so much money "to specify the charge thus made separately, so as to save all the rights of the executor, and to protect him against consequences which ought not to follow from such a charge." Whether the sureties would be bound for the debt under such a decree the court expressly declined to decide. This was the case of an executor, and the state of New York has a statute from which section 1447 of our Code of Civil Procedure was taken. The two provisions are practically identical. The court was applying the language of the statute to the case, and felt bound by its absolute terms. The appeal was from a decision of the general term, reported in 24 Hun, 109. The lower court was reversed, but the appellate tribunal seems to have been impressed with the views of the lower court, and apparently attempted to avoid some inconveniences pointed out in an able opinion rendered by Judge Bockes. Judge Bockes thought, while the executor might be held liable to the estate, he should not be made subject to be imprisoned for debt, as he would be if charged by such a decree. Nor should his sureties be made to pay his individual debt if it has not been lost by his failure to do his duty as executor. The court of appeals met these objections by suggesting to the probate court to show by its decree how much was real money in the hands of the executor and how much was constructive money. This constructive money may be a just liability against the executor, but the fiction becomes an unjust reality when the charge is entered, without qualification, in the final decree. The sequel to the case of Baucus v. Stover was a suit on the bond against the executor and his sureties. The appeal to the supreme court is reported in 45 Hun, 582. It was held that the decree was not conclusive against the sureties nor against the executor in a contempt proceeding. This, as the court determined, was in accordance with the ruling in Baucus v. Stover, and of the following cases from other states: Harcker v. Irich, 10 N. J. Eq. 269; Ordinary v. Kershaw, 14 N. J. Eq. 528; McCarty v. Frazer, 62 Mo. 263; Garber v. Com., 7 Barr. 265; In re Piper's Estate, 15 Pa. St. 533. The court said that the sureties did not agree to augment the estate, but that the executor would not waste it, or be in default; that the executor was not in default, and there was no deficiency to make good. He had all that had come to his hands, and all that, by the greatest diligence, he could get. All this he was ready to distribute. More he could not do, unless he could make something out of nothing. This judgment was affirmed. Baucus v. Barr, 107 N. Y. 624, 13 N. E. 939.

Sureties are usually entitled to be subrogated to the securities held by the creditor. Here they would succeed to the debt against the administrator. They are simply compelled to purchase a worthless debt, which they did not guaranty. Is it possible that this legal fiction can work such a result? The estate has lost nothing by the administration. By the procedure recommended in Baucus v. Stover as to the form of the decree settling the final account the estate would still retain the personal demand against the administrator, changed to a judgment. And, there being no official delinquency, except that created by the fiction which must stop where equity fails to go with it, there can be no reason for holding the sureties. They are considered as estopped by the decree founded, not on a fact, but on the fiction. The administrator, so far as the decree can subject him to imprisonment for failing to pay over the money, has equal reason to complain of its form. The same conclusion was reached in a different way by the supreme court of Vermont in Lyon v. Osgood, 58 Vt. 707, 7 Atl. 5. It was a suit in equity by a surety to reform the decree because it charged the executor with his entire personal debt, whereas it was alleged he had the means to pay only a part of it. The relief was granted, the court saying that the executor should not be charged for his personal debt beyond his actual ability to pay, "for only to that extent does he, by his appointment, receive money from himself belonging to the estate." And again the authorities are cited. They need not be repeated here. Unquestionably there is a conflict, but Weerner, in 2 American Administration, p. 1140, states that sureties are held not bound when the administrator is utterly insolvent in Indiana, Maine, Wisconsin, New Jersey, New York, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and Vermont. If this view is to prevail, there may arise a question as to the proper form of entering the decree settling the final account. It seems to me the mode suggested in Baucus v. Stover is a proper method, and that the decree involved here should be so modified. The administrator should be charged with the entire sum, including the debt due from himself, and the decree should then show what portion of that amount consisted of debts due from the administrator which he reported as cash on hand. Of course, if it appears that he actually has the money, this formula would be unnecessary. But under such a decree the administrator might be able to purge himself of contempt, and the sureties, if it should be held to be a defense,—for that is not involved here,—could show that some portion of it the administrator never had the means to pay. And the heirs could still proceed against the administrator, and collect the amount from him if he acquired the means. The case of Treweek v. Howard, 105 Cal. 434, 39 Pac.

20, is much relied upon by respondent. That was against the sureties of an executor. That decision was based upon the estoppel of the decree and upon section 1447 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which was construed to mean that the liability of the executor for such debt was in all respects the same as for money in his hands. That decision may be justified by the estoppel of the decree. The question is not so presented here. So far as it is based upon the statute, it is apparently in conflict with the cases in New York construing the statute from which our code provisions are taken. This is, however, not the case of an executor. The Code lays down no such rule in regard to administrators. They are still left under the common-law rule, under which, as we have seen, the debt due the estate from an insolvent administrator is not for all purposes regarded as money on hand, but is so regarded only by a fiction of law which can only subsist with justice. I do not see, under this view, that the appellant was injured by the ruling rejecting the offered evidence. The court should, perhaps, have permitted the evidence to be given, but the only relief it could have entitled him to receive is warranted by the evidence, put in by the contestant. The decree settling the annual account, including the findings, show that the administrator was charged, not for money actually received, but for a debt due from him to the estate. In Miller v. Lux, 100 Cal. 609, 35 Pac. 345, 639, it was held that the decree is in reality a judgment, and the findings are a part of the judgment roll. The findings in the matter of the first contest contain a full statement of the facts. The case is remanded, with directions to modify the decree so that it will appear upon the face thereof that a certain portion of the money in the hands of the administrator, to be stated therein, is for a personal debt due from the administrator to the estate of the decedent.

APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

The striking out of evidence is harmless where it would have authorized no other relief than that warranted by the evidence admitted.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county.

In the matter of the estate of John Walker, deceased. From an order settling the first annual account of J. M. Walker as administrator, he appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Thompson, for appellant. J. A. Lepo, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an appeal from an order settling the first annual account of the administrator. The appeal was submitted at the same time as the appeal from the order settling the final account, a case similarly entitled, and numbered S. F. 1,327 (57 Pac. 991). As will appear from the opinion rendered in that case, it is not necessary to reverse or modify the order entered to give the appellant all the protection he can properly obtain, and that he was not injured by the ruling striking out the evidence introduced by him. The order is affirmed.

CAMPBELL et al. v. DRAIS et al. (Sac. 504).¹

ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE — JURISDICTION — GUARDIAN AD LITEM — ESTOPPEL
— LIMITATIONS.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1537, providing that, to obtain an order for sale of real estate to pay decedent's debts, petition must be made, and section 1538 that, if it appear to the court necessary to sell the real estate, an order must be made directed to persons interested to show cause why an order to sell should not be granted, and section 1539, providing that a copy of the order to show cause shall be served on persons interested, an order of sale is void; the court having obtained no jurisdiction of infants interested, in the absence of an order to show cause and service thereof on them.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1718, providing that, "at or before the hearing of petitions * * * for sales of real estate" to pay debts of decedents, the court may appoint some attorney to represent minors, the attorney for minors cannot be appointed till the court has obtained jurisdiction of the minors, by service on them as provided by section 1539, of the order to show cause; and waiver of the order to show cause by an attorney appointed for minors, without it, is ineffectual.

3. Code Civ. Proc. § 1573, providing that action for recovery of an estate sold by an administrator shall be commenced within three years next after the settlement of the final account, does not prevent action after that time by children of deceased to quiet title to their half interest in the land as to which the sale was void, where the purchaser at such sale acknowledged their title and held for them as tenant in common, and the action was against the mortgagee of such purchaser, who, when taking the mortgage, was informed of their title, and who purchased under foreclosure of the mortgage; they not being obliged to bring their action till he sought to gain possession under the title founded on the foreclosure.

4. Where an administrator's sale of lands to pay debts was void as to the half interest of decedent's children, and the purchaser acknowledged that they had a half interest, and before mortgaging the land told the mortgagee so, such children are not estopped by retention of money they received from the administrator's sale to maintain action to quiet title against the mortgagee purchasing under foreclosure of mortgage.

Action by John F. Campbell and others against Mary C. Drais, executrix of M. J. Drais, deceased, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Nicol & Orr, W. B. Nutter, and Minor & Ashley, for appellants. Smith & Grant, for respondents.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an action to quiet title to the undivided half of a certain piece of land described in the complaint. The plaintiffs are the children and heirs at law of John A. Campbell, deceased, who died May 21, 1873, seised in severalty of the whole of said tract of land, and it is conceded that the plaintiffs, as heirs of said decedent, are the owners of the undivided half of the land sued for, unless their title thereto has passed, either by virtue of a probate sale made in the administration of the estate of the decedent in 1874, or has been lost to them by the operation of the statute of limitations. Judgment in the lower court went for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Appellants claim title first as purchasers under the foreclosure of a mortgage made to M. J. Drais, now deceased, by one Church, and contend that Church had title through mesne conveyances by virtue of a probate sale of the property in 1874. We are satisfied, however, that the probate sale was invalid and void. The petition under which the sale was made was filed on the 17th day of January, 1874, and is as follows: "The petition of C. A. Campbell, administrator of the estate of said deceased, respectfully shows that heretofore, to wit, on the 14th day of October, 1873, petitioner filed his petition praying for an order of sale of certain real estate, and showing the necessity therefor; that, owing to a mistake in the inventory on file, the real property set forth in said petition did not belong to said estate; that therefore the order heretofore granted has become ineffectual; that a new inventory has been filed correctly describing the real estate belonging to said estate; that the facts which constitute the necessity for selling the real estate belonging to said estate still exists, and are as set forth in said former petition, to which reference is hereby made, and petitioner prays may be taken as a part hereof; that a hotel constitutes a portion of the improvements on the real estate belonging to said estate, which said hotel contains furniture for the use thereof; that said furniture is worth about two hundred and thirteen dollars and sixty cents. Wherefore petitioner prays that an order of sale be granted authorizing said administrator to sell said real estate and furniture at public sale, and for such further order as may be proper. [Signed by the attorney for the administrator, and verified by the latter.]" It appears that a former petition for the sale of the property had been filed October 14, 1873, but that on account of the supposed insufficient description of the property it had been abandoned. On the same day on which the second petition, above quoted, was filed, to wit, January 17, 1874, the order for the sale was made, and under this order the sale took place; and it is evident that the order for the sale made, under these circumstances, was invalid and void. Section 1537 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, to obtain an order for the sale of real property, a petition in writing must be made to the superior court, setting forth certain facts; and section 1538 provides that, if it appears to the court from the petition that it is necessary to sell the real estate, an order must be made directing all persons interested in the estate to appear before the court at a time and place specified, not less than four nor more than ten weeks from the time of making such order, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the executor or administrator to sell so much of the real estate of the decedent as is necessary; and section 1539 provides that a copy of the order to show cause must be personally served on all persons interested in the estate, including the heirs, at least ten days before the time of hearing, or be published four successive weeks in such newspaper as the court shall direct. In the case at bar, no such notice to show cause was made, and no service of any kind was made upon the respondents herein, who at that time were all minors, the oldest of them being only about 12 years old. The respondents contend that the petition did not give jurisdiction because it contained no description of the property to be sold; but, if it could be held that a reference to various documents referred to in the petition might, under a very liberal construction, show a sufficient description of the property, still the absence of any order to show cause and of any service of the notice upon respondents are fatal to the validity of the sale. And this difficulty is not obviated by the fact that one Hall, who had been appointed attorney for minor heirs, did, on the date when said petition was made, file with the court a document of which the following is a copy: "Waiver of notice: The undersigned attorney, appointed to represent the minor heirs during the settlement of said estate, hereby waives notice of hearing of petition for sale of said real estate, and assents to an order of sale as prayed for in said petition, and for the reasons and causes therein stated." The attorney for minor heirs can represent them only in a proceeding which has been duly inaugurated and in which the court has already jurisdiction of the minors by such service of summons or notice as the Code provides. He cannot waive their rights, or by any of his acts invest the court with jurisdiction of their persons which it had not already acquired. Section 1718, which provides that, "at or before the hearing of petitions * * * for sales of real estate," the court may appoint some attorney to represent minors, evidently refers to some particular proceeding, and, taken in connection with other provisions of the Code, clearly contemplates a proceeding in which the court has already acquired jurisdiction of the minors. Such was the ruling of the court touching the appointment of a guardian ad litem in Gray v. Palmer, 9 Cal. 628, where it was said: "The court had no right to appoint a guardian ad litem until the infant was properly before the court;" and in Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. 365, the court say that the record showed "that the district court never acquired jurisdiction over the person of Franklina C. Gray in one of the actions, and therefore had no more authority to appoint a guardian ad litem for her in that action than it had to appoint attorneys for the other defendants." These principles apply here; for, while probate proceedings are at least quasi proceedings in rem, yet, where the statute provides for the service of notice upon persons, the same rule applies as in ordinary civil actions. The probate court, therefore, had no jurisdiction to make the order of sale under which appellants claim, and the sale was invalid and void. The fact that in 1874 section 1718 provided that "the appearance of the attorney is sufficient proof of the service of the notice on the parties he is appointed to represent" does not change the principle. This language implies that there must be notice to the parties and proof of the service of such notice, and merely means that after such service the appearance of the attorney, under certain circumstances, may be taken as sufficient proof of the fact of service. But in the case at bar it appears affirmatively that there was neither notice nor service, and that the attorney undertook to waive both.

The court below correctly held that the action was not barred by sections 318, 319, 320, and 1573 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or either of them. The sale under the probate order was made to one Hewitt, to whom in March, 1874, an administrator's deed was given, which purported to convey to Hewitt in severalty the whole of the tract of land of which the undivided half is involved in this action. Hewitt held and occupied the land for a few days, and on March 11, 1874, conveyed the same by deed in severalty to one Cross, who held and occupied the same until February, 1876, when he conveyed the land by deed purporting to convey the whole in severalty to one Church, who at that time entered into the possession of the land, and has been in possession ever since. While Cross was in possession he allowed the widow of John A. Campbell, deceased, to build a house upon a portion of the land, and to occupy it with her minor children, and in 1876 Church married the widow, and the children continued to live on the land with Church and their mother during and after their minority. They were raised and treated by Church substantially as if they had been his own children. Perhaps the evidence does not quite warrant the finding of the court that during all this time Church recognized the children as owning an undivided one-half, and held possession as a tenant in common with them. It is probable that for a period exceeding the statutory limitation of five years Church thought that he owned the land in severalty, and treated it as if he so owned it. During most of that time, however, the plaintiffs were minors. Some time between 1886 and 1890 Church told at least one of the plaintiffs that they (the children) had an interest in the property; and in 1890, and before the execution of the mortgage to Drahs, under which appellants claim, he said to all the plaintiffs that they owned one-half. Moreover, before Drahs took the mortgage in December, 1890, Church informed him that the children owned one-half, and called his attention to an abstract of title showing that fact; and, after considerable conversation between them upon the subject, Drahs agreed to take the mortgage with the knowledge that, although it covered the whole title to the land, yet it probably would be good for only an undivided one-half. All the plaintiffs had attained their majority a little more than three years before the commencement of this action, and the final account of the administrator of the estate of Campbell, deceased, had been settled more than three years before the commencement of the action; and therefore appellants contend that the action is barred by section 1573 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that no action shall be maintained for the recovery of an estate sold by an executor or administrator unless it be commenced within three years next after the settlement of the final account. But plaintiffs had no cause of action against Church, for he acknowledged their title and was holding for them as a tenant in common, and they could not have litigated their title in the foreclosure suit because they held by a paramount title, and not under the mortgagor. They were not, therefore, called upon to bring any action until the purchasers under the foreclosure judgment sought to gain possession under their title founded upon that judgment. The money which Hewitt paid for the land at the original administrator's sale was used partly to pay off debts of the estate, and there was a residue which was distributed, and a part of the money so distributed was received by the plaintiffs; and it is contended by appellants that this fact estops the plaintiffs from bringing this suit, and that, at all events, they cannot maintain the suit while retaining that money. Whether minor heirs, who are merely passive during the administration of an estate, and enter themselves into no contracts, are bound to restore money which comes to them upon a void sale is a question not necessary to be determined (see Hill v. Den, 54 Cal. 6), for this principle would not apply here. There is no reason why the money, under any view of the law, should be paid to these present appellants, and there are no elements of estoppel here, because Drahs took his mortgage having knowledge of the true state of the title, or the means of acquiring it. If the affirmance of the judgment works any injustice to the appellants, we see no way, under the law, to prevent it. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SILVERIA v. IVERSON et al. (S. F. 1,153.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1899.)

MASTER'S LIABILITY—JUDGMENT—AMENDMENT.

1. It being the duty of the owners of a vessel, to one employed by them thereon to do any services that he might be called upon to do, to supply a good reefing pennant; and he, through their failure to do so, having been injured while reefing the sail as directed, they are liable, whether or not their failure was due to negligence.

2. Error cannot be predicated of the fact that judgment was first rendered against all of defendants, and afterwards amended by striking out the name of O., where it can be presumed, in support of the judgment, that O. was not served with summons, and did not appear; that, on motion of plaintiff, the action was dismissed as to him, and that plaintiff properly proceeded against the other defendants, as provided in Code Civ. Proc. § 414; and that O. was improperly included in the judgment by mistake or inadvertence of the clerk.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by William Silveria against Niels Iverson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Gunnison, Booth & Bartnett (H. W. Hutton, of counsel), for appellants. F. J. Castelhun, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. Appeal by defendants from a judgment in favor of plaintiff. Defendants did not interpose any demurrer, but the main point which they now make for a reversal is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. It is averred in the complaint that plaintiff was employed by defendants, who were the owners of a certain coasting schooner, called the "Ocean Spray," to cook on said schooner, and to perform such other services as the captain of the vessel might call on him to perform; that "it was the duty of the defendants to provide said schooner with good, safe, and strong ropes, tackle, and sailing apparatus, but that the defendants, disregarding their duty in that behalf, provided and used an old, worn-out, rotten, and defective reefing pennant with which to reef the mainsail, of which they had notice"; that on a certain named day, "while plaintiff, in obedience to the orders of the captain of the said schooner, was assisting in reefing the mainsail in the usual and proper way, by pulling at the reefing pennant in the usual and proper way, the said reefing pennant broke"; that, when the pennant broke, plaintiff was upon the roof of the cabin, which was the usual and proper place for him to be when doing said work; and that "when the said reefing pennant broke, as above stated, plaintiff fell backwards from the roof of the cabin, a distance of about six feet, striking the deck with his right shoulder," whereby his shoulder was dislocated, and other injuries were done to him, which are specifically described.

Appellants assail the complaint mainly on the ground that it contains no express averment of negligence; that is, that the word "negligently," or some equivalent word or phrase, is not used in the complaint. Waiving the fact that the answer contains merely denials of the averments of the complaint, and that in support of the judgment it must be presumed that the case was tried as if the averments were sufficient, our opinion is that, at least in the absence of a special demurrer, the complaint states a sufficient cause of action. It is true that in certain cases, where the facts stated do not constitute a cause of action unless done negligently, it must be averred that they were so done, unless the facts themselves necessarily exclude any hypothesis other than that of negligence. But in the case at bar the facts alleged do themselves constitute a cause of action. From the averred relation of the parties, it was the duty of appellants, as averred, to supply a good reefing pennant; and not having done so, and by reason thereof the respondent having been injured, the appellants were liable for damages, whether the wrongful act was the result of negligence, or intention, or other cause. The facts alleged constitute a cause of action. The defect in the pennant is sufficiently stated, and it is sufficiently averred that this caused the injury to respondent.

2. There were four named defendants,—Iverson, Gerdau, and Lassen, who were served and appeared and answered, and Omundsen, who did not appear, and as to whom there is no evidence of service; and appellants contend that the judgment should be reversed because, as they say, it was first rendered against all four, and was afterwards amended by striking out the name of Omundsen. Counsel, to some extent, argue this point as if there were a bill of exceptions showing exactly what occurred with respect to this matter; but there is nothing before us except the judgment roll, which contains merely the pleadings, the verdict, and the judgment. The judgment has a reference to Omundsen, from which, perhaps, we may conclude that appellants are warranted in claiming that it was first rendered against all four of the defendants, and afterwards amended by striking out the name of Omundsen; but, granting this, it may be presumed, in support of the judgment, that Omundsen was not served with summons, and did not appear; that on motion of plaintiff the action was dismissed as to him, and that plaintiff properly proceeded against the other defendants, as provided in section 414, Code Civ. Proc.; and that Omundsen was improperly included in the judgment by mistake or inadvertence of the clerk. Under such circumstances, the judgment against Omundsen was a nullity on its face, and appellants were in no way prejudiced by the amendment. It was proper for the court to strike out the name of Omundsen, and, if it had not done so, this court, on appeal, would have ordered the amendment. Alpers v. Schammel, 75 Cal. 590, 17 Pac. 708. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

WOOD v. JORDAN. (S. F. 1588.)

JUDGMENTS—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

Judgment foreclosing the lien of a street assessment cannot be collaterally attacked, personal service of defendants in the action to foreclose having been had, and they having appeared and contested the action and the validity of the assessments, and having failed to appeal, the court having thus had jurisdiction over the person and subject-matter.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Abbie Rose Wood, administratrix of Joseph M. Wood, deceased, against James C. Jordan. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appealed. Affirmed.

Charles F. Hanlon, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Joseph M. Wood in his lifetime commenced this action against James C. Jordan. Upon his death while the action was pending, his administratrix was substituted as plaintiff in his place. The action was to quiet title. Plaintiff claimed both by record title and by prescription. He was successful under his first claim, and unsuccessful as to the second. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from the order denying him a new trial.

Plaintiff's record title comes from the sale by the sheriff and his subsequent deed upon foreclosure of certain liens for street assessment upon the land in question. Defendant's title comes by mesne conveyance from the owner of the lands affected by the actions to foreclose the street assessment, the deeds having been made after judgments in the foreclosure suits. The attack upon plaintiff's title is based upon the contention that the judgments in the foreclosure suits were void because of asserted irregularities in the assessments which were the foundations of the actions. In the actions to foreclose the lien of the street assessments, personal service of the defendants was had. They appeared and contested the action and the validity of the assessments, were defeated, and failed to appeal. The court thus had jurisdiction over the person and over the subject-matter, and its decree was a finality. It is in the exercise of the taxing power that street assessment liens are imposed upon the land of the property owner. "Jurisdiction being obtained over the person and over the subject-matter, no error in its exercise can make the judgment void. The authority to decide being shown, it cannot be divested by being improperly or incorrectly employed. * * * The same rules apply to actions to recover delinquent taxes as in other cases in respect to collateral attacks. It cannot be shown to avoid the effect of such judgments that the taxes were previously paid. Neither will such judgment be in the least affected because it appears from the judgment roll that the assessment was illegal and void." Freem. Judgm. § 135. The conclusiveness of judgments, and their freedom from collateral attack, have been directly held to apply to judgments for the foreclosure of street assessments. Mayo v. Ah Loy, 32 Cal. 477; People v. Doe, 36 Cal. 220; Eitel v. Foote, 39 Cal. 439; Mayo v. Foley, 40 Cal. 281; Crall v. Poso Irr. Dist., 87 Cal. 140, 26 Pac. 797. See, also, Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 391. The judgments which were the foundations of the sheriff's deeds in question were certainly not void, and, whatever may be the alleged errors, they may not be reviewed upon this collateral attack. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

DISMISSAL OF ACTION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 581, providing that an action may be dismissed by plaintiff, provided a counterclaim has not been made or affirmative relief sought by defendant, does not prevent such dismissal of action to quiet title, though the answer asserts title in defendant, denies plaintiff's right of possession, alleges an ouster by plaintiff, and prays for a decree establishing defendant's title and enjoining plaintiff from asserting any claim to the land or interfering with the possession.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Abbie R. Wood, administratrix of J. M. Wood, against James C. Jordan. From an order refusing to vacate the judgment of dismissal, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles F. Hanlon, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. An action was brought by the plaintiff to quiet his title to certain pieces of land in the city and county of San Francisco, plaintiff alleging that he was in possession. Upon his death his administratrix was substituted in his place. Defendant answered asserting title in himself, denying plaintiff's right of possession, alleging an ouster by plaintiff of defendant's possession, and concluding with a prayer for a decree establishing his title, and enjoining plaintiff from asserting any claim to the land, or interfering in any manner with the possession thereof. Thereafter plaintiff procured a dismissal of the action, and a judgment of dismissal was duly given. Defendant then moved to vacate the judgment of dismissal, and from the order of the court refusing so to do he prosecutes this appeal. He insists that by his answer he seeks affirmative relief, and that under section 581, subd. 1, Code Civ. Proc., it was erroneous for the court, under these circumstances, to dismiss the action. But this contention has been definitely settled against him in Moyle v. Porter, 51 Cal. 639. The order appealed from is affirmed.

KNOWLES v. CROCKER ESTATE CO. et al. (S. F. 1,037.)¹

FORCEFUL ENTRY—COMPLAINT—POSSESSION—DEMURRER FOR UNCERTAINTY.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1172, requiring plaintiff in action for forcible entry to prove that he was "peaceably in the actual possession at the time of the forcible entry," a complaint alleging that "plaintiff was in the peaceable and undisturbed possession" is defective, as not alleging actual possession, as distinguished from constructive possession.

2. Where a complaint in action for forcible entry, alleging that "plaintiff was in the peaceable and undisturbed possession" at the time of the entry, is defective, in not alleging actual possession, the defect is sufficiently taken advantage of by a special demurrer on the ground of uncertainty, in that it cannot be ascertained from the complaint "what was the character of the alleged possession of plaintiff of the property described."

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county.

Action by Frank S. Knowles against the Crocker Estate Company and others. Demurrer to complaint was overruled, and judgment rendered for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Morrison, Foerster & Cope and George C. Ross, for appellants. B. B. Newman and E. F. Fitzgerald, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action founded on an alleged forcible entry upon real property, and also a forcible detainer thereof. In the first count of the complaint it is alleged, among other things, that on November 16, 1896, plaintiff was in the peaceable and undisturbed possession of certain described lands, and that while he was so in possession the defendants, with force, etc., entered thereon, and "in a forcible manner ejected plaintiff and put him out of said real property," and broke down his fences inclosing the same. In the second count of the complaint, plaintiff repeats by reference the allegations of the first, and further avers that since the said forcible entry the defendants, by force and menaces and threats of violence, have held, and yet hold, possession of the land aforesaid. Defendants demurred to each count of the complaint on the grounds that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and for uncertainty, in that it cannot be ascertained therefrom "what was the character of the alleged possession of plaintiff of the property described." The court overruled the demurrer, and, upon the subsequent trial of the cause, rendered judgment in plaintiff's favor for restitution of the premises with treble damages.

The only question of moment made by defendants on appeal concerns the ruling of the court on the demurrer. They urge that the first count of the complaint was bad, for that it does not allege actual possession by the plaintiff at the time of the forcible entry. The statute requires that plaintiff shall prove, in actions of this nature, that he was "peaceably in the actual possession at the time of the forcible entry, or was entitled to the possession at the time of the forcible detainer." Code Civ. Proc. § 1172. And there is no doubt that in the proceeding for a forcible entry, as in the first cause of action of the complaint here, the plaintiff must show by his pleading that he was in actual possession of the property when it was invaded by the defendant, since it is intrusion upon actual possession, as distinguished from constructive, for which the statute was designed to afford a summary remedy. Cummins v. Scott, 23 Cal. 526; More v. Del Valle, 28 Cal. 170; Voll v. Hollis, 60 Cal. 573, 574; Ely v. Yore, 71 Cal. 130, 11 Pac. 868. This complaint is unquestionably a defective pleading. Whether it is so radically defective as to be open to successful attack upon general demurrer, or whether it may be said that, by way of argument and inference, it contains averments sufficient to pass a general demurrer, need not here be decided; for we think it beyond question that the ground of special demurrer was well taken, and the amendment to the complaint which must follow the sustaining of the special demurrer should relieve the pleading from the defect complained of under the general demurrer.

The ground of special demurrer, as above pointed out, was that the complaint was uncertain, in that it could not be ascertained therefrom "what was the character of the alleged possession of plaintiff of the property described." It may be conceded that the phrase "character of possession" is in itself one of doubtful import. Still, it is a sufficient specification of the ground of uncertainty, if it fairly directs the mind of the pleader to the vulnerable point in his complaint. The law requires that the possession shall be actual. This characteristic of plaintiff's possession is essential to his right to maintain such an action, and we think no pleader could justly say that such a specification was insufficient to put him upon notice that his complaint was assailed for insufficiency or uncertainty in this regard. The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to sustain the special demurrer to the complaint, with leave to plaintiff to amend.

1. A remark made by the court, on rejecting evidence offered by plaintiffs, that he could see the dilemma plaintiffs were in, and wished to give them all the latitude possible, but did not see the materiality of the testimony offered, was not reversible error, as, in effect, telling the jury that plaintiffs had no case.

2. On an issue of implied contract of a landowner to pay for a well, evidence of the capacity of the well, and of the amount of stock on the place, and of the fact that crops were being raised where none were raised before, is immaterial.

3. Evidence that a tenant did not think he was liable to pay for the boring of a well on the premises is not admissible against the landlord to show that he was liable therefor.

Action by Bradbury & Caylor against John McHenry and another. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

O'Brien, O'Brien & O'Brien, for appellants. John Flourory, for respondents.

COOPER, C. This action was brought by plaintiffs to recover of defendants the sum of $2,034.45, alleged to be due upon an express contract for services rendered and material furnished in boring for defendants an artesian well. The facts as to the boring of the well and the value of the services and material were not controverted. The premises on which the well was bored belonged at all the times referred to in the complaint to the defendant Nellie McHenry, who is the wife of defendant John McHenry, but were leased to, and in the possession of, one James McHenry and Philip L. Wooster, partners under the name of Wooster & McHenry. James McHenry was a brother of defendant John McHenry. It was claimed by defendants that the well was bored at the request of, and under a contract with, the firm of Wooster & McHenry, and that defendants had nothing to do with the employment of plaintiffs in any manner. The question was as to whether plaintiffs' contract was with defendants, as contended by plaintiffs, or with the firm of Wooster & McHenry. It was established without contradiction that, prior to the commencement of the present suit, the plaintiffs commenced an action against the firm of Wooster & McHenry by filing a verified complaint, alleging that the amount now claimed was due from said firm of Wooster & McHenry upon an express contract. An affidavit for attachment was made in said last-named action by Bradbury, one of the present plaintiffs, in which he swore the amount was due and owing from Wooster & McHenry upon an express contract. After said last-named action was commenced against said Wooster & McHenry, they filed a petition in insolvency, and the plaintiffs dismissed the said action. The evidence on the part of the defendants in this case was to the effect that they made no contract with plaintiffs, did not employ them, and had nothing to do with having the well bored. The case was tried before a jury, and verdict for defendants. Judgment was thereupon rendered. Motion for a new trial made and denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and order. The instructions given to the jury are not in the record, and plaintiffs' counsel admit that there is sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict.

The contention here is that prejudicial error was committed by the court below in the rejection of testimony and in certain remarks made by the court in the presence of the jury. While the witness Wooster (a member of the firm of Wooster & McHenry) was being examined on behalf of plaintiffs, in rebuttal, he stated that he remembered the fact of going to the well about the time it was being completed, and there seeing a band of hogs, and the witness was asked by plaintiffs' counsel if the hogs were represented to him as belonging to the farm. The testimony was objected to as being incompetent, immaterial, and not in rebuttal. The court sustained the objection, and counsel for plaintiffs then made a statement of certain facts which he offered to prove by the witness, and, among other facts, "a general course of conduct on the part of James McHenry showing that James McHenry did not himself regard the firm of Wooster & McHenry as the parties liable to pay for the well." The court thought the evidence not in rebuttal or material, and in ruling upon the question said: "I can see the dilemma the plaintiffs are in. I wish to give them all the latitude I possibly can, but I don't see what figure this testimony would cut in the case." It is claimed that the above remark was highly prejudicial to the plaintiffs, and that it was the equivalent of telling the jury that the plaintiffs had no case. While it would have been better for the judge to have refrained from making the remark, we do not think it such error as would justify a reversal. It was not an opinion upon any question of fact or upon the credibility of any witness. It was in the nature of an explanation to plaintiffs' counsel as to why the court desired to be liberal towards them. It is presumed that the jury were fully and properly instructed as to the law of the case, and that they acted upon the instructions given them as applied to the facts. It would seem to us that to presume that this remark might have influenced the jury, and caused them to disregard the law, would be to attach an imaginary and unnecessary meaning to the remark, and, further, that it would reflect upon the jury as not being men of ordinary intelligence. The case of McMinn v. Whelan, 27 Cal. 320, cited by counsel, presents quite a different question. In that case the character of a witness for plaintiff was called in question during the trial by the defendant on cross-examination. The court, in overruling an objection to the cross-examination, said "that the witness was one of the most respectable women in the neighborhood." While this court held the remark to have been highly improper, it refused to reverse the case, because it did not depend in any material degree upon the testimony of the witness whose character was thus indorsed by the judge. If the court below should give an opinion as to the weight of evidence, or as to the character of either of the parties, or of a material witness, we would not hesitate to condemn such course, but in this case we cannot say that the remark injured the plaintiffs' cause before the jury.

It is claimed that the court erred in sustaining objections to many questions asked by plaintiffs' counsel for the purpose of showing that the well was a great benefit to defendants' land; its capacity in the way of furnishing water; that before it was placed there defendants could not raise a crop on the place. The court below, in ruling upon the admissibility of the evidence, said that the plaintiffs would be allowed to show that the defendants accepted the well and were using it, but that the evidence as to the capacity of the well, and the fact of crops being now raised where none were raised before, was immaterial, and not competent evidence to bind the defendants. We think the ruling correct. The complaint averred an express contract, and, conceding that evidence of an implied contract was admissible, the offered evidence was not competent. The capacity of the well placed upon the property of defendants by their lessees, and the benefit it might be to the property, are not facts tending to show an implied contract. If the value of the well was a fact in issue, then its character and capacity might tend to throw light upon such issue; but it seems to us that if the court had allowed evidence as to the number of hogs upon the ranch, the capacity of the well, and the effect it had upon crops, it would not even tend to show an implied contract on the part of these defendants.

We do not think the questions asked by plaintiffs' counsel of the witness Wooster were material or in rebuttal. They were asked for the purpose of showing that the witness, while a partner of James McHenry, understood that his firm, Wooster & McHenry, was not responsible for the boring of the well. To prove that some other party was not responsible would not tend to show that defendants were responsible.

It is argued by plaintiffs that the court erred in sustaining defendants' objection to plaintiffs' question to the witness Wooster. The witness was asked if the McHenry brothers had ever been in partnership. The question was objected to upon the ground that it was immaterial and not in rebuttal. The question was subject to both objections. It was not in rebuttal, as no witness had testified either way as to any partnership between the McHenry brothers, and, if there had been such testimony, the fact is wholly immaterial. It would not tend to prove a contract on the part of these defendants to pay for the well, as alleged in the complaint. Many other similar errors in rulings are assigned, but none of them require special notice. They all depend upon the principles and rulings herein discussed, and we find no error in the record of sufficient importance to justify a reversal of the case. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

LAMPE v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 982.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1899.)

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Dissenting opinion. For opinion of majority, see 57 Pac. 461.

BEATTY, C. J. Having dissented from the order denying a rehearing of this case, I wish to state that my reason for so doing is that this opportunity for reviewing, and if possible reconciling, a series of apparently conflicting decisions upon a question of vital importance, should not be lost. This case, in my opinion, is in conflict with Eachus v. Railway Co., 103 Cal. 614, 37 Pac. 750, as that was in conflict with Corcoran v. City of Benicia, 96 Cal. 1, 30 Pac. 798. In the Corcoran Case, as in this case, it was held that the plaintiff had no right of action. In the Eachus Case it was held that he did have a right of action, and if, as I contend, the three cases are all governed by the same principle, it is time that the court should plainly declare what the rule is with respect to the right to damages in all cases, or what the distinction is between the two classes of cases, if there is a distinction.

It is held that the owner of a low lot, flooded with surface water by the grading of a street, is entitled to no compensation for the damage. At the same time it is held that the owner of a high lot, made difficult of access by lowering the surface of the street to bring it to the established grade, is entitled to damages. Why this difference? It is the established law of California that the owner of higher land has an easement for the natural discharge of surface water upon the lower land adjoining, and the right of access to one's land over a highway is but an easement. The two rights, although not identical, are of the same nature, and are equally entitled to be protected from unlawful invasion. Why is it, then, that a city may with impunity destroy one right by bringing a street to the established grade, when for infringing the other right by doing the same thing it must make compensation? This is a question which has not been answered thus far, but it is a question for which an answer ought to be found, if such opposite rules of decision are to prevail. The only substantial reason ever assigned for denying compensation to the owner of a low lot flooded with surface water by raising a street to the established grade is that he acquires his lot with knowledge that the city has power to establish a grade for its streets, to which the surface of the lots must be made to conform; and this reason applies with as much force to the lowering of the natural surface as to the raising of it, and to any consequential injury from either cause. If it is a good reason for denying damages to the owner of the low lot for flooding, it is equally conclusive against any allowance of damages to the owner of the high lot by making it inconvenient of access. Whatever the rule is, it ought to be the rule for every like case.

BROWN v. McKAY. (S. F. 986.)¹

ADVERSE POSSESSION—INTENT.

A father caused himself to be appointed guardian for his two minor sons, who had inherited from their mother an undivided two-thirds interest in one tract and an undivided half interest in another; being also their tenant in common. He managed the property until his death, and theretofore, when one son had come of age, he leased the latter tract to him. In his will he devised his one-third interest in the former tract to the sons. All parties had always been friendly. Held, that the father did not hold either tract adversely to the sons, beyond his own interest.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by James D. Brown, as assignee of the estate of Angus McKay, an insolvent debtor, and as assignee of said debtor for the benefit of his creditors, against Angus McKay. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Bartholomew Noyes and G. R. Lukens, for appellant. W. S. Goodfellow, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action of ejectment brought by the assignee in insolvency against the defendant, Angus McKay, who was also the insolvent debtor. The facts are these: Mrs. Mary A. McKay, wife of David McKay, died in 1859, leaving two sons,—this defendant, Angus McKay, and David McKay, Jr.; this defendant then being of the age of 5 years, and David being still younger. At the time of her death she was the owner of a piece of property in the city of San Francisco described in this record as the "Dupont Street Property," and she also possessed a community interest in the piece of property here designated as the "Davis Street Property." As heirs at law of their mother, an undivided one-third of the Dupont street property passed to each of the sons, and likewise an undivided one-fourth of the Davis street property. In 1883 defendant, Angus McKay, was adjudged an insolvent debtor, and his estate was administered upon, the debtor was discharged from his debts, and thereafter the then assignee died. No part of the real estate here mentioned was included in the assets of the insolvent's estate. In 1894 David McKay, the father, died, leaving a will. Upon his death it first came to the knowledge of the sons that, as heirs of their mother, they became the owners of the aforesaid interests in the two described tracts of land. Thereupon, pending the administration upon the father's estate, Angus McKay took out letters of administration upon his mother's estate; and this property, under such administration, was finally distributed to the sons in the proportions aforesaid. Thereafter this plaintiff was appointed assignee in the insolvency proceedings to succeed his dead predecessor, and now seeks by ejectment to recover the possession of defendant's interest in the land inherited by him from his mother. The only defense made to this action is the plea of the statute of limitations; defendant now claiming that his father, prior to his death, obtained title to the property here involved, by adverse possession. The trial court declared the facts in accordance with this claim, and rendered judgment for defendant. This appeal is taken from that judgment, and also from the order denying a motion for a new trial.

Upon a careful examination of the record, the court has arrived at the conclusion that the facts to support the claim of adverse possession in the father are too meager to accomplish that result. The case, in its facts, upon the question of adverse possession, is a peculiar one, viewed from various standpoints. It is peculiar in this: Defendant, Angus McKay, during the period dating from his mother's death (1859) to his father's death (1894),—the period in which the adverse possession must have been created,—never knew that he owned an interest in this real estate. Again, in this litigation he is relying upon an adverse possession against himself, created by his father. In other words, he is relying upon title in himself as the heir of his father, who, he claims, secured title to this property by adverse possession against him; and he makes such claim in face of the fact that he administered upon his mother's estate after his father's death, claiming throughout those proceedings that the property here involved was her property, and passed to him by reason of his heirship. But, however interesting these novelties may be, they are not determinative of the case, and we pass to the facts upon which the claim of adverse possession in the father is based.

Eo instante upon the mother's death, in 1859, the father and the sons became tenants in common of these two parcels of land. As has been stated, the defendant was then about 5 years of age, and his brother younger. In 1861 the father, David McKay, filed a petition in the probate court setting forth that his two sons held undivided interests in these two parcels of land as heirs of their mother, and asked to be appointed guardian of their estates. The court made the order of appointment, and the record of the proceeding here ends. The defendant became of age in 1875, and prior to that time there is not a particle of evidence tending to show any adverse claim to this property made by the father against his minor sons. He simply cared for the property, and that was all. He paid the taxes, he collected the rents, he insured the property, and he made the repairs. No one of these acts in any way or degree is inconsistent with his position as a tenant in common, especially in view of the fact that his minor sons were his cotenants. As substantially settling the question in favor of the title of the minors during their minority, the father's declaration in his petition for letters of guardianship may be cited. After the arrival of the defendant at years of majority, we find but a single additional circumstance tending in any way to support the theory of the defendant that the father's intentions towards his title were hostile, and this is but a trifle. During the years from 1877 to 1883 the father leased to the defendant the Davis street property at the monthly rental of $100 per month. This circumstance, conceding it material as to the Davis street property, is wholly immaterial as to the Dupont street property. Upon the other hand, taking all the facts of the case together, it is incredible that the father of these two boys, before or after their arrival at the age of majority, ever intended to gain title to this property from them by adverse possession. Hostile intent of the party in possession is all important in such a case, and we feel safe in saying there is no hostile intent manifested here. We have the express declaration of the father in 1861 that he had no such intent, and his conduct thereafter is entirely consistent with such declarations. During this whole period, extending up to the very day of his death, the relations of David McKay, Sr., with his boys, were of the most friendly character. This is shown by the fact that the defendant acted as his agent during his absence in the collection of rents; that the son David was appointed executor of his last will and testament; that the father advised and counseled with the defendant during his pecuniary embarrassments, and assisted him in the preparation of his petition in insolvency; that under his will, as evidenced by the decree of distribution, he devised in equal shares to his two sons his undivided one-third interest in the Dupont street property. These things show the friendly relations existing between the father and the sons, and the utter improbability that any intent ever existed in the mind of the father at any moment of time to supplant the title of his sons in these lands by a title of his own under a claim of adverse possession. As an additional consideration looking to this conclusion, it may be said that the father was half a millionaire, as shown by the inventory and appraisal of his estate, while the interest of the defendant in these two lots is appraised at the sum of $4,000. There is a further consideration which strongly impresses the court with the conclusion that McKay, Sr., never claimed title to the interest of his sons in this property. By the inventory and appraisalment filed in his estate, his interest in the Dupont street lot is described as an undivided one-third thereof, and by the decree of distribution an undivided one-third of said Dupont street lot is distributed to the two sons in equal shares. For some reason, not understood by the court, the will of David McKay, Sr., is not in the record; but, in view of the inventory and appraisalment and the decree of distribution, it is evident that David McKay, by his will, did not attempt to dispose of the entire Dupont street property, but only attempted to dispose of an undivided one-third interest therein. Such disposition of his property by his will is wholly inconsistent with a claim of title in him to the entire tract, and it is almost conclusive evidence that he never at any time made such claim. This being the status of the Dupont street lot, we safely assume that, if he made no claim of title in himself to that property, he likewise made no claim to the Davis street property. All presumptions of law, of fact, and of good morals are against an adverse holding in a case possessing the facts of this case; and, to overcome those presumptions, there must be a showing by the record of clear, direct, and unequivocal acts upon the part of the adverse holder indicating an intention to claim the property as his own. Such a case is not made out by this record. It may be further suggested that the case disclosed by the record is not one of conflicting evidence. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

GLUECK et al. v. SCHELD. (Sac. 472.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1899.)

NEGLIGENCE—FIREARMS.

1. While defendant was repairing a pistol, it was discharged, and an onlooker, standing 150 feet away, was killed. Defendant knew that the weapon was loaded, that it was being handled in a manner likely to discharge it, and that it was pointed in the general direction of the bystander. Held, that a finding of negligence was justified.

2. Defendant had been shooting at a target 135 feet away, and an onlooker stood 40 feet to one side of the target, in spite of a warning of danger. While defendant was repairing his pistol, it was accidentally discharged, and the bystander was killed. Held, that deceased was not guilty of contributory negligence.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Action by Johanna Glueck and others against Adolph P. Scheld. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Hart and A. M. Johnson, for appellant. Isaac Joseph, T. J. Crowley, and F. C. Castelhun, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. The widow and children of Frederick Glueck, deceased, have brought this action against defendant to recover damages for his death, which occurred under the following state of facts: Defendant and a friend were firing at a target with pistols at a distance of about 135 feet, and near the home of Glueck. He was standing at a right angle from the target and defendant, and some 40 feet distant from the target, and 150 feet distant from defendant, observing the firing. Defendant's pistol became disarranged, and while holding it upon his knee, and in the act of repairing the defect, it was fired, and the ball struck and killed deceased, Glueck. The pistol was pointed in the general direction of Glueck at this time. The evidence is sufficient to indicate that fact, especially so when the sad results of the shot are considered. Upon this state of facts, were the jury justified in holding defendant pecuniarily liable? The true solution of this question is dependent upon the propositions, viz.: Was the defendant guilty of negligence, and, if so, was the deceased guilty of such contributory negligence as would release defendant from liability? Appellant's counsel contend with but little zeal that defendant was not guilty of negligence. A party who is engaged in manipulating a loaded pistol in the presence of other people should use great care in such manipulation; and the fact that this pistol was pointed in the general direction of the deceased, with knowledge of defendant that it was loaded, and with the further knowledge by him of the location of the deceased at that time, and in view of the further fact that it was being manipulated in a manner which was likely to cause it to be fired, are matters which, taken together, are amply sufficient to stamp the conduct of the defendant as negligent to a great degree. In the statement of the foregoing facts we give them in line with the verdict of the jury. Under the evidence, the jury were justified in finding these facts as we have summarized them, and upon such a finding they were authorized in saying that defendant did not exercise that care in handling his pistol which the law demands. Was the deceased guilty of contributory negligence? Much is said by defendant's counsel regarding the dangerous position occupied by deceased when shot, to the effect that he was but 40 feet from the target, and had been warned that his position was a dangerous one, and advised to change it. If deceased had been killed when defendant was firing at the target, by reason of a spent ball, or a poor aim, or a premature discharge of his pistol, these claims would have weight. But we do not see that they have anything to do with the case under existing circumstances. It would seem that the firing at the target is almost a false quantity. The deceased was not killed by reason of his proximity to the target; and thus his position of danger, if it was a dangerous one, did not contribute to the accident. Perchance before the firing at the target had been resumed he would have changed his position. In its simplest form the case seems to be that deceased was standing about 150 feet distant from defendant, who was manipulating a loaded pistol. At this time the pistol was accidentally discharged by reason of this manipulation, and deceased was killed by the shot. Under these circumstances, the jury were entirely justified in finding deceased was not guilty of negligence by reason of being at the point where killed. In other words, the jury had the right to say, from the evidence, that his position at the moment of time when he was killed was not in itself a dangerous one. The law of the case was properly presented to the jury. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

BARNHART v. EDWARDS et al. (Sac. 469.)

JUDGMENT — MODIFICATION — RESTITUTION — STAY — INTEREST — MORTGAGES — SALE.

1. Findings of fact were filed, and judgment was entered thereon, and afterwards, pursuant to the direction of the supreme court, the findings were corrected by reducing the amount of the recovery, and a new judgment was entered for the correct principal sum, with interest from date. Held, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1035, requiring the clerk to include in the judgment entered up by him any interest on the "decision" from the time it was made, that plaintiff was entitled to interest from the time the original findings were filed.

2. A foreclosure sale will not be set aside on a modification of the decree merely by reducing the amount of the recovery.

3. No property is lost in such case, within Code Civ. Proc. § 957, authorizing the appellate court, on modifying a judgment, to make restitution of property lost by the erroneous judgment.

4. An appeal from a judgment deprives it of all effect as the basis of any action of the court dependent thereon.

5. The court cannot stay a judgment by reason of anything that could have been considered before it was entered.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Action by H. Barnhart against R. L. Edwards and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order vacating a sale thereunder and staying execution thereof, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. A. Louttit and Minor & Ashley, for appellant. P. J. Hazen and Nicol & Orr, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. 1. Upon the trial of this cause the court found that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment in his favor in the sum of $7,668.12, and that the same was a lien upon the lands described in the complaint, and directed a sale thereof. The findings of fact were filed March 16, 1895, and judgment thereon entered March 18, 1895. An appeal from the judgment was dismissed by this court March 6, 1896 (111 Cal. 428, 44 Pac. 160), and the remittitur thereon filed in the superior court April 22, 1896. Upon an appeal from the order denying a new trial, this court made an order, December 28, 1896, directing the superior court to deduct certain items from the amount which it found due to the plaintiff, with whatever interest had been allowed for those items, and to make a corresponding amendment of its conclusions of law, and added: "The order denying a new trial will thereupon be affirmed. Judgment will then be entered in accordance with the findings thus corrected." After receiving the remittitur containing this direction, the superior court, upon motion of the respondent herein, made an order, September 13, 1897, correcting its finding of fact by deducting therefrom the sum of $2,109.43,—the amount of said items and interest thereon,—and amended its conclusion of law to read as follows, viz.: "That plaintiff is entitled to judgment against defendant R. L. Edwards, as administrator of the estate of E. C. Vancil, deceased, in the sum of $5,558.69; that said sum is a valid, existing lien upon the lands and premises in plaintiff's complaint described, and is secured by the mortgage mentioned in said complaint." On the same day the court caused to be entered a "corrected judgment and decree," reciting therein that, having "corrected its findings and amended its conclusions of law" as directed by this court, it "proceeds to enter judgment in accordance with the findings as thus corrected," and thereupon ordered and decreed a sale of the mortgaged premises, and that out of the proceeds of said sale the sheriff pay to the plaintiff the sum of $5,558.69, "the amount now due for principal and interest upon the said debt and mortgage in the complaint and findings mentioned, with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from the date of this decree." From the judgment thus entered an appeal was taken by the plaintiff September 15, 1897. The direction of this court for the entry of judgment in accordance with the findings as corrected had reference to the ultimate act to be performed by the superior court, but did not prescribe the judgment which it should enter. The form of the judgment, including its various provisions, was left to the judgment of that court, to be exercised with due regard to preserving and protecting the rights of the several parties thereto under appropriate and established principles of equity. If any change in the relation of the parties to the judgment or to the property involved therein had supervened pending the appeal, and was brought to the notice of the court, it was proper for it to adapt its judgment to such change, so far as would be consistent with the rights of others and with recognized rules of procedure. Section 1035, Code Civ. Proc., requires the clerk to include in the judgment entered up by him "any interest on the verdict or decision of the court from the time it was rendered or made." The "decision" of the superior court in the present case was made March 16, 1895, the day on which it filed its findings of fact. There was no subsequent trial of the issues before the court, nor did it make or file any new findings of fact. Its action in correcting its original findings was not its "decision" upon the issues, but was an act performed under the direction of this court, and the correction of the findings, as well as the judgment to be entered thereon, would relate to the time when the findings were originally filed. Under the findings as thus corrected, there was due to the plaintiff March 16, 1895, upon the obligations secured by the mortgage, the sum of $5,558.69; and he was entitled to receive this amount, with interest thereon from that date at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. See Clark v. Dunnam, 46 Cal. 205. The recital in the judgment appealed from that the sum of $5,558.69 is "now due" upon the obligation—i. e. September 3, 1897, the date of its entry—is not in accordance with the findings, and the direction that the plaintiff shall receive interest on that sum from that date only is in contravention of the provisions of section 1035, Code Civ. Proc. The provisions of this section create a right to such interest in the party in whose favor the decision is made, and he is not to be deprived of that right because the court formulates the judgment to be entered by the clerk, instead of leaving it to the action of the clerk alone.

2. Upon the above-named appeal from the judgment of March 18, 1895, the appellant gave no undertaking to stay proceedings, and on December 14, 1895, the plaintiff caused the mortgaged lands to be sold in accordance with the judgment, and in June, 1896, after the time for redemption had expired, received a deed of conveyance therefor from the sheriff. October 13, 1897, the superior court made an order, upon the motion of the respondent herein,—to whom, prior to the commencement of the action, the original mortgagor had conveyed the lands subject to the mortgage,—vacating and setting aside the sale by the sheriff, and directing that he be restored to the possession of the premises so sold, and, further, that the plaintiff within 10 days thereafter account for the rents, issues, and profits received by him during the possession of the premises, the same to be applied in and credited to the judgment in his favor, and that until such accounting was had the execution of the judgment should be stayed. From this order the plaintiff has also appealed. No argument has been made or authority cited in support of the latter portion of this order, and we are not aware of any principle of law by which it can be sustained. The judgment under which the sale was made had never been vacated or set aside, and the dismissal of the appeal therefrom had the effect to affirm the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 955. The direction by this court, upon the appeal from the order denying a new trial, to deduct certain items from the amount found due to the plaintiff, rendered it incumbent upon the superior court to make its judgment correspond with such correction, and the further direction for the entry of judgment in accordance with such correction had the same effect. This was evidently the understanding of the respondent, since he stated in his notice of motion for an order modifying the judgment that by the judgment of this court the judgment of the superior court was "modified and directed to be modified." This court made no order setting aside or reversing the judgment appealed from, but its order was limited to a modification of the judgment in accordance with certain specific directions. The rule is well settled in this state that upon the reversal of a judgment a sale to the plaintiff of the defendant's property for the satisfaction of the judgment in whole or in part will be set aside. The reason for this rule is that, as the plaintiff's claim to have the property sold depends upon the judgment, the reversal of the judgment destroys this claim, and takes away all right to retain the defendant's property. The reason for the rule ceases, however, when a judgment directing the sale of specific property, as in the case of the foreclosure of a mortgage to satisfy a lien thereon, is afterwards modified on appeal by merely reducing the amount of the lien, without changing that portion which directs a sale of the property. In such a case, unless the defendant tenders to the plaintiff the amount which the judgment, as modified, declares he is entitled to receive from the sale of the lands, together with the costs incurred upon the original sale, it should be made to appear that there was some unfairness in the sale, or that the property would upon a resale bring a larger amount than at the first sale, before he could claim a right to have the sale set aside. Freem. Ex'ns, § 347; Jesup v. Bank, 15 Wis. 804. Section 957, Code Civ. Proc., authorizes the appellate court, upon its modification of a judgment, to make restitution of all property "lost" by the erroneous judgment, "so far as such restitution is consistent with protection of a purchaser of property at a sale ordered by the judgment." But, if the judgment directing a sale of property to satisfy a lien is modified by merely reducing the amount of the lien, it cannot be said from that fact alone that the appellant has "lost" any property, so as to authorize the sale to be set aside. See Yndart v. Den (Cal.) 57 Pac. 761.

The superior court was not authorized to make the order appealed from by reason of its action in causing the judgment of September, 1897, to be entered. The plaintiff had appealed from that judgment, and from the order directing its entry, prior to the making of this order, and thereby deprived the judgment of all effect as the basis of any action of the court dependent thereon. Moreover, the court would not have been authorized to stay the enforcement of this judgment upon a motion of the respondent by reason of anything that had occurred prior to its entry, and which could have been considered by the court before it was entered. The action of the court in entering the judgment of September 3, 1897, and its order of October 13, 1897, are reversed. The order for the correction of the findings is affirmed.

COOPER v. GORDON. (S. F. 1,030.)¹

DISMISSAL—WANT OF PROSECUTION—STIPULATION—APPEARANCE—ESTOPPEL.

1. An action commenced in April, 1883, in which summons was never issued, was dismissed in 1896, under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 7, authorizing dismissal on failure to make appearance within three years. On motion to vacate such judgment, it appeared that defendant had entered into a written stipulation that plaintiff could enter judgment at any time, and was granted a stay of execution on certain payments being made. This stipulation was thereafter renewed, with due credits allowed therein for payments made. Held, that the stipulation was sufficient appearance on the part of defendant to render judgment of dismissal unauthorized.

2. Where a stipulation, in an action in which defendant was not served, provides for entry of judgment by plaintiff whenever he might choose so to do for a certain amount, defendant is estopped from urging that plaintiff has declined to prosecute the action with due diligence, so as to authorize dismissal, after the lapse of three years, as limited by Code Civ. Proc. § 581.

3. Though a stipulation which has not been filed does not bind the party, when it is filed it becomes binding, and may then be used to show that a party has violated it, and as a basis of relief to the person who has been injured by trusting to it.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Archibald Cooper against Charles W. Gordon. Judgment for defendant. From an order vacating the same, he appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas W. Nowlin, for appellant. A. H. Carpenter, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This action was commenced on the 5th day of April, 1883, and summons was issued on the same day. The summons, so far as it appears, was never served on any of the defendants, and no return thereof was ever made or filed. The suit was to foreclose a chattel mortgage on a printing press and other contents of a printing office, given to secure an indebtedness of defendant Gordon, according to the terms of a promissory note, which is set out in the complaint. As to the other defendants, the complaint merely avers that they have, or claim to have, some interest in the property. So far as the records of the court disclosed, nothing further was done in the case until the 18th day of March, 1896, when, on motion of Thomas W. Nowlin, attorney, who appeared specially for the purpose, the suit was dismissed "pursuant to subdivision 7 of section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure." As nearly 13 years had elapsed since the taking out of summons, and nothing further appeared to have been done in the case, the order was eminently proper.

On the 1st day of May, 1896, one J. H. Harper, in the name of plaintiff and as his assignee, moved to vacate the order and judgment of dismissal on the ground that it was obtained by fraud and deceit, and through mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect on the part of plaintiff. On the hearing it was shown that on April 6, 1883, one day after suit was commenced, plaintiff and defendant entered into a written stipulation to the effect that plaintiff could enter judgment at any time in the action for a stipulated amount, but was to grant a stay of execution upon certain payments being made by Gordon; also that on the 26th day of March, 1885, Gordon again, in writing, stipulated with one George M. Wood, to whom the claim of plaintiff had been assigned, that he (Wood) could have judgment entered at any time for a sum stated. A stay of execution was also stipulated. On the 13th day of September, 1893, another stipulation was made in writing by Gordon and J. H. Harper, which recites that Harper had become the assignee of plaintiff, and stipulates that Harper may take judgment in the action at any time. The amount due is also stipulated, and also certain payments to be made, and a rate of interest less than that called for in the note. Defendant Gordon appeared in response to the motion, and read his own affidavit, which, however, contains nothing of consequence. The motion was granted, and the judgment was vacated on the ground that the stipulations referred to constitute an appearance in the action. The learned judge stated in an opinion included in the order vacating the judgment: "Section 581, Code Civ. Proc., does not require an appearance to be filed within three years. It merely requires an appearance to be 'made' within three years." He considered the stipulation that plaintiff could take judgment equivalent to notice of appearance, and said that notice differs from an answer or a demurrer because a pleading did not become such until filed, while the statute provided that the appearance is complete when plaintiff is notified, although the notice is not filed. And yet, if judgment is entered, the judgment roll must show that summons was served or that defendant has appeared. If appearance was only by notice to plaintiff, as provided in section 1014 of the Code of Civil Procedure, proof of that fact must be found in the judgment roll. Appearance provided in section 1014 is primarily for the purpose of entitling the defendant to notice of subsequent proceedings, where notice must be given, and for that purpose written notice served on plaintiff is sufficient; but the appearance of defendant is not thereby made in court. The Code is not altogether clear upon this subject. Section 406 provides that, "at any time within the year after complaint is filed, the defendant may in writing, or by appearing and answering, waive the issuing of summons." Apparently this is a declaration that the issuance and service of the summons can be waived in no other mode, and in section 416 it is enacted that the voluntary appearance of a defendant is equivalent to the service of summons. But in section 581, subd. 7, it is provided, apparently, that such appearance may be at any time within three years. But suppose a defendant were to appear and answer four years after the complaint was filed, and were then to demand a trial, objecting to a dismissal, although no summons had been issued and no previous appearance made; could the court then properly dismiss the action, against the protest of all parties? I think not. Section 581 is absolute in its terms, explicit, and comprehensive, but such result could not have been contemplated. It was to relieve defendants from the assertion of stale demands. Mostly, no doubt, it was aimed against those who asserted title to real estate merely to be bought off, and who were in the habit of commencing suits solely to prevent the statute of limitations from running. But even in such a case, where the defendant comes in and files an answer and demands a trial before the suit has been dismissed, I do not understand that the court must nevertheless dismiss the action without a trial. On the other hand, I think it would be error to do so. Nor is this absolutely inconsistent with the terms of the statute, which seems to give three years in which the court cannot dismiss, though no appearance has been made; after that, and until voluntary appearance has been made, the action may be dismissed as provided. But, if the parties consent, it is a case pending of which the court has jurisdiction, and there is no excuse for not trying it. The stipulation is, in effect, an answer admitting all the allegations of the complaint, with the statement that defendant has no defense. Had it been in words so stated, and the document had been filed, there could have been no question. A stipulation that defendant may take judgment is intended to be in lieu of such an answer.

But the stipulation was not filed within the three years, nor at any time before the case was actually dismissed. It was not filed until motion was made to set aside the judgment of dismissal on the ground that the stipulations themselves excused the neglect of the plaintiff to file them. If such neglect can be excused, they certainly do. Each stipulation leaves it to the plaintiff to apply for judgment whenever he might choose to do so, and each was given in consideration of favors granted defendant. He procured further time to pay his debt, with a reduction of the rate of interest and the use of the printing outfit in the meantime. In the last stipulation signed September 13, 1893, more than 10 years after the suit was commenced, it is recited that, "by consent of each and all of the above-named persons, judgment has not been rendered therein, but said action is still pending, in which the said Harper, as the assignee of said plaintiff, may and can, by reason of the stipulations heretofore made by said defendant, take judgment of foreclosure against said Gordon, and sell said property, at any time." Defendant is certainly estopped by this stipulation from urging the objection that the plaintiff has neglected to prosecute the action with due diligence. And it is also a consent to the entry of the appearance of the defendant and the entry of judgment after the lapse of the three years limited by law. Without such consent, it could not be done; but, as already said, where defendant expressly consents to the delay, I see no objection to it. It was not intended to limit the right of the parties so to stipulate. Parties may expressly waive most of the provisions designed for their benefit, and I see no reason why this should constitute an exception.

But it is said that stipulations that are not filed do not bind the parties. That is true, but when filed they do bind the parties, and may then be used to show that a party has violated his stipulation, and as the basis of relief to the person who has been injured by trusting to it. Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 279, 30 Pac. 529. The genuineness of the signatures to the stipulations are not denied, and are admitted for the purpose of the motion. We must presume that before entering judgment the court will require proper proof to be made both upon that matter and as to the amount for which plaintiff is entitled to judgment. The order is affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The opinion heretofore rendered in this case is modified to the following effect: The sentence, "The trial court admitted in evidence the declarations of Mrs. Milen and Mr. and Mrs. Dickman, made after the death of Dr. James, to the butcher, the baker, and the coal dealer, to the effect that Laura was engaged to be married to the doctor at the time of his death," is changed so as to read, "The trial court admitted in evidence the declarations of Mrs. Milen and Mr. and Mrs. Dickman, made after the death of Dr. James, to the butcher, the baker, and the coal dealer, not in the presence of Laura Milen, to the effect that Laura was engaged to be married to the doctor at the time of his death." WILSON v. NUGENT. (S. F. 1,002.)¹

MECHANIC'S LIEN—PAYMENT WITHOUT SUIT—NOTICE—MATERIALS FURNISHED UNDER EXPRESS CONTRACT—HAULING MATERIAL—USE IN CONSTRUCTION.

1. Where one who has retained 25 per cent. of the contract price for the repair of a building, after he has knowledge of the appointment of an assignee for the benefit of the contractor's creditors, and a demand made by him for the money retained, without any order of court or any judgment as to the validity of alleged liens, pays them, he pays them at his own risk, and, if they are not valid liens, he will be liable to the assignee for the amount paid.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, requiring that the notice of lien shall contain a statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of the contract under which materials were furnished, a statement in a notice that claimant was to receive the reasonable market value thereof when they were furnished, at a fixed price, is untrue, and no lien therefor is acquired.

3. One who is employed to haul slate to a building on which a roof is being repaired, and deliver it to the contractor, is not entitled to a mechanic's lien.

4. In an action to enforce a mechanic's lien for material furnished to a contractor, unless the court finds that the material furnished was furnished to be used, and was used, in the construction of the building, a judgment for the claimant cannot be sustained.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Daniel Wilson, assignee of Jefferson D. De Gear, insolvent, against Dennie F. Nugent. From an order denying a new trial, and a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Walter H. Linforth, for appellant. Peri E. Allen (T. M. Osmont, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action to recover $836. Judgment for defendant. Motion for new trial denied. This appeal is by the plaintiff from the judgment and order. On May 16, 1895, one De Gear entered into a written contract with defendant to roof St. Rose's Church for $3,344. The contract was in the usual form, and provided that 25 per cent., being the final payment, should be retained by defendant for 35 days after the completion of the contract. March 7, 1896, the contract was completed, and defendant made all the payments as he had agreed to do, except the 25 per cent. ($836), which he retained, under the terms of the contract, for the payment of any claims that might be valid liens against said building. On March 28, 1896, seven mechanics' liens were filed against said church, aggregating about the amount still in the hands of defendant. On April 11, 1896, said De Gear filed a petition in insolvency. The plaintiff was in due course elected assignee of said insolvent, and on April 24, 1896, an assignment of all the estate of said De Gear was made to plaintiff. After the said plaintiff had qualified as assignee, and prior to June 3, 1896, he notified defendant in writing of his election and qualification as assignee, and of his claim to the $836, and forbade its payment to any one else, other than plaintiff. On June 3, 1896, after defendant had knowledge of all these facts and of the claim of plaintiff to said money, and without any order of court, or any judgment as to the validity of any of said alleged liens, he paid them all, amounting with costs to more than the $836. It was admitted at the trial that, unless the defendant was released from liability to plaintiff by reason of the payment of the said alleged liens, the $836 was due and unpaid from the defendant to the plaintiff. At the time of the qualification of the plaintiff as assignee, the defendant was indebted to plaintiff as such assignee and legal representative of De Gear in said sum of $836, unless there were valid and existing liens against said fund or against the property of defendant; and, in order to satisfy which, defendant, in law, had the right to use said fund. Defendant did not owe the alleged lien claimants, as he had made no contract with them. The provision of the statute authorizing the owner to retain the 25 per cent. in order to pay off and discharge liens was designed both for the protection of the owner and of laborers, material men, and holders of valid liens. Subcontractors, laborers, and material men may look to the contractor alone, or, if they have any doubt as to his solvency, they may avail themselves of the statutory provisions as to filing and recording liens. If such liens are filed, the owner has the right to retain the amount in his hands for his own protection for the purpose of paying off and discharging such liens as may be valid, and to charge the amount so paid to the contractor. The defendant knew, at the time of paying this fund to the alleged lienholders, of the claim of plaintiff. While he had the right to use the fund in accordance with law to protect his property from valid liens, he could not himself pass upon their validity, except at his own peril. He could easily have protected himself by depositing the money in court, and let the court determine the validity of the liens and the rights of plaintiff. Lumber Co. v. Tolhurst, 99 Cal. 635, 34 Pac. 438. The findings are attacked on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to support them, and it becomes necessary to examine the evidence as to the validity of the liens. The statute requires that the notice of lien shall contain a statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of the contract. Code Civ. Proc. § 1187. This statement must not only be made, but it must be true. The notices of liens of Farnsworth & Ruggles, $44.81; James Young, $34.70; Pacific Metal Works, $271.90; Schrader & Lutge, $23.45; Thomas Alderson, $289.27; Dunham, Carrigan & Hayden Company, $84.27,—each stated, as a part of the terms, time given, and conditions of the contract, that claimant was to receive the reasonable market value of the materials so furnished. The uncontradicted evidence shows that the materials were furnished in each case to De Gear at a fixed price. This was fatal to the liens. The proof showed the notices of lien in each case to be untrue. In Reed v. Norton, 90 Cal. 590, 26 Pac. 767, and 27 Pac. 423, decided by this court in bank, it was held that where the notice of lien stated that the claimant was to be paid for the labor done and furnished at what it was reasonably worth, and the evidence showed that claimant had an express contract, the variance was fatal, and claimant could not recover. So in Wagner v. Hansen, 103 Cal. 104, 37 Pac. 195, the complaint alleged that the work was to be done at an agreed price, but the evidence showed no agreed price, and the variance was held to be fatal. It was there said: "The purpose of the record and statement must be to inform the owner, in case of a contractor and laborers rendering service under such contract, as to the extent and nature of a lienor's claim, to facilitate investigation as to its merits. Such a statement as the above would be misleading. The lienor is required to verify the statement. In all essential particulars it must be true." In the late case of Mill Co. v. Hege, 119 Cal. 377, 51 Pac. 556, it was held that a different rule applies to a variance between the pleading and proof, and a variance between the notice of lien and proof; and, in case the proof shows that the contract set forth in the notice of lien is untrue, it is fatal to the lien. It is said in the opinion: "The right to enforce a mechanic's lien depends upon a compliance with the requirements of the statute. Unless the notice of the lien which is filed with the county recorder contains the statements required by section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the claimant is not entitled to his lien. This section requires the claim of a material man to contain a statement of his demand, after deducting all just credits and offsets, and also a statement of the terms, time given, and conditions of his contract. The provision that the claim must contain these statements means that the statements thus contained must be correct and in accordance with the facts. If they are not correctly stated, the right to a lien is lost." Applying the rule as laid down in the foregoing cases, the said liens must fall. The burden was upon defendant to show that the said liens were valid and enforceable liens upon the premises. The proof showed a contract in each case that, in law, created no lien under the notice given. The proof did not show that Farnsworth & Ruggles had any lien. They did not perform labor upon, or furnish material to be used on, the building. Their services consisted of hauling slate to the building and delivering it to the contractor. This did not bring them within the terms of the statute. Adams v. Burbank, 103 Cal. 651, 37 Pac. 640.

Another fatal objection to the judgment in this case is that the court nowhere finds that the materials furnished by the said lien claimants were furnished to be used, and that they were used in the building and construction of the said church. Silvester v. Mine Co., 80 Cal. 510, 22 Pac. 217; John A. Roebling Sons Co. v. Bear Val. Irr. Co., 99 Cal. 488, 34 Pac. 80. It is claimed by defendant that before the filing of his petition in insolvency said De Gear requested him to pay, and he did agree to pay, the claim of said alleged lienholders. Even if this kind of an unperformed agreement constitutes a defense, we do not think the evidence supports the contention. De Gear says that he told defendant that there were certain claims against the building that he was unable to meet, and that he desired they should be paid. Defendant testified that he paid them because he supposed they were correct, to avoid a lawsuit, and because he considered them just; that De Gear told him all these liens had to be paid; that the reason he did not pay them at once is because he was afraid he would have to pay them twice; that by general information he satisfied himself that the liens were valid, and then paid them. We think this evidence shows that defendant acted upon his own judgment in paying the claims, and that he believed they were valid liens against the building. He had no right, however, to set up his opinion as to the legality of the liens, after knowing that plaintiff claimed the right to contest them, without taking the chances on the correctness of that opinion. Plaintiff clearly had the right to claim that the liens were invalid, and, if their invalidity should be established, to claim the fund as the representative of the general creditors of De Gear. The judgment and order are reversed.

IN RE RATHGEB'S ESTATE. (S. F. 1,471.)¹

EXECUTOR—PROCEEDINGS TO REMOVE—FAILURE TO INVENTORY PROPERTY—GIFT—FINDING.

1. In a proceeding to remove an executor from office for failure to inventory property belonging to the estate, evidence on his part that he claimed the property as his own because his testator gave it to him, and he obtained possession of it from testator's tenant under a written order for its delivery, is not sufficient to prove a gift of it to him.

2. Where one acquires possession of personal property by permission of the owner, he will be presumed to hold it as a bailee, and limitations will not run against the owner until he has notice that the bailee claims the same adversely.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1437, which provides that if an executor has committed or is about to commit a fraud on an estate his letters must be revoked by the superior court, one who, without sufficient reason, asserts title to the property of the estate, and refuses to inventory it as the property of the estate, may be removed from office.

4. The finding by a judge of the superior court in a summary proceeding to remove an executor from office on the ground that he has failed to inventory property of the estate, where he claims title thereto by reason of an alleged gift thereof by the testator, which is adverse to such claim, is not conclusive as to his title to the property in a suit against him by his successor to recover the property.

5. Code Civ. Proc. § 1436, provides that the superior court shall, on credible information that an executor has committed or is about to commit a fraud on the estate, suspend him. Section 1437 provides that notice of suspension shall be served on the executor, and that he shall be cited to show cause why his letters should not be revoked. Section 1438 provides that at the hearing any person interested may appear, and file his allegations in writing, showing that the executor should be removed, to which the executor may demur or answer. The court, pursuant to a sworn statement, suspended an executor, and issued a citation to show cause why his letters should not be revoked. To this statement he made answer, claiming the property as his own. Held, that a proper issue was made, and that proof of facts justifying his suspension would warrant a revocation of his letters.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county. Proceedings in the matter of the estate of John Rathgeb, deceased, commenced by Jules J. Agostini and another against their co-executor, Albert Guttinger, to remove him from office. From an order revoking his letters the latter appealed. Affirmed.

Otto Tum Suden (F. J. Solinsky, of counsel), for appellant. A. Caminetti and Geo. E. De Golia, for respondents.

BRITT, C. John Rathgeb, a resident of the county of Alameda, died July 26, 1897, leaving a will, whereby he appointed Jules J. Agostini, Frank Bernasconi, and Albert Guttinger his executors. The will was duly admitted to probate on August 30, 1897, and letters testamentary were issued to said persons named as executors. On December 7th next following, said Agostini and Bernasconi filed with the court their verified petition charging that Guttinger has concealed moneys, goods, and chattels belonging to the estate of said testator, and has failed to account to the estate for property, both real and personal, in his possession, which belongs to said estate, and that he omitted to include in the inventory and appraisal of the estate previously filed certain real and personal property of the testator situated in the county of Calaveras, and that he has possession of such property, and refuses to deliver it to the executors. They prayed that Guttinger be cited before the court to be examined on oath as to the matters charged, and for such order as the court should deem proper. The court made an order reciting the substance of said petition, and directing that Guttinger appear on December 27, 1897, to be examined touching the said charges. It made a further order containing like recitals as the other, and reciting, in addition, that it appeared from credible information that Guttinger has committed or is about to commit a fraud on the estate, and has long neglected his duty as an executor, and directed that his powers as such be suspended until further investigation by the court; also that he show cause at the time and place appointed for his examination as above stated why the said letters testamentary issued to him should not be revoked. Service of copies of said orders and of said petition having been duly made on Guttinger, and he having been cited as required by the court, he filed answers denying the charges of his co-executors, averring that all the property of which he is possessed is his own, and that he is not bound to include it in any inventory of said estate, and denying that he had omitted any duty he owed to the estate, or that he had committed any fraud thereon, or that he is about to commit such. At the hearing Guttinger was examined, and the testimony of other witnesses was taken, and sundry documentary evidence was introduced. The court found the charges against Guttinger to be sustained, and ordered that his said letters be revoked; also that the other executors institute proper actions against him to recover the property of the estate in his possession. From the order revoking his letters he has appealed.

The statutory provisions under which the said proceedings were taken are, in substance, so far as necessary to be stated, as follows: Whenever the judge of the superior court has reason to believe from his own knowledge, or from credible information, that any executor has wasted or embezzled the property of the estate, or is about to do so, or has committed or is about to commit a fraud upon the estate, or has wrongfully neglected the estate, he must suspend the powers of such executor until the matter is investigated. Code Civ. Proc. § 1436. Notice of such suspension must be given to the executor, and he must be cited to show cause why his letters should not be revoked. If he fails to appear in obedience to the citation, or if, appearing, the court is satisfied that there exists cause for his removal, his letters must be revoked. Id. § 1437. "At the hearing any person interested in the estate may appear and file his allegations in writing, showing that the executor * * * should be removed; to which the executor * * * may demur or answer, as hereinbefore provided." Id. § 1438. The court below found, among other things, that a certain ranch and mine, and also a quantity of personal property, situated in the county of Calaveras, and in the possession of Guttinger, belongs to the estate of the testator, and ought to be included in the inventory thereof, and that Guttinger has neglected to perform his duty as executor in failing and refusing to return and inventory such property as part of the estate. The appellant maintains that these findings are not sustained by the evidence. It appears that the whole value of the property, as listed and appraised in the inventory actually filed, is a little more than $6,600, while the value of said Calaveras county property in the possession of Guttinger is $150,000. There is no dispute that it was all at one time owned by Rathgeb; but Guttinger, who is the nephew of Rathgeb, claims that the same was given to him by Rathgeb in his lifetime, and in support of his contention he produced at the hearing a deed of date January 23, 1893, purporting to be an absolute conveyance from Rathgeb to him of the said real property, under which, as he testified, he took possession of the described premises about January 24, 1894, and ever since has held the same. There was no personal property described in the deed, and the record does not show specifically of what the Calaveras county personalty consisted. A particular description thereof was omitted from the transcript on appeal,—possibly for the sake of brevity. It appears, however, to have been chattels on and about both the ranch and mine, and used in connection therewith. In January, 1894, Guttinger got possession of the personalty from one Holland, who had been Rathgeb's tenant of the ranch, in virtue of a written order for the possession thereof, signed by Rathgeb, and directed to Holland. He testified: "I claim this personal property because my uncle gave it to me, and I claim title to it. * * * I have no other title to the personal property except the order to Holland." There was other evidence on which the respondents claim, as we understand their position, that the ranch and mine described in the deed of January 23, 1893, were conveyed to Guttinger in trust merely, and subject to the dispositions of the grantor's will. We do not find it necessary to decide whether this view of that conveyance, which was adopted by the trial court, is correct. Although Guttinger stated, in a general way, that his uncle gave him the personal property, yet he testified to no word or act of Rathgeb sufficient to constitute a gift thereof. The order on Holland for possession of the same, which he said was his only title, did not show a gift. It is also to be observed, in considering the statement of Guttinger, that the court below was the judge of his credibility. His testimony in some material particulars was confused, and to some extent contradictory of itself. While this may well have been the result of innocent lapse of memory, or want of skill in our language (he being a Swiss), yet, on appeal, we are unable to say that the remark of the trial judge, in announcing his decision, that Guttinger's testimony had not been "at all satisfactory," is not warranted by the record.

It is contended that the statute of limitations as to said personal property had run in favor of Guttinger before the death of Rathgeb. Waiving other considerations on this point, it is sufficient to say that no defense under the statute was proved, for, although Guttinger may have had possession of the chattels for more than three years before his uncle's death, it is shown that he came into possession permissively. It is therefore to be presumed that he held them as Rathgeb's bailee, and it does not appear that his claim to hold the same adversely to his uncle was ever brought to the knowledge of the latter.

A further argument advanced is that his position antagonistic to the estate in respect to the property is no ground for his amotion from the office of executor. In re Bauquier's Estate, 88 Cal. 302, 26 Pac. 178, 532, is cited to sustain this contention. It was held in that case that letters testamentary cannot be refused to the executor named in a will on the ground that he claims as his own property which legatees under the will insist belongs to the estate. The court there dealt with the statute prescribing the grounds for refusing letters upon application therefor (section 1350, Code Civ. Proc.), and held that the courts have no right to add to the disqualifications imposed by the legislature in such cases. The case here is different, for, as the court said in Re Bauquier's Estate: "The executor may always be removed after appointment, unless he discharges the duties of his trust faithfully and as directed by law." Necessarily, therefore, the court has power to determine, for the purposes of an inquiry into that question, whether the executor has refused wrongfully to inventory or otherwise account for property of the estate in his possession, and to remove him if he persists in such conduct; else the necessary steps required by law in the course of administration might be indefinitely delayed or prevented by his mere assertion of title to the property in himself. See Deck's Estate v. Gherke, 6 Cal. 666. In our opinion, the evidence was sufficient to justify the decision that Guttinger wrongfully refused to return and inventory the Calaveras county personalty as part of the estate of Rathgeb, and without sufficient reason asserted ownership thereof in himself. This was a clear neglect of his duty as executor, and was statutory ground for his removal. It is perhaps proper to say that neither the decision here nor that of the court below can estop Guttinger in a suit against him to recover any of said property for the estate. The superior court in this summary proceeding is not competent to decide finally upon the question of title.

It is also contended that no proper issues were made or tried touching the liability of Guttinger to be removed. This contention seems to rest mainly on the circumstance that no formal statement of charges was filed except the petition of December 7, 1897, presented by his co-executors. The objection is not well taken. The petition of December 7, 1893, contained charges upon which the court, under the authority of sections 1436, 1437, Code Civ. Proc., suspended Guttinger's powers, and cited him to appear and show cause why his letters should not be revoked. Said section 1437 evidently contemplates that the charges which, if believed by the court, may be ground for suspending the representative, shall also, if proved upon a hearing, be ground for removing him, and we see no sufficient reason to say that when they are formulated in a sworn statement prior to issuing a citation to show cause they must afterwards be reiterated in a separate document. Compare In re Kelley's Estate, 122 Cal. 379, 382, 55 Pac. 136. The provisions of section 1438, allowing any person interested in the estate to appear at the hearing, and file charges against the representative, cannot be construed as requiring charges previously made to be filed anew, for the section further declares that the executor or administrator may demur or answer to allegations filed at the hearing "as hereinbefore provided,"—apparently referring to proceedings already on foot to compel him to show cause, and in which he has, or may have, made answer.

Some minor questions of procedure are raised. We have inquisitively examined them all, and find no prejudicial error. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is affirmed.

STAAOKE v. BELL et al. (S. F. 1,106.)¹

JUDGMENT—CONFORMITY TO COMPLAINT—COURTS—JURISDICTION—VENUE—QUIETING TITLE—LIENS—TRUSTS—PERPETUITIES.

1. A trustee individually sued, among others, one who was plaintiff in another suit concerning the trust property; praying leave to renew a mortgage privately executed by him, as an individual, on the trust estate, the new mortgage "and the judgment herein not to in any way affect the rights of the parties to said" other action, "but leaving said rights to be determined in said action, subject always to" said mortgage, or any mortgage "that may be authorized by the judgment herein," and praying also for general relief. Held, under Code Civ. Proc. § 580, providing that where there is no answer the relief granted plaintiff cannot exceed that demanded in the complaint, that a decree adjudging the mortgage a first charge on the lands, pursuant to the prayer in the mortgagee's answer, was erroneous as to the defendant, who was plaintiff in the other suit, where he defaulted, and the answer was not served on him.

2. On a question of jurisdiction of the lower court, the supreme court is not confined to the prayer for relief, but it may look to the decree to determine the purpose of the action.

3. Under Const. art. 6, § 5, providing that all actions "quieting title to or for the enforcement of liens upon real estate shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate" is situated, a court of the county in which suit is instituted cannot declare a mortgage executed by a trustee on lands in another county a prior lien, at the instance of the trustee and the mortgagee.

4. A trust deed given to secure a debt is not void because it creates a trust, in violation of the statute of perpetuities.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by George Staacke against John S. Bell and others. From a decree for plaintiff, John S. Bell appeals. Reversed.

Crittenden & Van Wyck, for appellant. Sidney M. Smith, for respondent. Fisher Ames and others, for nonappealing defendants.

CHIPMAN, C. The action is brought in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and the complaint alleges that on February 1, 1892, plaintiff executed and delivered to defendant San Francisco Savings Union his promissory note, due February 1, 1893, for $60,000, to secure payment of which plaintiff executed a conveyance to defendants Henry C. Campbell and Thaddeus B. Kent of certain lands in Santa Barbara county. This conveyance is set out in the complaint, and is an ordinary deed of trust. The complaint then alleges that on

March 8, 1893, "the defendant John S. Bell commenced an action against plaintiff and the defendant John W. C. Maxwell in the superior court * * * in and for the county of Santa Barbara, which action is * * * undetermined; * * * that by the pleadings in said action it is claimed by all the parties thereto that this plaintiff holds said land in trust; that on the 16th day of October, 1892, said Thomas Bell died in the said city and county of San Francisco, leaving a last will, a copy whereof is * * * made part hereof." Thomas Bell is not previously mentioned in the complaint, but appears in the title of the cause as deceased. There is no explanation in the complaint for making the heirs or executors of Thomas Bell parties to the action. The complaint then avers the appointment of plaintiff and defendant John W. C. Maxwell as executors of the will of said Thomas Bell; that the principal of the note and some interest are still due; that the San Francisco Union "is willing to renew said note and security, or to extend the time for the payment of said note, if plaintiff can procure proper authority to make such renewal or extension, but otherwise demands immediate payment of said note, and intends, in default thereof, to cause said lands to be sold by the trustees, Campbell and Kent, to satisfy said indebtedness; that said lands are of much greater value than the amount of said indebtedness, if sold in parcels, and at a time when there is a demand for such property, but at present the market for such property is depressed; and * * * that, if said property should be sold at this time by said trustees, it would probably realize but little, if any, more than sufficient to pay said indebtedness." There is nothing in the complaint to show the nature of the trust referred to in the action pending in Santa Barbara county, or when it arose. The prayer is for the judgment of the court "authorizing and directing plaintiff to execute a new note in place of the note above mentioned, or a renewal of the note above set forth, and a deed of trust to secure the same,—such new note or renewal note and deed of trust, and the judgment herein, not to in any way affect the rights of the parties to said action pending in Santa Barbara county, but leaving said rights to be determined in said action, subject always to the deed of trust aforesaid, or any deed of trust that may be authorized by the judgment herein,"—and for general relief. Trustees Campbell and Kent and the Savings Union filed separate answers, in which they set up many facts additional to those found in the complaint, and prayed for relief different from, and in excess of, that asked by the complaint. The decree adjudges that the deed of trust mentioned in the complaint "is, and shall remain, prior and superior to any claim, charge, or lien to or on said lands of the defendants John S. Bell [naming the other defendants except Campbell, Kent, and Savings Union], or any of them; that the said note and deed of trust were executed with full knowledge and consent of Thomas Bell; that, subject to said deed of trust, the plaintiff holds the legal title to said lands * * * in trust for the defendant John S. Bell and the other defendants [naming them] as their interests may be determined in the suit now pending" in the superior court of Santa Barbara county, referred to in the complaint. It is also adjudged and ordered that plaintiff, "on his own behalf and as trustee as aforesaid, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to execute an instrument in writing renewing said note, and extending the time for the payment of the principal thereof, in words and figures following." Then follows a prescribed form of instrument to be executed by the parties. Appellant and the executors of Thomas Bell made default. The other defendants answered. Plaintiff had judgment, from which defendant John S. Bell appeals on the judgment roll alone. The answers to the complaint were not served upon him. The grounds of the appeal are: (1) The relief granted is in excess of that demanded in the complaint; (2) want of jurisdiction; and (3) insufficiency of the complaint.

1. Where there is no answer, the relief granted plaintiff "cannot exceed that which shall have been demanded in his complaint." Code Civ. Proc. § 580. It is improper to grant relief other and different from that prayed for in the complaint. Mudge v. Steinhart, 78 Cal. 34, 20 Pac. 147; Loan Co. v. Hall, 110 Cal. 492, 42 Pac. 962. Nor can the general prayer enlarge the power of the court to grant relief not prayed for against a defaulting defendant. In the case here the court did not decree a renewal of the deed of trust, and that part of the prayer may be put aside. As we read the prayer of the complaint, so far as appellant is concerned the judgment was not to affect his rights in the action pending in Santa Barbara county. The language is, "not to in any way affect the rights of the parties to said action pending in Santa Barbara county, but leaving said rights to be determined in said action." It is true the prayer also says, "subject always to the deed of trust aforesaid, or any deed of trust that may be authorized by the judgment herein." Whether or not this latter clause was intended as a limitation of the clause preceding it, we think it clear enough that the complaint notified appellant that plaintiff intended to ask a decree, not as trustee of anybody, but individually, as he had executed the note and deed of trust, authorizing him to renew the note and that the decree should be so drawn as "not to in any way affect the rights of the parties to said action pending in Santa Barbara county." Of course, the Savings Union would not consent, and did not consent, unless the renewal could be made so as to preserve its rights as they then stood, but nevertheless we think appellant had the right to make default on the assumption that his rights also in the Santa Barbara action would not be affected. The decree, however, goes far beyond the prayer, and grants the relief prayed for by the Savings Union and trustees Campbell and Kent in their answers, which were not served upon appellant, and of the nature and contents of which he had no notice. Appellant could rest secure under section 580, Code Civ. Proc., and the allegations of the complaint that the judgment was "not to in any way affect the rights of the parties" in the action pending in Santa Barbara county. The decree as to appellant was in excess of the relief demanded in the complaint, in adjudging that the deed of trust given by plaintiff is a first charge upon the lands; that plaintiff holds the lands in trust for appellant, subject to said deed of trust; that the instrument to be executed by plaintiff should be executed by him as trustee of appellant, and should recite that, when the deed of trust was executed by plaintiff, he (plaintiff) "was by the San Francisco Savings Union believed to be the owner in fee, in his own right, of the lands described in the deed of trust," and also in directing that plaintiff should, as trustee of appellant, execute a renewal contract. These matters seem to have found their way into the decree from allegations in the answers referred to, and evidence submitted in support thereof; and, whether or not they were proper to be litigated in the action, it is clear to our minds that the complaint did not inform defendants of any such issues, and appellant is not bound by the judgment as to them.

2. As the judgment must be reversed, and as a decree equally comprehensive with the purpose disclosed by the answers may be sought upon a second trial of the action, it seems necessary to dispose of the question of jurisdiction. The constitution (section 5, art. 6) provides "that all actions * * * quieting title to or for the enforcement of liens upon real estate shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate * * * affected by said action * * * is situated." The constitution does not prohibit the trial elsewhere, if the action is commenced in the proper county, notwithstanding the provisions of section 392, Code Civ. Proc. Hancock v. Burton, 61 Cal. 70; Duffy v. Duffy, 104 Cal. 602, 38 Pac. 443. But, if the action falls within any of the classes enumerated in the constitution, it must be commenced in the county in which the real estate affected by the action is situated. The only question here, then, is, does the relief asked by the complaint and answers have the effect to quiet the title of the Savings Union, or is it for the enforcement of its lien? We may look to the decree to determine the real purpose of the action, and are not confined to the phraseology of the prayer for relief. Fritts v. Camp, 94 Cal. 394, 29 Pac. 867; Pacific Yacht Club v. Sausalito Bay Water Co., 98

Cal. 489, 33 Pac. 322. Conceding, but not deciding, that the superior court of San Francisco could direct the plaintiff to execute a new note and trust deed, so as "not in any way to affect the rights of the parties" in the Santa Barbara action, as is asked in the complaint, it could not adjudge that the original trust deed is a first charge on the Santa Barbara lands, or that it was a valid conveyance, and thus prevent a person having title to that land from claiming the right to have his title litigated and its validity determined in the county where the land is situated. Trustees may, in proper cases, apply to any court of the state, of general jurisdiction, for directions as to the conveyance of the trust estate; but trustees, equally with other persons, are bound by the provisions of the constitution; and if they seek a decree quieting their own title to real estate, or that of some other person, or for the enforcement of any lien upon real estate, they must commence the action in the county where the land is situated. Respondent claims that the action is one to administer a trust, and to authorize the trustee to do certain things for the preservation of the trust, and therefore does not come within the constitutional inhibition. In support of the contention, we are cited to More v. Superior Court, 64 Cal. 345, 28 Pac. 117; Le Breton v. Superior Court, 66 Cal. 27, 4 Pac. 777; and other cases. The first of these cases involved the removal of certain trustees, and the appointment of others in their stead, and the appointment of a receiver to take, hold, and protect the property pending the action. The second involved a proceeding to enforce a trust on personal and real property. No attempt was made in either of the cases to have adjudged the superiority of any title under the trust deed. In the case here the decree apparently goes to the extent of adjudicating the priority of the title under the trust deed over the claims and title of appellant, and, it may be, of others. The decree is one, in its effect, to determine title to land, and practically to quiet title to lands, if, indeed, it is not also, in effect, to enforce a lien thereon by compelling the conveyance of a title declared to be prior to all other claims. Such a decree we do not think could be entered, except in an action commenced in a court where the land is situated.

Without discussing the sufficiency of the complaint, which seems unnecessary, we may remark that the trust deed is not void because it creates a trust, in violation of the statute against perpetuities. Bank v. Alcorn, 121 Cal. 379, 53 Pac. 813; Camp v. Land, 122 Cal. 167, 54 Pac. 839. It is advised that the judgment should be reversed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed.

THOMPSON et al. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES. (L. A. 598.)

{Supreme Court of California. July 8, 1899.}

NEW TRIAL—SPECIFICATIONS OF ERRORS—APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. Where the statement of a case specifies no particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, nor any errors in the rulings at the trial, a new trial will not be granted, under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, subd. 3, providing, "If no such specifications be made, the statement shall be disregarded on the hearing of the motion."

2. Where a motion for a new trial is made after judgment upon a statement of the case, and no appeal is taken from the judgment, errors upon the face of the judgment roll cannot be considered on appeal from an order denying the motion.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by M. B. Thompson and another against the city of Los Angeles. From an order denying a new trial, after judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Walter F. Haas, for appellants. Will E. Dunn, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action is, in form, to quiet title to a narrow strip of land fronting on Soto street, in the city of Los Angeles; the plaintiffs' right to recover depending upon the true location of the line of the street, and the defendant's contention being that the strip of land in controversy is a part of said street. Findings and judgment were for the defendant, and plaintiffs appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The notice of said motion specified as the grounds thereof: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings; (2) that the decision is against law; and (3) on account of errors in law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by defendant, and that the motion would be made upon a statement of the case. The statement, however, specifies no particulars in which it is claimed the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings, nor are any errors of law occurring at the trial specified. Section 659, subd. 3, Code Civ. Proc., provides, "If no such specifications be made, the statement shall be disregarded on the hearing of the motion." The findings therefore stand unquestioned, and the correctness of the rulings and proceedings upon the trial unchallenged.

Appellants, in their brief, say that the ground for a new trial more particularly relied upon for a reversal is that "said decision is against law," and proceed to discuss the evidence as though its sufficiency or insufficiency was the sole question to be considered. But since, in the absence of specifications, we are obliged to conclude that the findings are justified by the evidence, and that no errors of law occurred upon the trial, if "the decision is against law" it must be for some reason appearing only in the judgment roll,—as, for example, a failure to find upon some material issue, or that wrong conclusions of law have been drawn from the findings. There is no appeal from the judgment, however; and, upon appeal from an order denying a new trial, errors upon the face of the judgment roll cannot be considered. In re Westerfeld's Estate, 96 Cal. 113, 30 Pac. 1104; Wheeler v. Bolton, 92 Cal. 159, 28 Pac. 538; Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 186. Besides, counsel for appellant does not in his brief suggest any error of law appearing upon the judgment roll. I advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

In re PEARSONS' ESTATE. (S. F. 1397.)

WILLS—DESIGNATION OF LEGATEE.

An institution the primary purpose of which is to take such girls, not under 14 years of age, as choose to go to it, and train them for special vocations in life, is not an orphan asylum, within the terms of a bequest to the orphan asylums of San Francisco.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Application by the St. Francis Technical School and Elizabeth Malone for a share in the distribution of the estate of Hiram A. Pearsons. From a decree refusing the application, the applicants appeal. Affirmed.

Garret W. McEnerney, for appellants. Joseph Hutchinson, Sullivan & Sullivan, and Naphthaly, Friedenrich & Ackerman, and others, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by the St. Francis Technical School, and Elizabeth Malone, superioress thereof, from a decree of final distribution, and also from a decree settling the final account of the executor. The deceased, Pearsons, left a will, in which he provided, among other things, that certain specific property should be sold, and "the proceeds of such sale be equally distributed among the orphan asylums of the city and county of San Francisco. And the said asylums I request to be designated by the judge of the probate court." There were a large number of applicants for distributive shares of this fund, each claiming to be an orphan asylum within the meaning of the said clause in the will. On December 20, 1894, the court made a decree by which the claims of some of the applicants were allowed and those of others denied. An appeal was taken from that decree to this court, and the decree was reversed, and the opinion of this court on that appeal quite fully sets forth the principles upon which the court below should be governed upon another hearing of the case. See In re Pearsons' Estate, 113 Cal. 577, 45 Pac. 849. After the going down of the remittitur, the matter was heard again by the superior court, and a decree was rendered, in which six of the applicants were declared to be within the terms of the will, and entitled to a distributive share of the fund. The applications of all the others were rejected, and among them was that of the St. Francis Technical School, which now appeals from the decree. The appellant concedes that the six applicants were properly held to be orphan asylums, and to be entitled to shares of the fund. But it claims that the court erred in holding that it was not an orphan asylum, within the meaning of the will, and not entitled to any share of the fund.

The court below was right in deciding against the claim of the appellant. It was not an orphan asylum, within the principles declared at the former appeal. On that appeal it was held that "the prominent idea of an asylum is that it is a place of safety, a place of refuge, a retreat, a sanctuary" for indigent and dependent orphans who have no home elsewhere, and to afford them a home, with protection, support, etc., during the period of their dependency. The appellant here is not within this definition. Its primary and main purpose is to take such girls as choose to go to it, and who are 14 years old or more,—when their period of dependency is mostly over,—and to give them such special training as will fit them for certain vocations in life. The work of the girls contributes to their support. The primary and principal purpose of the appellant is not that of an asylum, as above described, but of a school. It is in fact what its name (although the name would not be controlling) indicates,—a "technical school." Hospitals, reformatories, directories, and schools, although dealing with orphans, are clearly distinguishable from orphan asylums. Similar reasons which induced the court on the former appeal to reject the claims of the Boys' & Girls' Aid Society and the Girls' Directory Orphan Asylum to be beneficiaries under the will, lead necessarily to the rejection of the claim of appellant. The case of Wilson v. Squire, 1 Younge & C. Ch. 654,—the only authority cited by appellant,—is not in point. The bequest in that case was to the governors and trustees of the London Orphan Society on the City Road. It was not to a class. There was only one beneficiary named, and the task of the court was merely to determine who that single beneficiary was. Moreover, the word "asylum" did not appear in the will. The words used were "orphan society"; and, of course, there could be many kinds of societies connected in various ways with orphans which would not be asylums. The judgment and decrees appealed from are affirmed.

BURK et al. v. ARCATA & M. R. R. CO.
(S. F. 1,121.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 14, 1899.)

DEATH—NOMINAL DAMAGES—ABSENCE OF PECUNIARY LOSS.

In an action for damages for the death of plaintiff's brother, only nominal damages can be recovered where it does not appear that plaintiff derived, or could reasonably expect to derive, pecuniary benefit from deceased, nor that deceased was accumulating, or was likely to accumulate, any estate, so that plaintiff, as his heir, would suffer pecuniary loss.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county.

Action by Henry C. Burk and others against the Arcata & Mad River Railroad Company. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Buck & Cutler and Chamberlain & Wheeler, for appellant. Frank McGowan and Mahan & Mahan, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment and from an order refusing a new trial. The suit was brought by a sister and two brothers of George W. Burk to recover damages for his death, which was caused by the negligence of the defendant. The plaintiffs are all adults, and the deceased, at the time of his death, was 34 years old. It was admitted that he was in good health, a competent and reliable locomotive engineer, in the receipt of monthly wages in the sum of $75, and was well insured to his work. He had never been married, and was boarding with one of his brothers immediately before the accident, and was on friendly terms with plaintiffs. Plaintiffs recovered judgment for $1,500. The defendant contends that there was no evidence which tended to show any damage whatever, and therefore plaintiffs were entitled to nominal damages only. An instruction to that effect was asked and refused. This presents the only question on the motion for a new trial or on the appeal.

The instructions actually given to the jury by the court on the subject of damages are not complained of. Instruction 27 contains a full and correct statement of the general rule. It is as follows: "I charge you that damages can only be given for the actual pecuniary injury or loss suffered by the parties complaining; in other words, in a case such as the present, should you find that plaintiffs are entitled to damages, then damages can only be given for the pecuniary injury or loss the plaintiffs have sustained, or will sustain, by the death of said George W. Burk. And in this regard I charge you that no damages can be given to plaintiffs for the grief or sorrow, or pain of mind, or injury to their feelings, or for loss of society of deceased, or for his pain or suffering, or for the loss of his comfort or protection. The law simply measures the injury complained of by the loss it has caused or will cause in dollars and cents. In passing upon this question you are not allowed to speculate or indulge in presumptions not warranted by the evidence, but you must determine this question solely by the evidence introduced before you. If you are not able to determine from the evidence that the plaintiffs have suffered a pecuniary injury or loss in the death of George W. Burk, it becomes your duty to return a verdict for defendant. And in passing upon the extent of the pecuniary injury or loss sustained by the plaintiffs you must be governed solely by the evidence introduced. You must not indulge in conjectures or speculations not supported by the evidence." The defendant requested an instruction as follows, which was refused: "There is no evidence in the case tending to prove whether George W. Burk was in the habit of saving his wages, or whether he was in the habit of spending all his earnings, or whether he ever contributed towards the support of or to the plaintiffs, or either of them, or whether plaintiffs ever had any reasonable expectation of receiving aid from him. Therefore, if you find a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, you must limit the amount of damages to a merely nominal sum." The condition of the evidence was undoubtedly as recited in the proposed instruction, there being no evidence whatever upon the subject except as I have stated. Respondent contends for the rule laid down in Railroad Co. v. Barron, 5 Wall. 106, where it was said that the relatives for whose benefit the suit was brought need not have had a legal claim upon the deceased, and that they can recover what it is reasonably probable they would have received from the deceased had he not been killed. But this, if admitted, still leaves the question unanswered, does the evidence show that it was reasonably probable that they would have received anything from deceased if he had not been killed? Ordinarily, it would be admitted these mere possibilities of benefits—for they are really nothing more than that—would not be a proper basis for the estimate of damages. It is recognized that there may be no evidence of actual damage, and that the loss is problematical. It is contended that the legislature intended that some damage should be allowed, and in some states it is left to the jury to estimate the pecuniary value of the life upon vague surmise of possible advantage. The statutes in the different states, though varying greatly, follow, generally, Lord Campbell's act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93). In that it was recited that no right of action existed at common law for such damages. It was then a new right of action. It could not be a continuation of the right which the injured man had for the injury, for the loss to his heirs did not accrue until he died. Under our statute the injured person might survive long enough to sue, and recover damages, or to settle with the wrongdoer, and then, by his death, a new cause of action would accrue to his heirs. True, it has been held differently in some states, which have what are called "survival statutes." Here it has been ruled, as the fact evidently is, that the statutes create an entirely new cause of action. Munro v. Reclamation Co., 84 Cal. 515, 24 Pac. 303. And the jury were instructed in this case that damages can only be given "for the actual pecuniary injury or loss suffered by the parties complaining."

It has been said that Lord Campbell's act was intended to be penal. It had been found that persons causing death by negligence could not be convicted of manslaughter, and it was thought that in the interests of the public some punishment should be meted out to them. Had it been expressly made punitive, much trouble would have been avoided. The English courts held that only pecuniary loss could be recovered, and that a plaintiff must show actual loss, or he has no cause of action. In this country the ruling is nearly unanimous that the statute gives a cause of action, and, if no damages are proven, nominal damages only can be recovered. Unless the mere fact that plaintiffs were, at the time of his death, the heirs of deceased, tends to show pecuniary damage, they have shown none. In Railroad Co. v. Barron, supra, it is said that it is presumed that the property of the deceased would have gone at his death as directed by law, and, if he had survived, he would have added something to his estate which his next of kin would have inherited, and the equivalent, as estimated by the jury, may be given his representative. This ruling has been followed often in the federal courts and by many state courts. The decision is criticised in Railroad Co. v. Galway, 6 App. D. C. 143. It is shown to be opposed to reason and the trend of the decisions, and a misconception of the Illinois statute as afterwards construed in Railway Co. v. Swett, 45 Ill. 197, by the supreme court of Illinois. In these cases the jury have been permitted to indulge in mere conjecture, that they may find some damage under the statute. It is said the fact that a right to sue is given implies that damages may be recovered, although no rights of plaintiffs have been violated. Confessedly, plaintiffs had no legal claim on deceased for anything, and he owed no duty to them to accumulate an estate, and leave it to them. Let us consider upon what a sea of uncertainty the jury must embark. (1) Would the deceased have had the health to work and accumulate, and would he have done so? He never has saved anything, and it does not appear that he could. (2) May he not have married, and have had children of his own, who would inherit? (3) Might he not by will have disinherited the plaintiffs. And (4) might he not have outlived them? The majority of men die without much property. Whether the deceased would have succeeded in accumulating, and, if he had been successful, would have left it to plaintiffs, is matter of pure speculation. Such a guess as to probabilities is not, according to settled rules and maxims of the law, proper ground for the award of damages. I see no reason why this class of cases should constitute an exception. If it was intended to punish for wrongdoing, the law could be understood. But the courts hold, and it is made the law of this case by the instructions, which were not excepted to, that plaintiffs can recover only the number of dollars they have lost by the death of George W. Burk. Unless they lost a probable increase to their inheritance from their brother, I see no evidence which tends to prove that they lost anything. This question was not at issue and was not discussed in Harrison v. Railway Co., 116 Cal. 156, 47 Pac. 1019. The rule was conceded. The suit could have been maintained by the administrator for the benefit of the estate. The heirs would not take the money as heirs; that is, they would not take by succession, but as the beneficiaries of the statute. The deceased was not entitled to the damages, nor was the right of action in him. The loss for which recovery may be had is the loss to survivors by his death. This would have been the same had he died from natural causes. Since punitive damages cannot be recovered, the wrongfulness of that act cuts no figure further than to bring the case within the statute. The act causing the death must be wilful or negligent. There is no reason why, in the estimate of damages, the ordinary rules of law should be departed from. The intention is always to give such damages as, under the circumstances of the case, are just. These words in the statute cannot change the rule unless they are interpreted to mean that the discretion of the jury shall be uncontrolled. It has not been so decided. The statutes upon this subject seem to be framed upon the idea that the heirs will always constitute the family of the deceased. In some states they are so limited. We can easily understand that a life may be of great pecuniary value to such persons. Collateral heirs, at all events, must prove probable loss, or their recovery will be limited to nominal damages. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

PEOPLE v. WINTERS. (Cr. 492.)

HOMICIDE—MURDER—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REASONABLE DOUBT—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESS—ALIBI—CONTINUANCE—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY—TRIAL—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—ERROR NOT PREJUDICIAL.

1. Where an instruction on the law of reasonable doubt contains a full statement of the law, a statement in the instruction in form, "You are instructed that the doubt which acquits a defendant on trial on a charge of crime must be a reasonable doubt in the sense mentioned, and no other," is not objectionable.

2. An instruction that, "You understand, of course, that a witness ascertained or appearing to be willfully false in one part of his testimony as to the truth or falsity of a given proposition of fact is to be distrusted in other parts," is good.

3. An instruction on the question of alibi that such a defense is as legitimate, if proved, as any other defense, and if, in view of all the evidence, the jury have any reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant was in some other place when the crime was committed, they should give him the benefit of the doubt; in other words, he is not bound to prove an alibi beyond a reasonable doubt, it being sufficient if the evidence raises a reasonable doubt of his presence at the time and place of the commission of the crime charged,—is correct.

4. An instruction that defendant has offered himself as a witness in his own behalf, and that the jury are not permitted to disregard or reject his testimony simply on the ground that he is accused and on trial on a criminal charge, is properly refused, as instructing on the credibility of testimony.

5. Where the affidavits of defendant for a continuance fail to disclose any diligence to secure the attendance of the witnesses, and there is nothing to indicate that their attendance could have been procured at a subsequent day, the showing for continuance is inadequate.

6. Declarations of defendant's confederate, made subsequent to the killing with which defendant is charged, and not in the presence of defendant, are hearsay, and inadmissible.

7. Where declarations made by defendant's confederate are purely hearsay, but in no way prejudicial to defendant, error in admitting such evidence is no ground for a new trial.

Beatty, C. J., and Temple and Henshaw, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county.

Harry Winters was convicted of the crime of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

Nagle & Nagle, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Ford, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant has been convicted of the crime of murder, and the death penalty adjudged. Upon appeal he complains of various errors of law committed by the trial court. A very full instruction upon the law of "reasonable doubt" was given to the jury, and in that instruction it was said: "You are instructed that the doubt which acquits a defendant on trial on a charge of crime must be a reasonable doubt in the sense mentioned, and no other." Inasmuch as the instruction contained a full and sound statement of the law bearing upon the matter of reasonable doubt, there can be no valid objection to the foregoing language used by the court. Neither is the instruction susceptible to the objection that it is argumentative in form. The following instruction was given: "You understand, of course, that a witness ascertained or appearing to be willfully false in one part of his testimony as to the truth or falsity of a given proposition of fact is to be distrusted in other parts." While this instruction is somewhat out of the ordinary form bearing upon the subject-matter covered by it, still we find no substantial objection to it.

Upon the question of alibi the court said to the jury: "Such a defense is as proper and legitimate, if proved, as any other defense, and all the evidence bearing upon that point, if any, should be considered by you; and if, in view of all the evidence, you have any reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant was in some other place when the crime was committed, you should give the defendant the benefit of the doubt. In other words, the defendant is not bound or required to prove an alibi beyond a reasonable doubt to entitle him to an acquittal. It is sufficient if the evidence upon that point, if any, raises a reasonable doubt in your minds of his presence at the time and place of the commission of the crime charged." Taken as a whole, this instruction is correct. In substance, it states the law. There are a few expressions contained therein which could well have been omitted; as, for instance, strictly speaking, the matter of alibi is not a matter of defense. Again, the jury were told: "That such a defense is as proper and legitimate, if proved, as any other defense." The words "if proved," standing alone, would be seriously misleading, for an alibi in no sense, in order to be successfully invoked, need be "proved," as that word is ordinarily used. See People v. Roberts, 122 Cal. 377, 55 Pac. 137. But it is perfectly evident from the context, taking the entire instruction together, that the court, in using those words, simply intended them to mean a sufficient degree of proof to raise a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury. We find many courts and law writers referring to an alibi as matter of defense, and also stating that it must be proved by defendant. We doubt the strict legal propriety of using either one of these expressions in those jurisdictions where it is held that an alibi is sufficiently established when a reasonable doubt is raised in the minds of the jurors as to the presence of the defendant at the scene of the crime. Yet these terms are used and held unobjectionable in all those instructions where the jury are clearly and fully told that a reasonable doubt in their minds as to the presence of the defendant at the scene of the homicide entitles him to an acquittal. In all those cases the word "proved" is held to mean the production of sufficient evidence to raise a reasonable doubt. We find these terms used in that standard work the American and English Encyclopædia of Law (volume 2, 2d Ed., p. 56), where it is said: "The true doctrine seems to be that, where the state has established a prima facie case, and the defendant relies upon the defense of alibi, the burden is upon him to prove it, not beyond a reasonable doubt, nor by a preponderance of the evidence, but by such evidence, and to such a degree of certainty, as will, when the whole evidence is considered, create and leave in the mind of the jury a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused." An abundance of authority is there cited where the law is stated to the same effect. See, also, State v. Thornton (S. D.) 73 N. W. 196, in which case the whole question is exhaustively discussed, and a similar instruction to that here given approved. Again we say we do not indorse the statement, "An alibi, if proved, is a good defense," as a strictly correct statement of a proposition of law. Yet, in view of the fact that in the same instruction, and almost in the same line of the instruction, we find the court telling the jury that, if a reasonable doubt is raised in their minds from the evidence as to the presence of the defendant at the scene of the homicide, then such doubt entitled him to an acquittal, it cannot be possible that the jury misunderstood the law. In this same instruction it is also said: "In other words, the defendant is not bound or required to prove an alibi beyond a reasonable doubt to entitle him to an acquittal." This statement is eminently true as a proposition of law, but not necessary to be stated in view of the other portions of the instruction. Yet, being given, it could well have been supplemented by the additional statement that not even a preponderance of evidence was necessary to sustain a claim of alibi. This, in effect, was stated when the charge declared in terms that, if a reasonable doubt was raised in the minds of the jurors from the evidence as to the defendant's presence at the scene of the homicide, then he was entitled to the benefit of such doubt and an acquittal. That portion of the instruction referring to the defendant being "in some other place when the crime was committed" we believe is clearly correct. The instruction offered by defendant, and which was refused, upon the question of identity, was properly refused. It did not contain a statement of a principle of law, but an argument based upon facts.

The instruction offered by defendant, and refused, bearing upon the question of alibi, was properly refused. It omits the all-important qualification that the doubt must be a reasonable doubt. This court has repeatedly held such instructions fatally defective.

Complaint is made by reason of the court's refusal to give the following instruction: "The defendant has offered himself as a witness, and has taken the stand as such in his own behalf. This is his legal right, and you are not permitted, under the law, to discredit or reject his testimony simply on the ground that he is accused and on trial on a criminal charge." We have repeatedly cautioned trial courts upon the inadvisability of giving instructions to the jury tending to discredit the testimony of the defendant. A long line of modern cases to this effect may be found in the state reports. Such instructions rest upon the border line of error, as trespassing upon the constitutional rights of the jurors in weighing and testing the credibility of witnesses. As has been often said, that class of instructions will be limited within the strictest lines. In this case we are now asked for a reversal of the judgment because an instruction in behalf of defendant incorporating this principle of law has been refused. We are clear that it was properly refused. The credit to be given the testimony of every witness—the defendant and all other witnesses—is a matter for the jury alone; a matter with which the court has nothing to do. It is a matter of fact, not a matter of law.

Defendant's showing for a continuance is wholly inadequate. It is not disclosed by his affidavits that he had used any diligence to secure the attendance of the two witnesses to which reference is made, and whose presence he desired; and there is nothing whatever to indicate that their attendance could have been procured at a subsequent day if a continuance had been granted.

It is claimed that the defendant and one Raymond entered into a conspiracy to burglarize in the nighttime the Grand Hotel, situated in the village of Baden, near the city of San Francisco, and that while so engaged the alarm was given, the proprietors and others appeared upon the scene, and in the disturbance ensuing one Andrews, a boarder at the hotel, was killed by the defendant's confederate, Raymond. The robbers escaped, and one Herve, a policeman, arrested Raymond a few hours later, traveling upon the highway. At that time Raymond had in his possession a pistol, which had been recently discharged, and possessed four empty chambers. Defendant's confederate had fired four shots from a pistol at the time of the murder. This pistol was one which defendant had secured from a shopkeeper some weeks prior to the killing. The witness, moreover, testified to a conversation had with Raymond, at the time of his arrest, as to his identity, from whence he came, where he was going, and his business, etc. The witness Burke, a policeman, who received Raymond from the hands of Herve at the jail, also testified to a conversation had with Raymond at that time. These conversations were of the same general import. All of this evidence was admitted under objections of defendant, which objections were to the effect that it was hearsay; that defendant was not present at the time, and could not be bound by it; and that, even conceding the existence of a conspiracy between defendant and Raymond, at this time it was a thing of the past. To a large measure these objections of defendant to the admissibility of this evidence were eminently sound. People v. Oldham, 111 Cal. 648, 44 Pac. 312; People v. Opie (Cal.) 55 Pac. 989. It was well to identify the pistol found upon Raymond as the pistol formerly purchased by the defendant, Winters. Such evidence had a direct tendency to connect Winters with the commission of the offense. But declarations of Raymond, made subsequent to the killing, not in the presence of the defendant, were the purest hearsay, and clearly inadmissible. Yet, upon a careful examination of those declarations, we find nothing therein stated which in any way was prejudicial to defendant. His name was not mentioned. Nothing whatever was said by Raymond which, even by implication, connected him with the crime. Indeed, Raymond said nothing in any way implicating himself. The error committed by the trial court, therefore, in the admission of this evidence, was purely abstract, and furnished no ground for a new trial.

The remaining points urged by defendant possess no merit. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; McFARLAND, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

HENSHAW, J. (dissenting). I am of opinion that the court erred, not only in the instruction which it gave upon the subject of alibi, but as well in the instruction asked by defendant which it refused to give. The defendant's whole case rested upon an alibi. If the law upon this subject was improperly placed before the jury, the injury which thereby resulted to defendant certainly entitles him to a new trial. The defendant asked the court to charge the jury as follows: "An alibi simply means that the accused was at another place at the time of the commission of the crime, and therefore could not have committed it; and I instruct you that this defense is as legitimate and proper as any other defense. All the evidence bearing upon this defense should be carefully considered by you. If the testimony on this subject, considered with all the other evidence in the case, is sufficient to raise a doubt in your mind as to the guilt of the defendant, you should acquit him. The accused is not required to prove the defense of an alibi beyond a reasonable doubt, or even by a preponderance of evidence. It is sufficient if the evidence upon that point raises a doubt of his presence at the time and place of the commission of the crime charged, and, if it has done so, he is entitled to an acquittal. The attempt of the accused to prove an alibi does not shift the burden of proof from the state, but the state is bound to prove his presence beyond a reasonable doubt." As applied to the facts in this case, the foregoing instruction is unimpeachable in its law, unless it be said that the failure to qualify "a doubt" by the adjective "reasonable" justified the court in refusing to give it. But I think the court was not justified, for the instructions are to be construed together, and elsewhere the court had in precise language told the jury "that the doubt which acquits a defendant on a trial on a charge of crime must be a reasonable doubt in the sense mentioned, and no other." But, if it shall be said that the court was justified in refusing to give the offered instruction for the indicated reason, it will be found even more difficult to uphold the instruction which the court actually did give. That instruction is as follows: "One of the defenses interposed by the defendant in this case is what is known in law as an alibi. An alibi in law simply means that the defendant was not there; or, to state it more definitely, a defendant who sets up an alibi shows such a state of facts surrounding his whereabouts as to the particular time the crime was committed as would make it practically improbable or impossible for him to have committed the offense charged. The court instructs you that such a defense is as proper and legitimate, if proved, as any other defense, and all the evidence bearing upon that point, if any, should be considered by you; and if, in view of all the evidence, you have any reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant was in some other place when the crime was committed, you should give the defendant the benefit of the doubt. In other words, the defendant is not bound or required to prove an alibi beyond a reasonable doubt to entitle him to an acquittal. It is sufficient if the evidence upon that point, if any, raises a reasonable doubt in your minds of his presence at the time and place of the commission of the crime charged." By this instruction the jury is first charged that a defendant who "sets up an alibi" is to show such a state of facts touching his whereabouts at the time of the commission of the crime as would make it "practically improbable or impossible" for him to have committed it. Such is not the law. One who is alibi is elsewhere than at the place of the crime at the time of its commission. A defendant who rests his defense upon an alibi is not required by his evidence to make it "practically improbable or impossible" for him to have committed the offense. It is necessary for him only to introduce evidence sufficient to create in the minds of the jurors a reasonable doubt whether or not he was at the scene of the crime at the time of its commission. The vice of the instruction lies in informing the jury that the defendant must prove that he was elsewhere, so as to make it practically improbable or impossible for him to have committed the crime. This error is emphasized in the succeeding sentence, where the court informs the jury that the defense of alibi "is as proper and legitimate, if proved, as any other defense." In People v. Roberts, 122 Cal. 377, 55 Pac. 137, a new trial was ordered for an error of the court in instructing the jury, upon the question of alibi, that, "when satisfactorily proven, it is a good defense in law." Herein is a clear declaration that it is incumbent upon the defendant to prove his presence alibi. Again, the court declares that, if the jury had "any reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant was in some other place when the crime was committed," the defendant should receive the benefit of the doubt, but here there is an entire misconception of the point to which the reasonable doubt should be directed. If a man charged with the commission of a crime in San Francisco should offer evidence under an alibi that he was in New York, the jury might entertain a reasonable doubt whether or not he was in New York, or, more than that, they might positively believe that he was not in New York, but, before they could convict him, they should be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he was in San Francisco; or if,—phrasing it otherwise,—from all the evidence, they did entertain a reasonable doubt whether or not he was in San Francisco at the time of the commission of the crime, the prosecution would have failed to establish their case with the certainty required, and the defendant would be entitled to an acquittal. This proposition is declared in the last sentence of the instruction, but the instruction itself is conflicting and contradictory in its declarations, for the jury were as justified in believing from it that the defendant must prove that he was elsewhere as they were in believing that the law required only that the defendant's evidence should create in their minds a reasonable doubt. It needs no citation of authority to the point that contradictory and conflicting instructions upon the same point are prejudicially erroneous, and for this reason I think the defendant is entitled to a new trial.

Still further, the instruction "that the witness ascertained or appearing to be willfully false in one part of his testimony as to the truth or falsity of a given proposition of fact is to be distrusted in other parts" is erroneous and misleading. It is not the "appearance" of giving false testimony, it is the belief that false testimony has been given, which invokes and excites distrust and caution. Moreover, as given, the instruction omits the very important element that the willfully false testimony must be given upon a material matter. People v. Plyler, 121 Cal. 160, 53 Pac. 553.

BANK OF WOODLAND v. OBERHAUS et al. (Sac. 404.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 10, 1899.)

ACKNOWLEDGMENT—NATURE OF ACT—QUALIFICATION OF NOTARY—HOMESTEAD.

1. The act of a notary in taking an acknowledgment to a conveyance is not judicial in its nature.

2. A cashier of a bank, who is not a stockholder, and is employed on a fixed salary, and whatever fees he receives as a notary are his individually, is not disqualified to take an acknowledgment to a mortgage given to the bank.

3. Under Civ. Code, § 1241, making homesteads subject to sale under judgments obtained on debts secured by mortgages upon the premises, executed and recorded before the declaration of homestead was filed for record, a homestead is so subject, although the mortgagors made the premises their home, and resided thereon, prior to the execution of the mortgage.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county.

Suit by the Bank of Woodland against William Oberhaus and Fredrica Oberhaus. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. W. Thomas, for appellants. Craig & Hawkins, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. The main contention on the part of the appellants is that the mortgages are invalid on the ground that the acknowledgments, having been taken before the cashier of the plaintiff bank, are void. The court finds that C. F. Thomas, the notary who took the acknowledgments of said mortgages, was the cashier of the plaintiff bank, but that he was not a stockholder in said bank, nor a director thereof, but an appointee of the board of directors, and employed by them as such cashier upon a fixed and definite salary. The evidence fully supports this finding, and further shows that he had no interest in the property or income of the bank, that his services were neither increased nor diminished by its gains or losses, and that his business as notary was distinct and independent of his duties as cashier of the bank, and whatever fees he received or collected as notary were his individually, and did not go to the bank. In some of the states it has been held that a notary, in taking an acknowledgment, acts judicially; in others, that he acts ministerially. Elliott v. Peirsol, 1 Pet. 328, was a case that went up from Kentucky, where the clerk was authorized by statute to take and certify the acknowledgments of deeds, and the court there say, "We are of opinion he acted ministerially, not judicially, in the matter," and held that, after his certificate passed from his hands, he had no power of correcting it. This court, in Bours v. Zachariah, 11 Cal. 295, after quoting from that case, say: "Where is the difference between the clerk's power ceasing on his recording the deed and certificate, and the notary's power ceasing after recording by the clerk? * * * The whole reasoning of the court in the section quoted is direct to show that the notary could have no such authority; for all the evils which are so well stated would follow as well from permitting alterations of the record to be made by amendments of the notary as of the clerk." There are some decisions to the effect that where the acknowledgment is a necessary part of the execution of the instrument, as in some cases in reference to the acknowledgment of a married woman, then the officer acts judicially in taking the acknowledgment. When these mortgages were executed, however, it required no separate acknowledgment on the part of the wife. But in this state it would seem that a notary public does not exercise judicial functions. The constitution prescribes where the judicial power of the state is lodged, and what courts and officers exercise judicial power, and notary publics are not included therein. Const. art. 6. Upon principle, it would seem that the act of a notary in taking the acknowledgment of a conveyance is not judicial in its nature. For judicial acts the officer is not liable either for ignorance or negligence, but only for corrupt and intentional misconduct in the discharge of his official duties. On the other hand, ministerial officers are pecuniarily liable for negligence, regardless of intentions,—whether good or bad. It has been held in this state that a notary public and his bondsmen are liable for damages caused by negligence in taking the acknowledgment of a conveyance or mortgage. Fogarty v. Finlay, 10 Cal. 239; Heidt v. Minor, 89 Cal. 115, 26 Pac. 627. In People v. Bush, 40 Cal. 344, the court distinguishes between ministerial and judicial duties, saying: "A judicial officer may be required by law to discharge other than judicial duties. He may by authority of law perform ministerial acts, but, when performed, they do not become judicial acts because they are performed by a judicial officer. This becomes apparent on a moment's consideration. A county judge is authorized, among other things, to take the acknowledgment of a deed, and to solemnize a marriage. No one will contend that in performing those acts he exercises judicial functions." It has been held that notaries public, where attorneys or agents of parties, were not for that reason disqualified in taking acknowledgments or protesting bills, where they were not pecuniarily interested in the transaction. Horbach v. Tyrrell (Neb.) 67 N. W. 485; Penn v. Garvin, 56 Ark. 511, 20 S. W. 410; Moreland's Assignee v. Bank (Ky.) 30 S. W. 19, 637; Bank v. Rivers, 36 Fla. 575, 18 South. 850. We think the notary in this case was not disqualified from taking the acknowledgments of the mortgages in question.

It is further contended by the appellants that the homestead antedated the execution of the mortgage, from the fact that the defendants made the premises their home and resided thereon. Since the Codes, there can be no legal homestead merely from residence, without selection. "The homestead consists of the dwelling house in which the claimant resides and the land on which the same is situated, selected as in this title provided." Civ. Code, § 1237. The mortgages in suit were acknowledged, respectively, August 26, 1892, and November 7, 1893, and recorded of those dates. Suit was brought for their foreclosure, and lis pendens filed and recorded October 19, 1895. Although the parties resided on the premises in question a number of years before the execution of the mortgages, the declaration of the homestead was not filed until November 4, 1895. "The homestead is subject to execution or forced sale in satisfaction of judgments obtained: * * * (4) On debts secured by mortgages upon the premises executed and recorded before the declaration of homestead was filed for record." Civ. Code, § 1241. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WATSON. (Cr. 517.)

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO MURDER—INSTRUCTION—DEGREES OF OFFENSE.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to murder, where, under the information and evidence, the defendant could have been convicted of an assault likely to produce great bodily injury, it was error to charge that he could only be convicted of assault with intent to commit murder, or of a simple assault.

Department 1, Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county.

John Watson was convicted of assault with intent to commit murder, and he appeals. Reversed.

A. B. McKenzie, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Ford, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant has been found guilty of an assault with intent to commit murder. He now claims that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. There is evidence in the record which tends to show that the defendant, Watson, when somewhat under the influence of liquor, seized a boy about 15 years of age, tied him by the neck to his (Watson's) horse's tail, using the hair of the horse's tail for that purpose, then mounted his horse, and, with his pistol in his hand and threats to kill issuing from his mouth, rode about one-quarter of a mile, leading the boy. This journey was also interspersed by incidents such as defendant's firing his pistol. It further appears that this reckless deed was done by reason of the feeling of hatred held by defendant against the boy's elder brother. The question as to the intent with which these acts were done by defendant was a pure question of fact, to be determined from all the circumstances of the case; and from those circumstances the jury could well declare that the intent of defendant was to kill and murder this 15-year old boy. It is said in People v. Landman, 103 Cal. 580, 37 Pac. 518: "Of course, under these circumstances, a person's intent cannot be proven by direct and positive evidence, yet it is none the less a question of fact, to be proven like any other fact in the case, and all the circumstances surrounding the assault furnish the rule upon which its proper solution depends." The court instructed the jury as follows: "The law provides that the jury may find the defendant guilty of any offense the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged, or of an attempt to commit the offense. (2) Under the information in this case, the defendant can be convicted of either assault to murder, or of an assault, as the evidence may establish. (3) Gentlemen, the form of your verdict must be either: (1) 'We, the jury, find the defendant not guilty;' or (2) 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged;' or (3) 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of assault.'" Section 245 of the Penal Code provides: "Every person who commits an assault upon the person of another with a deadly weapon or instrument, or by any means or force likely to produce great bodily injury, is punishable," etc. Under the evidence and the allegations of the information, it is clear that this defendant could well have been convicted of the crime defined by this section of the Penal Code. If the jury believed the defendant committed the acts indicated by the evidence, and also believed that there was no intent in his mind at the time to kill and murder the boy, they could well have found a verdict against him of making an assault by means and force likely to produce great bodily injury; yet, by the instructions of the court just quoted, the jury, in effect, were told that they could not find such a verdict. They were informed that the defendant could be convicted of an assault with intent to murder, or a simple assault. "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius." This construction of these instructions is doubly emphasized when we find the court telling the jury that the verdict must be in one of the following forms, and, upon examining those forms, we find no form of verdict authorized under the section of the Penal Code already quoted.

This defendant's position upon the matter under discussion is much stronger than we find in those cases where the court fails to instruct at all upon the question. In some of those cases it has been held that the defendant should have asked for an instruction directed to the particular point. But in the present case the giving of the instructions we have quoted is, in substance, the equivalent of a refusal to give an instruction authorizing the jury to find a verdict of guilty against defendant, under the aforesaid section of the Penal Code, provided the evidence justified it. In many cases we have held the judge justified in refusing instructions bearing upon lower grades of crime included in the charge laid by the information. These cases have arisen where, under the evidence, it was entirely plain no such crime was committed. In the present case we are unable to say that the evidence does not disclose the character of assault described in section 245.

The conclusion at which we have arrived is in no degree conflicting with the cases of People v. Arnold, 116 Cal. 687, 48 Pac. 803; People v. Scott, 93 Cal. 516, 29 Pac. 123; People v. Barney, 114 Cal. 558, 47 Pac. 41; and People v. Guidice, 73 Cal. 226, 15 Pac. 44. In all of those cases the court gave no instruction whatever bearing upon the question, while in this case the court, for all the practical purposes of the trial, did give an instruction which was wrong in law. Again, in all those cases the evidence did not justify an instruction as to the particular grade of crime included in the information. Here the evidence does justify such an instruction. An additional reason is given in some of those cases showing why there was no error committed by the trial court. That reason is to the effect that no instruction by defendant was asked bearing upon the point involved. The trial judge, of his own motion, should inform the jury in every case as to all the particular crimes involved in the information which the evidence to any extent tends to support. Such is a most commendable practice; but here we are not concerned in that matter, for we have a case much stronger than one where the court did not act at all. It is not a case of nonaction, but erroneous action. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

WILLIAMS et al. v. BERGIN et al.
(S. F. 1,027.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 12, 1899.)
MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENTS—APPEAL FROM ASSESSMENT—PETITION.

Under St. 1885, p. 156, § 11, providing that an appeal from an assessment shall be taken to the board of supervisors "within 30 days after the day of the warrant," the petition on appeal must show that a warrant was in fact issued, and the order of the board of supervisors that a warrant be set aside is insufficient to supply the deficiency.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Leo C. Williams and others against Thomas I. Bergin and others. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. Thomas I. Bergin, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment. Defendants interposed a demurrer, both general and special. The demurrer was sustained, and, plaintiffs declining to amend, judgment was entered against them. From this judgment they appeal.

The suit was upon a second assessment ordered by the board of supervisors after a successful appeal by the plaintiffs from the first assessment. The board of supervisors acts judicially in hearing and determining such an appeal. Its jurisdiction is limited, and the mode prescribed by the statute for acquiring jurisdiction must be strictly followed. Not only this, but, when reliance is had upon the judgment of such a tribunal as the foundation for an asserted right, it must be shown by proper averment that the tribunal had jurisdiction to render the judgment in question. Williams v. Bergin, 108 Cal. 169, 41 Pac. 287. By the statute the time of appeal is limited upon the date of the warrant. The party aggrieved shall appeal "within thirty days after the date of the warrant." Street Law (St. 1885, p. 156) § 11. We might be willing to hold that an appeal from an assessment taken before the date of the warrant would be within the requirements of this provision, construing it merely as fixing a time after which an appeal could not be taken. But, in any event, it must be made to appear that a warrant was in fact issued, and this the complaint under consideration fails to do. The averment is that the plaintiffs and contractors, "feeling aggrieved by an act and determination of the superintendent of streets in relation to an assessment made and issued by said superintendent of streets May 6, 1892, for the sums due for said work so contracted for and performed, * * * appealed to the board of supervisors of the said city and county from said assessment; briefly stating in said notice their objections, in writing, * * * and filing the same with the clerk of said board on the 14th day of May, 1892." Then follow averments of notice of the posting and of the hearing, and the resolution or order of the board of supervisors is set forth in extenso. By that order it was resolved "that the assessment, warrant, and diagram made and issued by the superintendent of streets * * * be, and is hereby, set aside, and the superintendent of streets is hereby directed to make and issue a new assessment, warrant, and diagram, correcting the error made in the former assessment hereby set aside." But this order of the board of supervisors that a warrant be set aside does not amount even to an argumentative or inferential declaration in the complaint that such a warrant was ever issued. As the law has seen fit to make the right of appeal and its time depend upon the date of the warrant, the supervisors would not acquire jurisdiction to hear an appeal taken in a case in which no warrant had in fact been issued. The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

CALIFORNIA MORTG. & SAV. BANK v. HAMPTON. (L. A. 567.)

DEEDS—CONSTRUCTION BY ACTS OF PARTIES—QUIETING TITLE—JUDGMENT—ANSWER.

1. Defendant conveyed part of a tract of land, and a fence was constructed by him and a subsequent grantee so as to include the land described in the conveyance and an additional piece belonging to him, and the land was subsequently conveyed to plaintiff by a description following the line of the fence. Defendant claimed that after the fence was constructed he discovered that it included too much land, and so notified the owner, but took no steps to have it moved, and allowed it to remain for 20 years, and in conveying an adjoining piece had it surveyed, and used a description corresponding to the line of the fence. Held, in an action to quiet title to the additional piece on the ground that it should have been included in the original conveyance by defendant, that the subsequent acts of the parties had established plaintiff's title.

2. Where, for 23 years previous to an action to quiet title, defendant had maintained a dam across a stream at a point where it intersected the line between his land and the land in controversy, thereby backing the water over a part of the land involved so as to divert it into his ditch, and in the action, while alleging title to the land, he fails to allege a right to flow it, merely alleging riparian rights in the stream, he cannot complain that the judgment declaring that he had no interest in the land, but allowing him to maintain the dam, does not also give him the right to divert the water, and flow plaintiff's land.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county.

Action by California Mortgage & Savings Bank against George W. Hampton and Julia H. Hampton. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Spencer, for appellants. Venable & Goodchild, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to quiet title. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from an order denying motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

It appears that in 1876 defendants were the owners of the S. ½ of the S. E. ¼ of section 22, township 30 S., range 12 E., situated in San Luis Obispo county. They in that year conveyed to one Andrews, by metes and bounds, a portion of said land by the description given in the answer, to which defendants disclaim ownership. In 1877 Andrews conveyed this piece of land by the same description to one Breed, and he, in 1887, conveyed the land by the same description to one Dutton, and he, in 1897, by the same description, conveyed it to plaintiff, and 10 days thereafter conveyed by quitclaim to plaintiff by the description given in the complaint. This latter description coincides exactly with the tract as it was fenced by Breed, a part of which fence was built by defendants, and which remains to-day the same as when built in 1877. The fenced tract is known as the "Dutton Place." A map attached to the original transcript shows this description by a black line, which follows around the tract as the fence is built; and by a dotted line the land described in the answer is shown when run according to the courses and distances, but disregarding the calls or stations. The map also shows a piece of land formerly owned by defendants, part of the original tract, lying east of the Dutton place, which defendants conveyed to one Preston in 1894. This deed is in evidence, and its calls, so far as they describe the line dividing the Dutton place from defendants' land sold to Preston, coincide with the line of fence built in 1877, and it is in evidence that Hampton assisted in making this Preston survey; and the surveyor, Story, testified that he had no recollection that Hampton told him that he owned any land within the Dutton fence. Dutton testified that he had been in possession of the tract as fenced since 1882, and bought it in 1887, and that no one but himself ever claimed to own it since that time; and he did not admit ownership in anybody else at any time. Hampton testified that he told Breed that he (Breed) had some of his (Hampton's) land inclosed, and he also testified that he so told Dutton, but this latter statement is disputed by Dutton. Hampton also testified that the fence is now where it was built originally in 1887; that he built about 12 or 13 chains of the line, commencing on the south side of his land, and Breed built the balance, and that the fence inclosed about three-quarters of an acre too much because Breed commenced building the line on the second course two chains further south than it should be; that he found this out by measuring the first line with a tape soon after the fence was built, and that he told Breed of it at the time. It seems, however, that he took no steps to have the fence moved, and allowed it to remain for 20 years, and until after Dutton bought; and when he sold the piece of land contiguous to the Dutton place on the east he had it surveyed, and the description which he caused to put in the deed to Preston corresponded with the line of fence, and was a recognition of the correctness of its location. The real controversy centers upon the question whether the first call in the Andrews deed for a line, "north 18.20 chains to post 2," was wrong, and should have been 16.25 chains, as the fence gives it. Aside from the conduct of the parties interested in recognizing the line to be 16.25 chains, as the fence shows it should be, the third call of the Andrews deed, which is 4 chains running north, added to the 16.25 chains, makes 20.25 chains, which nearly corresponds with the actual width (20 chains) of Hampton's entire tract. But if we add 4 chains to 18.20, as the Andrews deed called for in the first line, we have 22.20 chains, or 2 chains north of Hampton's north line. It is, of course, possible that the third line was too long and the first line right; and the second call, which runs to the creek, points that way. It seems, however, that all the calls are to posts, and these monuments would govern, if ascertained, rather than the distance or length given for the line; and, as the fence was built shortly after the Andrews deed was made, it is altogether probable that the fence was built to these established posts as corners and known monuments. At any rate, the subsequent conduct of the parties, we think, should be taken to remove any doubt there may be as to the real fact. It may be added that counsel for respondent state—what is not disputed—that a computation of the acreage according to the fence boundaries makes within the fraction of $\frac{1}{100}$ of an acre of the acreage called for in the Andrews deed (25.70), while, if first line in the Andrews deed is taken as correct, and the third as 2 chains too long, the acreage would be 25.01, or about $\frac{70}{100}$ of an acre less than the deed calls for.

2. The court found that "defendants have no interest in said parcel of land * * * except only that they have the right to maintain a dam across the Stenner creek where the same intersects the east line of said parcel of land, in such manner that the west end of said dam may be (as at present) within said parcel of land." The only evidence as to any claim to the water of this creek was given by Mr. Hampton, upon cross-examination, when called as a witness for plaintiff. He testified: "There is about three-quarters of an acre of land in dispute here, caused by Breed's fence, on the second line from the starting point according to Story's map, being two chains further south than it should be. My water dam backs the water over about one-eighth of this three-quarters of an acre to get it in my ditch, and has done so every year for the past twenty-three years. No one has ever objected to my use of the water until this suit was commenced." The judgment reads: "And the defendants are hereby perpetually debarred from asserting any claim whatever in or to said land, or in or to the waters flowing in Stenner creek on said land, adverse to plaintiff, with the proviso that defendants have the right to maintain a dam across Stenner creek where the same intersects the east line of said parcel of land in such manner that the west end of said dam may be (as at present) within said parcel of land." Appellants complain that this is giving a stone where bread was asked, for the right to erect the dam is of no value if there be no right given to divert the water of the creek thereby as they had been doing for 23 years. Plaintiff claimed the right, as riparian owner, to the water of this creek flowing through its land. Defendants, in their answer, claimed an interest in the water as riparian owners only. Defendants could not have any greater relief than they claimed, and they made no claim as appropriators; indeed, the answer prays for no relief whatever. The evidence is certainly very meager as to defendants' right to the water, and there is none at all as to plaintiff's. As owners of the soil, both plaintiff and defendants were riparian proprietors. The judgment is that defendants shall assert no claim "to the waters flowing in Stenner creek on said land (i. e. plaintiff's land) adverse to plaintiff." We do not understand this to interfere with defendants' rights as riparian proprietors. They have the right adjudged in their favor to erect the dam as heretofore, which seems to be all and more than they asked. If they had desired the further right to flow the lands of plaintiff,—to have an easement to back the water over plaintiff's land,—they should have so alleged in their answer in some appropriate manner. We cannot see that the judgment restrains defendants from using water on their own land as riparian proprietors. It is advised that the judgment and order be affirmed.

ASHTON v. GOLDEN GATE LUMBER CO.
(S. F. 954.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 19, 1899.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—ESTOPPEL TO DENY LANDLORD'S TITLE—PRE-SUMPTION OF TITLE.

1. Where plaintiff had such title under a deed of trust as enabled him to execute a valid lease for a term not exceeding the life of the beneficiary named therein, and defendant entered under said lease, and has never been disturbed in possession, and no one except plaintiff has claimed any right to the rents, he cannot deny plaintiff's title in an action to recover the rents accruing after the death of the beneficiary, though such title ceased on the death of such beneficiary.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 4, providing what presumptions shall be deemed conclusive, declaring that a tenant is not permitted to deny the title of his landlord at the time of the commencement of the relation, the conclusive presumption of the landlord's title having attached, it continues until in some mode recognized by the law it may be rebutted.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Charles Ashton, trustee, against the Golden Gate Lumber Company, to recover rent. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Craig & Meredith, Evans & Meredith, and Lester H. Jacobs, for appellant. Chas. S. Wheeler and Bishop & Wheeler, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Action to recover rent. Findings and judgment were for the defendant, a corporation, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The complaint set out an indenture of lease, executed by the parties hereto in January, 1892, whereby the plaintiff leased to the defendant a parcel of ground 275 feet by 137.6, being part of 50-vara block No. 99, in the city of San Francisco, for the term of 15 years, at a specified rental, payable monthly, and alleged possession taken by defendant thereunder, which possession has been ever since continued, and that the rent for certain months in the year 1895 had not been paid. For a first defense the defendant denied each and every allegation of the complaint. For a second defense it was alleged that on October 19, 1887, Solomon Heydenfeldt, being the owner in fee simple of said premises, executed and delivered to the plaintiff a deed, conveying to him the said leased premises, in trust: "First, to take and hold possession of said land, and to rent and lease the same to as great extent as I could or might do before the execution of these presents." The second, third, fourth, and fifth items provided, in substance, that the trustee should collect the rents, pay the taxes, etc., and, after retaining 5 per cent. of the rents as compensation, to pay, so far as the rents were sufficient, for the boarding, lodging, washing, office rent, and clothing of the party of the third part (Solomon Heydenfeldt, Jr.), and any surplus also to be paid to him. "Sixth. Upon the death of the party of the third part, leaving children, the trust shall end, and the property be conveyed to such children. If he shall die, leaving no children, then to convey the same to the party of the first part, or, in case of his death, to his right heirs." This defense further alleged that said deed of trust constituted plaintiff's only title; that said indenture of lease was entered into during the lifetime of said Solomon Heydenfeldt, Jr., who afterwards died on the — day of —, 1894; that at the time of his death said Solomon Heydenfeldt, the grantor in said deed of trust, was dead; that said trust estate granted to the plaintiff ceased and determined upon the death of Solomon Heydenfeldt, Jr.; that plaintiff was thereby divested of all title to said premises, and of all title to or interest in said indenture of lease, and had no longer any right, power, or authority to collect the rents, issues, or profits of said premises; and that the rents sought to be recovered herein all accrued since he was divested of his title by the death of Solomon Heydenfeldt, Jr. The third defense alleged the making of the said trust deed and lease; the death of the grantor, and the said beneficiary; that the plaintiff was authorized to lease said premises for a term not exceeding the life of Solomon Heydenfeldt, Jr.; that said lease determined at his death; and that since that time defendant has not occupied said premises as the tenant or lessee of the plaintiff, but by and with the consent of the owners thereof. The defendant also filed a cross complaint, setting out the same facts, and alleging that the plaintiff claims, adversely to the defendant, that said lease has not terminated, but is still in full force; that said claim is without right; and that plaintiff has no just claim whatever,—and prayed that said adverse claim be determined, and for a decree that said lease ended and ceased with the life of Solomon Heydenfeldt, Jr., and that defendant is under no obligation to pay rent to the plaintiff. Demurrers interposed by plaintiff to the second and third defenses, and the cross complaint, were overruled, and plaintiff answered said cross complaint.

The court found that the lease was executed as alleged; that defendant entered under it, and has ever since remained in possession, and has not been ousted therefrom, or restored or surrendered the same to plaintiff; that plaintiff has performed all the conditions on his part; that the rent for the time mentioned in the complaint has not been paid, though demanded; that Heydenfeldt was the owner of the premises at the date of the execution of said deed of trust; that plaintiff's only title was as trustee under said deed; that he had no other power or authority to lease said premises or collect the rents than that given by said deed; that Solomon Heydenfeldt, Sr., died in September, 1890, and that Solomon Heydenfeldt, Jr., died in 1894, unmarried, and without children; that plaintiff's trust estate ceased upon his death; that plaintiff was thereby divested of all title to said lands, and of all right to collect said rents; that defendant has not since occupied the premises as tenant or lessee of the plaintiff; and that no person has objected to the occupancy thereof by the defendant. It was further found "that no person has made any claim, prior to the commencement of this action, to the possession or for the rental thereof, or any claim at all concerning said premises against defendant adversely to the plaintiff," and "that, as a matter of fact, said Ashton has made no conveyance of said premises to any person or at all." The finding touching defendant's cross complaint was in accordance with its allegations. As conclusions of law the court found that plaintiff was not entitled to recover in this action, and also "that defendant is entitled to a decree adjudging the matters and things set forth in the decree signed by the court contemporaneously herewith, and to be filed herewith, which said decree counsel have stipulated and agreed may for all purposes be considered part of these conclusions of law." Said decree gives a construction of the trust deed, and the powers and rights of the trustee thereunder, in accordance with the contentions of defendant that it is under no obligation to the plaintiff to pay rent, or perform any obligation of said lease, and concludes as follows: "And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff, Charles Ashton, trustee, and any and all persons claiming under or through him as such trustee, or under or through him as the lessor in said lease set forth in plaintiff's complaint, or under any of the covenants in said lease, be, and they hereby are, restrained and forever enjoined from asserting such claims, and each and all of them, against said defendant." Several exceptions were taken by the plaintiff during the trial, and his motion for a new trial was based upon these, and upon certain specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings. The questions involved in this appeal, however, are radical, and may be discussed without special reference to the exceptions or specifications, further than to say they are sufficient to authorize such discussion.

It is conceded by respondent that Ashton had such title and authority under the deed of trust as enabled him to execute the lease, and that it was valid for a term not exceeding the life of Solomon Heydenfeldt, Jr.; that defendant entered under said lease; that it has never been evicted, or its possession disturbed; and that no one, except the plaintiff, has ever claimed any right to receive or collect any rent or other compensation for defendant's use and occupation of the premises, the possession of which it received from the plaintiff under said lease. But it is claimed that, Solomon Heydenfeldt, Jr., having died, plaintiff's estate and title, and his right and authority to collect the rents, thereupon ceased, and that the defendant may plead such expiration of plaintiff's title as a bar to his action to recover the rents accruing after the death of the life beneficiary. No general proposition of law is better sustained by the authorities, or has a firmer foundation in a wise public policy, than that a tenant who has received possession from his landlord is not permitted to deny the title of his lessor while the relation thus created subsists; but, as against the tenant, the title of the landlord is conclusively presumed to be perfect and valid. Respondent, however, contends that this proposition is limited or qualified by section 1962, subd. 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure. This section provides: "The following presumptions, and no others, are deemed conclusive: * * *

(4) A tenant is not permitted to deny the title of his landlord at the time of the commencement of the relation." That is, as to the tenant, the presumption that the landlord had title at the commencement of the relation is conclusive. After that time the presumption that the landlord has title continues, but it is not conclusive. But how, and to what extent may it be rebutted? The burden of showing that the landlord's title has ceased is upon the tenant. The conclusive presumption declared by the Code having attached, it must continue until in some mode and under circumstances recognized by the law it may be rebutted; otherwise, the tenant may accept a lease and enter into possession to-day, and tomorrow repudiate the lessor's title, and hold possession in hostility to a title which the day before was conclusively presumed to be valid and beyond the power of the tenant to deny.

It is contended by respondent, however, that Ashton's title was terminated by the death of Solomon Heydenfeldt, Jr., and that by the same event the lease was terminated, and, as the rent sued for accrued after the termination of the lease, the trustee could not maintain an action therefor. But if it be conceded that, as between Ashton, as trustee, and the right heirs of Solomon Heydenfeldt, the remainder-men, the trustee's title had ceased, it does not follow that the tenant, who was put in possession by the trustee under a lease for a term of years, could plead such determination of his landlord's title in an action for rent. The termination of the landlord's title, so long as the tenant remains in the undisturbed and unquestioned possession of the leasehold, no claim or demand for rent or compensation having been made by the successor in interest of the lessor, or by any person other than the lessor under whom he entered, is a matter of no concern to the tenant, and constitutes no defense to this action. If respondent's contention is sound, a tenant, having received possession from his landlord, may refuse to pay rent, though not disturbed in his possession by threat or otherwise, and even without asserting title in himself, and without surrendering possession, may, when sued for rent, litigate his landlord's title, and have it declared void, invalid, or worthless, and his right to remain in possession without accountability for rent quieted by a solemn decree of the court. Respondent has in no way connected itself with the title or right of the heirs of plaintiff's grantor, or with any other owner, real or assumed, claiming in hostility to the plaintiff. Even if it had attorned to the heirs of Heydenfeldt, Sr., it would have availed nothing, since "the attornment of a tenant to a stranger is void, unless it is made with the consent of the landlord, or in consequence of a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction." Civ. Code, § 1948; Thompson v. Pioche, 44 Cal. 508, 515. "A tenant cannot justify his attornment to a third party by merely showing that such party has recovered judgment against him for the possession of the premises. He must go further, and show that his landlord was notified of the pendency of the action, and had an opportunity to defend; otherwise, the landlord is neither bound nor estopped by the judgment." Douglas v. Fulda, 45 Cal. 592. In Schilling v. Holmes, 23 Cal. 227, 230, after speaking of the duty of the tenant, who has been dispossessed by a stranger, to take legal proceedings to recover possession, that he may discharge his duty of surrendering possession to his landlord, the court said: "But, until the tenant has performed this duty of restoring full and complete possession to his landlord, he still remains liable to the latter for rent. His liability to pay the rent is not discharged by an eviction, unless under a title superior to his landlord's, or by some agency of the landlord." In Ghirardelli v. Greene, 56 Cal. 629, it is said: "The real questions in issue were the making of the lease, the entry under it, and rent due. If the defendants entered under a lease, they could not dispute the title of their landlord. If they did not enter under a lease, he could not recover in this action, because he based his right to recover upon such a lease. Therefore the defendant's allegation of title in somebody else raised an immaterial issue, and that allegation might have been stricken out or disregarded altogether." In Reynolds v. Lewis, 59 Cal. 20, it was said: "Lewis appears to have occupied the land with the permission of Reynolds, and he cannot avoid the payment of the value of its use and occupation to Reynolds, on the ground that the latter had no right to lease the land to him."

The cases cited by respondent to the proposition "that a tenant may always show, if he can, that his landlord no longer holds title," remain to be noticed. McDevitt v. Sullivan, 8 Cal. 593, 596, is not in point. It was contended by the plaintiff in that case that Sullivan was estopped to deny McDevitt's title. But the court said: "Sullivan did not obtain possession under McDevitt, and he is not estopped from showing that the attornment to McDevitt was made under a mistake of fact." That case was, therefore, within a recognized exception to the general rule. Corrigan v. City of Chicago, 144 Ill. 537, 33 N. E. 746, has no application to any question in this case. There the property was leased for a term of years, and afterwards the whole of the property covered by the lease was condemned and paid for by the city for street purposes, and it was held that the whole of the title, both of the landlord and tenant, was extinguished, and the tenant thereby relieved from the payment of rent, and that the tenant could plead such extinguishment in bar of an action for rent accruing thereafter. In Lamson v. Clarkon, 113 Mass. 348, the plaintiff had an estate in the premises for the life of Lancy, and leased to defendant for one year, rent payable monthly. Lancy died during the term, and this action was for rent accruing after his death. Drake owned the reversion, and served notice on the tenant not to pay rent to Lamson. Defendant knew of Lancy's death, and of Drake's claim to title. The defendant refused to pay to either until he could ascertain where the title was. This suit was brought by Lamson, the lessor, after the term expired. A judgment for the plaintiff was reversed.

The distinction between these cases and the one at bar is too clear to require elaboration, and no others are cited to this point by respondent. In Bigelow, Estop. (5th Ed.) 511, it is said: "But, permissive possession being the ground of the modern estoppel, it is clear that the estoppel will prevail so long as such possession continues, though the contract of lease was void. And the authorities upon this point are numerous." See Bailey v. Kilburn, 10 Metc. (Mass.) 176; Miller v. Lang, 99 Mass. 13; Morrison v. Bassett, 26 Minn. 235, 2 N. W. 851; Nims v. Sherman, 43 Mich. 45, 4 N. W. 434; Doe dem. Bullen v. Mills, 2 Adol. & E., 17; Fleming v. Gooding, 10 Bing. 549. In Nims v. Sherman, supra, Mr. Justice Cooley, speaking for the court, said: "One who is a tenant in fact, it is justly held, shall not dispute the title under which he has obtained possession, even though he has since acquired a better title; but, when he has surrendered the possession obtained by means of the tenancy, he may at once turn about and try titles with his late landlord." The foregoing principles are directly sustained in Palmtag v. Dourtrick, 59 Cal. 154 (a case of bailment), and Jeffers v. Easton, 113 Cal. 345, 45 Pac. 680. In both of these cases the rule stated by Wilde, J. (6 Rob. Prac. 364), is quoted, thus: "If the lessee is disturbed in his occupation by a party having a title paramount to that of his lessor, so that he cannot legally continue his occupation under the lessor without rendering himself liable to the other party, he may yield the possession, and take a new lease under him, or he may abandon the possession, and, in either case, he will thereafter not be liable to pay rent to the original lessor. Such an entry and disturbance are equivalent to an ouster."

Eliminating from the findings of fact those expressions which are mere conclusions of law, they require a judgment for the plaintiff as prayed for, and I therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for the plaintiff as prayed for.

We concur: COOPER, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for the plaintiff as prayed for.

VENUE—AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS—SUSPENSION OF CASE BY MOTION FOR CHANGE OF VENUE.

1. An affidavit to the effect that defendant has fully and fairly stated the case to his attorneys, and is advised by them and believes that he has a valid defense on the merits, is a sufficient affidavit of merits to support a motion for a change of venue.

2. While a motion for a change of venue is pending, the court has no power to pass on a demurrer to the complaint.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by M. J. Nolan and C. A. Smith against M. B. McDuffie. From an order denying a motion for change of venue, defendant appeals. Reversed.

C. A. Stark, Richards & Carrier, and Hatch, Miller & Brown, for appellant. W. R. Bacon, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Action brought in Los Angeles county to recover commissions on sale of real property by plaintiffs as agents of defendant. Complaint was filed May 24, 1897. The matter is here on appeal from an order denying defendant's motion for change of place of trial to Santa Barbara county. The proceedings, as they appear from the transcript, were as follows: On June 15, 1897, defendant made an affidavit of merits, and on the same day signed a demand, directed to plaintiffs' attorneys, that the place of trial be changed; and on the same day defendant's attorneys signed a notice, directed to plaintiffs' attorneys, stating that defendant would on June 30, 1897, at 10 o'clock a. m., or as soon thereafter as counsel could be heard, move for a change of the place of trial, and that the motion would be heard "upon affidavits, copies of which are herewith served upon you, and upon the demand to change the place of trial, and the papers on file in the case," etc. Defendant also on the same day served upon plaintiffs' attorneys a general demurrer to the complaint. These papers were all duly served on plaintiffs' counsel and filed. "On the 28th day of June, 1897, said demurrer came on regularly to be heard on the law and motion calendar of said court, and the same, being called for argument, was answered 'Ready' by plaintiffs' counsel, the defendant not being present nor consenting to the hearing; and the court, having no knowledge of demand for change of place of trial, took up said demurrer and complaint, and passed upon the same, sustaining said demurrer, on said 28th day of June, 1897." It appears, also, that on the 30th day of June, 1897, the hearing of defendant's demand for change of place of trial "came on for hearing before said court, and the court, being of the opinion that the affidavit of merits was insufficient, granted defendant leave to amend the same; and the further hearing of the matter was continued until July 14, 1897, at which time the defendant filed the following amended affidavit of merits." Then follows this affidavit. It appears that the matter came on for hearing again on July 14, 1897, the day fixed by the court, when defendant's motion was denied on the grounds (1) that the first affidavit of merits was insufficient, but in what respect is not shown; and (2) "that the demurrer heretofore filed in said cause by said defendant had been passed on by the court and sustained, and the application for a change of venue came too late." Defendant appeals from the order denying his motion. Respondents have filed no brief.

The affidavit first served stated as follows: "I reside in the county of Santa Barbara, state of California, and have so resided for more than five years last past. I further say that I have fully and fairly stated the case in this cause to [naming his attorneys], and after such statement I am by them and each of them advised, and verily believe, that I have a good and substantial defense on the merits to the said action." This affidavit was sufficient. Watkins v. Degener, 63 Cal. 500; Buell v. Dodge, Id. 553. The motion to change the place of trial was pending when the demurrer was passed upon, of which plaintiffs' counsel had notice. The absence of defendant's counsel on law day when the demurrer was called did not authorize the court to hear the demurrer. It was the duty of the court to hear and determine the motion before it could hear or determine the demurrer, and, if the defendant had been found to be entitled to have his motion granted, it was the right of defendant to have all other judicial action in the cause determined in the superior court of his own county. The court had no power to act upon the demurrer when it did (Brady v. Times-Mirror Co., 106 Cal. 56, 39 Pac. 209), and its order in that regard is a nullity. I advise that the order denying defendant's motion be reversed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order denying defendant's motion is reversed

MENDOCINO COUNTY v. JOHNSON et al.
(S. F. 1,154.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 11, 1899.)

TAX COLLECTOR—ACTION BY COUNTY AGAINST BONDSMEN—DUTIES OF AUDITOR AND TREASURER—EVIDENCE—AMENDMENT OF COMPLAINT.

1. In an action against the bondsmen of a tax collector, proof that at the end of his term he was in default makes a prima facie case, and the burden of showing payment is on the defendants.

2. In an action against the bondsmen of a tax collector to recover money not paid in by the collector, evidence offered to show that the money was actually paid was excluded by the court because no evidence was offered to show that the payment was in compliance with County Government Act 1891, § 115 (St. 1891, p. 323), requiring that all payments must be authorized by the auditor before the treasurer can receive them. Held, that the evidence should have been admitted, as tending to show that the county had received the benefit of the money, and that there was no actual default.

3. In an action against bondsmen for the default of a tax collector, the complaint alleged that certain amounts had been collected, and certain amounts paid in, leaving a deficiency. Defendants offered evidence of other payments, not accounted for in the complaint. Held, that it was error to exclude this evidence on the ground that by amending the complaint the plaintiff could add the amount to both sides of the account, and still leave the same deficiency.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county.

Action on a tax collector's bond by the county of Mendocino against J. R. Johnson and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

R. McGarvey and J. A. Cooper, for appellants. Geo. A. Sturtevant, J. Q. White, and J. D. Pemberton, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action brought by the county of Mendocino against J. R. Johnson, formerly its tax collector, and against the sureties upon his official bond, to recover the sum of $3,000, moneys which it is alleged were collected by the tax collector and not accounted for by him in accordance with law. The cause was tried by a jury, which rendered a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $2,886.80. From the judgment which followed, and from the order denying defendants a new trial, they prosecute these appeals.

The complaint alleged that the defendant Johnson, as tax collector, on and after the 1st day of October, 1894, and before the 7th day of January, 1895, collected and received the sum of $132,884.69, which he should have paid into the treasury of the county on or before the 7th day of January, 1895, "but that he did not pay prior to the 7th day of January, 1895, and has not since, of the moneys aforesaid paid into the treasury of said county, any other or greater sum than $129,897.69. Plaintiff's case rested mainly upon the testimony of the county treasurer, who said that upon the 18th day of December Mr. Handy, the deputy tax collector, had demanded of him a receipt for $3,000, which he asserted he had paid into the treasury upon the 11th day of December preceding; and Handy stated, according to the testimony of the county treasurer: "I came in, and you were out of your office. I set it down on the floor. I went out, and then went to my office to get more money, and forgot to come back." He testified further that Handy had said that he obtained the money from Mr. Redemeyer's bank upon that day, and that Redemeyer had accompanied him when he left the money. The treasurer then asked Mr. Redemeyer if Handy had obtained the money from him, and Mr. Redemeyer answered, "Yes; I come with him." Under these circumstances the treasurer says he gave to the tax collector a receipt for $3,000 more than was paid him. He also in January and in February made his sworn statements, as required by law, to the effect that this $3,000 had actually been paid in and was in his possession. He further testified that his books showed that he had not received the $3,000, and that in a subsequent conversation with Mr. Redemeyer (the banker with whom the tax collector seems to have deposited funds awaiting the time of his settlement with the treasurer) the latter informed him that he was mistaken when he said that he had accompanied Handy upon the 11th; that Handy had drawn $3,000 from the bank upon the 11th, but that he had not accompanied Handy, and did not know what disposition Handy had made of the money.

1. The treasurer's examination was carried over the payments made to him by the tax collector in October, November, and December, 1894. He also swore that he had received nothing from the tax collector in the year 1895, up to and including the 7th day of January. Plaintiff, it will be remembered, charged the tax collector with the receipt of the sum of $132,000, and then alleged that of this sum he had not prior to the 7th day of January, and had not since that date, paid in any other or greater amount than the sum of $129,000. The 7th day of January, 1895, was the date of the expiration of the tax collector's term. It was the date when by law he was required to make his settlement with the auditor and treasurer, but, if he failed to make his settlement upon that date, and did thereafter pay in full all of the moneys due from him to the county, the particular cause of action charged upon here would not lie. It was therefore essential for the plaintiff to aver defendant's default and failure to pay the money, and it was equally essential to follow the averment by proof, for issue was joined upon this question. But the averment was supported by sufficient evidence when it was shown that the tax collector did not pay over all of the moneys due to the county upon the 7th day of January. The tax collector's default was then shown, and the burden of proof thereupon shifted to him to prove payment. The defense of payment may be made under the general issue, but the burden of proof is on the defendant. Frisch v. Caler, 21 Cal. 71; Wetmore v. City of San Francisco, 44 Cal. 294; 2 Greenl. Ev. (Lewis' Ed.) § 516. The verdict is therefore supported by the evidence.

2. When the deputy tax collector was called to the witness stand by the defendants in their effort to prove by him that he had actually paid the $3,000 into the treasury, and that the treasurer's receipt therefor was not secured by fraud or misrepresentation, but was a valid recognition of the payment thus actually made, it was objected upon behalf of the plaintiff that the forms of payment prescribed by the county government act of 1891 were not followed, and that, therefore, the evidence was inadmissible. Those forms are established by section 115 of the county government act of 1891 (St. 1891, p. 323), and by section 71 of the same act (Id. p. 316). It is made the duty of the auditor to examine and settle the accounts of all persons indebted to the county and holding moneys payable into the county treasury, and thereafter, upon the presentation and filing of the treasurer's receipt for such money, the auditor shall give to such person his discharge, and charge the treasurer with the amount named in the receipt. The treasurer is forbidden to receive any money into the treasury unless accompanied by the certificate of the auditor. After discussion the court ruled in the following language: "You want to show from this witness that he paid three thousand dollars into that treasury on the 11th of December, without any authority on the part of the treasurer to receive it. The evident object of that provision is to throw a safeguard around the public funds. The objection is sustained to this. I have no doubt about it. I sustain the objection. I sustain the objection, unless you say that you expect to follow the testimony up by showing that he has complied with section 115 of the county government act; that he first went to the auditor, and that the auditor examined the account, and that he settled it; and that he gave a certificate to the tax collector authorizing him to deposit those three thousand dollars in the treasury." A payment to the treasurer in a mode other than that expressly provided by law would not exonerate the tax collector or his bondsmen from an action at the instance of the county, unless further proof were made that the county actually received the money. In other words, the tax collector, or any other debtor of the county, is entitled to his acquittance from the county only when he has complied with the forms of law governing his payments into the treasury. If he sees fit to adopt an unauthorized mode of payment, he will be exonerated when he can make it appear, not only that he has paid the money, but that the county has received it. The mere deposit with the treasurer would not be proof sufficient thus to exonerate him. It would be in the nature of an individual deposit made at the party's private risk. But, nevertheless, if the tax collector could show that he had in fact paid the money to the treasurer and that the county had obtained the benefit of it, then, notwithstanding the irregularity no loss of funds would have resulted, and neither the tax collector nor his bondsmen could be properly charged in an action such as this for speculation or misappropriation. Therefore, although the offered evidence of the irregular payment would not have been sufficient of itself to exonerate the defendants, it was a step in that direction; and it was error upon the part of the court to refuse to accept the evidence without proof first made of a compliance with the terms of the county government act, since that proof, from the loose methods seemingly employed by the treasurer and auditor, as well as the tax collector, could never be made at all, not only as to the $3,000 here in question, but perhaps also as to the whole $132,000 charged upon.

3. The court excluded evidence of four payments aggregating $3,361.23 made by the tax collector to the treasurer, as shown by the treasurer's receipts. The respondent adopts the decision of the judge in denying the motion for a new trial, and therein it is conceded that the rejected evidence was competent evidence, which should have been admitted; but it is said that defendants were not injured by it because "plaintiff, by amendment, would simply charge him with all that he showed was paid in as tax collector over the amount alleged, and credit him accordingly, still leaving the error of three thousand dollars on the 18th to be accounted for by him." If the evidence was competent,—and it seems to have been,—it should have been admitted; nor can its rejection be justified upon the ground that the plaintiff might thereafter have amended its complaint.

We think that what has been said renders unnecessary a consideration of other matters urged by appellants; and for the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

BAYLEY v. EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ASSUR. CORP. OF LONDON, ENGLAND, Limited. (S. F. 857.)¹

INSURANCE—ACCIDENT POLICY—WAIVER—KNOWLEDGE OF OFFICERS AND AGENTS.

The omission by an applicant for an accident insurance policy to state in his written application that he had received compensation for previous accidents, as required by said application, will not avoid such policy, when the officers of the insurance company knew, when the application was made, that he had received indemnity from it and other companies for such accidents.

In bank. Affirmed.

For opinion in department, see 56 Pac. 638.

Van Ness & Redman, for appellant. Chickering, Thomas & Gregory, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an action on a policy of accident insurance. The case was tried with a jury in the court below, and the verdict and judgment went for the plaintiff. The appeal is taken from the judgment and order denying a new trial. The assured, George B. Bayley, was killed by an accident, and the plaintiff, his widow, is the person in whose favor the policy ran. There are two questions presented by the appellant: First, that the assured represented, in his written application for the policy, that he had never proposed and been declined insurance by an accident insurance company, and that this was not true; second, that he represented in said application that he had never received compensation for any accident, whereas he had in November, 1892, and also in the year 1886, received compensation on account of injuries he had sustained by previous accidents.

The first defense is eliminated from consideration here by the fact that the verdict of the jury was against the defendant, and the evidence bearing upon that defense was materially conflicting, and hence the verdict cannot be disturbed.

As to the second defense: In the application the fifteenth statement is as follows: "I have never received compensation for any accident except as herein stated (names of companies or associations with amount of compensation); and there was no statement as to any compensation being received. It was shown, however, that the deceased had been paid for an accident in 1892, and also in 1886. But at the time of the application for the policy in question the defendant company and its officers knew that the assured, Bayley, had received payments in 1892, not only from its own company, but from three others. Mr. Okell, the general manager of the defendant on this coast, testified: "I understood that other payments had been made to him. Q. Did you ever notify the company, or any of the officials of your company, outside of your own agency here in San Francisco, that such payments had been made? A. No, it was not necessary." And he further testified: "I knew in November, 1892, that Bayley had been paid by other companies weekly indemnity claims under accident policies held by him. I knew that other companies had paid him, but I did not remember the names of the companies. * * * I knew Mr. Bayley in his lifetime. I had a conversation with him at or about the time that the policy issued in this case was applied for, in regard to the issuance of it. He came into my private office, and asked me if I would be willing to issue a twenty thousand dollar policy to him, and, knowing no reason why I should not, I said I would. I should think it was a few days before the issuance of the policy." Mr. Thompson, the clerk and cashier of the general manager here, was asked: "I will ask you why it is that if, as cashier of the company at that time, you knew that Bayley had received compensation from the Employers' Liability Company, you did not change or correct the statement, 'I have never received compensation for any accident except as herein stated.' A. Seeing the loss had been paid by our own company, and the new application written in the same, there was no necessity of making that note on it as to the payment of our own loss." In Menk v. Insurance Co., 76 Cal. 53, 14 Pac. 837, and 18 Pac. 117, in the opinion in bank, it is said: "If the agent, knowing all the essential facts, made out the application for plaintiff, the company cannot take advantage of defective statements contained in it as not complying with the requirements of the company; nor would misstatements be fatal to the claim of plaintiff which the agent well knew to be false when he made out the application, received the money of the applicant, and issued the policy. The tendency of the decisions is plainly to hold all those conditions waived which, to the knowledge of the agent, would make the policy void as soon as delivered; otherwise the company would knowingly receive the money of the applicant without value returned, and the whole transaction would be a palpable fraud." Kruger v. Insurance Co., 72 Cal. 91, 13 Pac. 156. In Bacon on Benefit Societies and Life Insurance (volume 2, par. 427) it is said: "And if, when the insurance company issues a policy, it knows that certain answers in the ap-

But it is contended that, although the company may be deemed to have waived any mention of the payments made in 1892, of which it had knowledge, still it was necessary for Bayley to insert the payment made to the Travelers' Company in 1886. It will be seen from the form of the application, dates and different times compensation had been made were not required; only "names of companies or associations, with amount of compensation." But the defendant already knew that the Travelers' Company had paid Bayley, and therefore it was not necessary to again mention that company; and, as the dates of payment were not required, it would have been a literal compliance with the form to have added the small amount received in 1886 to the much larger sum, paid in 1892, which latter, as already shown, was waived. The weekly indemnities paid for loss of over nine weeks' time in 1892 were in consequence of severe injuries received by Bayley while descending from the summit of Mt. Tacoma or Rainier. The companies, other than the defendant, paying weekly indemnities for such loss of time, were the Pacific Mutual, Travelers', and Pacific Surety Company. Mr. Okell, general agent of defendant, having knowledge of these facts, says he knew of no reason why he should not insure Bayley for $20,000. Bayley, it seems, had a personal interview with the general agent, and talked matters over with him about issuing the policy, and the company's clerk, Thompson, prepared the application, filling out the blanks, but omitting entirely any mention of prior payments or compensation, although he was well aware such had been made. It is therefore reasonable to suppose Bayley considered the fifteenth paragraph as waived. Neither party to a contract of insurance is bound to communicate information of matters of which the other waives communication, except in answer to inquiries. Civ. Code, § 2564. This case is distinguishable from Insurance Co. v. Nichols (Tex. Civ. App.) 24 S. W. 910, relied upon by the appellant. In that case the insured, in response to a question answered, "None other," which was incorrect. In this case there was no answer or response, and the reason why there was none is apparent. The term "compensation," in the fifteenth subdivision of the application, is, in this connection, in a measure ambiguous and uncertain as to its meaning. An inspection of the policy and application will show that, when payment for loss of time is spoken of, the word "indemnity" is used, and not used where payments are made for loss of life, limb, or eye. The policy pays for several different contingencies: (1) For death, the principal sum; (2) for the loss of two hands, two feet, one entire hand, or one entire foot, or permanent loss of sight of both eyes, principal sum; (3) for loss of one hand or one foot, one-half principal sum; (4) $100 per week so long as insured is wholly disabled from prosecuting any business pertaining to his occupation. In reference to the fourth payment the term "indemnity" is used entirely. Thus, in the policy and indorsement thereon we find: "All sums paid as weekly indemnity * * * shall by so much diminish the said principal in case of claim for said principal." "If the insured is injured in any occupation or exposure classed by this corporation as more hazardous than herein given, his insurance and weekly indemnity shall be," etc. "No claim for weekly indemnity in excess of the money value of the insured time shall be valid." "The total risk taken by this corporation is ——— dollars for loss of life, and ——— dollars weekly indemnity." And the application contains the following: "The amount of insurance against accidental death or permanent total disablement hereby applied for is twenty thousand dollars. The amount of insurance against permanent partial disablement hereby applied for is $10,000. The amount of weekly indemnity for total disabling injuries hereby applied for is $100,000." Further down in the application we find statements as follows: "I have no other accident insurance covering weekly indemnity except as herein stated" (names of companies or associations, and amount of weekly indemnity in each), and there is inserted "Aetna, $10,000." Then comes the subdivision under consideration, already quoted. It would appear from the foregoing that the word "indemnity," and not "compensation," refers to weekly payments. There seems also to be a distinction in the proof of claim whether it is for a weekly indemnity, or loss, as of life, or limb, or sight. Although "compensation," in the popular sense, may be broad enough to include "indemnity," still, if the terms are used by the parties entering into the contract in a special or technical sense, they are to be so understood. Civ. Code, § 1644. "Where the language of a policy may be understood in more senses than one, it is to be construed most strongly against the insurer, because he frames it, and is supposed to make it as potent as possible in his own favor; but, where there is no imperfection or ambiguity in the language, it must be construed, like any other contract, according to the intention of the parties." Rankin v. Insurance Co., 88 Cal. 203, 26 Pac. 872. "It is a general rule that, when a stipulation or exception to a policy of insurance emanating from the insurer is capable of two meanings, the one is to be adopted which is the most favorable to the insured; and, when underwriters have left their design doubtful by using obscure language, the construction to be adopted is the one most unfavorable to them." Merrick v. Insurance Co., 54 Pa. St. 277. "It [the policy of an accident company] insures either indemnity for injury by payment of a special weekly allowance during the time the insured is disabled by the injury, or compensation for death by payment of a fixed sum if the insured dies in consequence of the accident. These two forms of insurance are used separately, or in a joint policy covering both indemnity and compensation." 7 Am. Law Rev. p. 587. The defense urged in this case is purely technical, and does not go to the merits. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

HOLLAND v. McDADE et al. (S. F. 1,123.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 14, 1899.)

APPEAL FROM ORDER DENYING NEW TRIAL—
STAY OF EXECUTION—BOND—HARMLESS ERROR—OVERRULING DEMURRER TO COMPLAINT FOR UNCERTAINTY.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 942, providing that, if the appeal be from a judgment or order directing the payment of money, it does not stay its execution, unless a bond be executed in double the amount named in the judgment or order, an appellant, on appeal from an order denying his motion for a new trial, may give a bond in double the amount of the judgment, and thereby stay its execution.

2. Error in overruling a demurrer to a complaint for uncertainty must have been prejudicial to defendant, and not a mere abstract error, in order to justify a reversal of judgment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Patrick Holland against J. J. McDade and another for damages claimed to have resulted from defendant McDade's refusal, as sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, to release certain property of plaintiff from execution, and also in publishing notice of sale thereof under said execution. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant McDade appeals. Affirmed.

Sullivan & Sullivan, for appellant. T. J. Crowley and T. M. Osmont, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This appeal is from the judgment, without a bill of exceptions, and the questions involved arise upon the face of the complaint. The action is one against McDade, former sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, for damages claimed to have resulted from his refusal to release certain property of plaintiff from execution, and also in publishing notice of sale thereof under said execution. This execution was issued and levied upon a money judgment in the case of Curry against Holland. Holland's motion for a new trial in that case was denied, whereupon he appealed from the order denying the motion, and, without appealing from the judgment, gave a bond upon appeal in double the amount of the judgment, for the purpose of staying its execution. The acts of the sheriff of which complaint is made in the present action were done after this purported stay bond was filed.

The important question presented by the appeal is, may an appellant, upon appeal from an order denying his motion for a new trial, give a bond in double the amount of the judgment, and thereby stay its execution? If he may do so, authority for it must be found in section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure, where it is provided: "If the appeal be from a judgment or order directing the payment of money, it does not stay the execution of the judgment or order unless a written undertaking be executed on the part of the appellant, by two or more sureties, to the effect that they are bound in double the amount named in the judgment or order." By inspection of the foregoing provision of the law, it would seem that very liberal rules of construction must be invoked in order to justify the giving of a stay bond upon an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial. At the same time, it was so directly decided in the comparatively early case of Fulton v. Hanna, 40 Cal. 278. The conclusion there declared is based upon the following reason: "Although an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial is in a different and distinct line of proceeding from a direct appeal from a judgment, still a reversal on appeal from the order denying a motion for a new trial, and remanding the cause for retrial, as effectually vacates the judgment as upon a direct appeal therefrom." The reason here given has force, and the only answer that can be made to its conclusiveness, if there be an answer, is that the statute does not expressly so provide. Yet the rule laid down in the case cited is a most wholesome one, for an appeal from a judgment which is absolutely beyond attack is an idle and useless proceeding. Indeed, such an appeal would be frivolous, and render the appellant liable in damages for bringing that character of appeal before this court. It serves but to incumber the records, and gives unnecessary labor to both lawyers and courts. It certainly should not be held that an appeal of that character must be taken for the single purpose of securing an opportunity to file a stay bond, unless the statute clearly forbids any other course.

The question here involved has never been squarely presented since the case of Fulton v. Hanna. In McCallion v. Society, 83 Cal. 572, 23 Pac. 799, that case is cited, and the court said, "It is not doubted that a stay undertaking can be so drawn as to effect a stay on appeal from an order denying a new trial." In Tompkins v. Montgomery, 116 Cal. 123, 47 Pac. 1007, citing Fulton v. Hanna, it was said, "The right of the appellant to have the execution stayed pending the appeal from an order denying a new trial is not impaired by the fact that the appeal from the judgment is dismissed." And in that case this court allowed a stay bond to be filed here upon an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Tompkins v. Montgomery seems to be in full support of Fulton v. Hanna; for, if the stay bond may be filed in this court upon an appeal from such an order, it must be allowable in the trial court. In that case there was an appeal from the judgment, as well as from the order denying the motion for a new trial, and an unsuccessful attempt was made to give a stay bond in the trial court. The appeal from the judgment was dismissed by this court. Hence there was nothing before this court in the form of an appeal from the judgment at the time the stay bond was allowed to be filed. There is some general language found in the case of Carit v. Williams, 67 Cal. 580, 8 Pac. 93, opposed to the doctrine declared in Fulton v. Hanna, but in their facts the two cases are widely dissimilar. In that case the appeal was from an order made after judgment, refusing to set aside an execution. This execution may have been set aside for a hundred different causes occurring supplemental to the judgment. Hence a reversal of that order would not necessarily set aside the judgment; yet such would be the inevitable effect upon a judgment, of a reversal of the order, in the case of an appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial. For this reason Carit v. Williams clearly falls without the doctrine laid down in Fulton v. Hanna. Again, in Reay v. Butler, 118 Cal. 113, 50 Pac. 375, a case cited by appellant, it was held that a stay bond could not be given upon an appeal from an order refusing to strike out a cost bill. In that case the order was not one made directing the payment of money. Neither could the reversal of the order upon appeal have resulted in vacating and setting aside the judgment. It must be observed, therefore, that these cases are not opposed to Fulton v. Hanna.

Upon broad principles of construction, it has been decided that a single appeal bond of $300 is sufficient upon an appeal from the judgment and from the order denying the motion for a new trial. This shows in what close connection the two appeals are recognized and treated by the court. An appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial is neither more nor less than a direct attack upon the judgment. This is its sole aim and purpose. The question here presented is purely one of practice. In this instance, certainty of the true rule is more to be desired than the particular nature of the rule established. We are fully satisfied that a most wholesome construction of the statute is found in Fulton v. Hanna; and, in view of the fact that the construction there declared has stood so long without successful assault either by the courts or the legislature, we feel that adherence should still be given to it.

We are not prepared to say that substantial error was committed in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the complaint for uncertainty. Conceding the ruling erroneous, still it is not every erroneous ruling of the trial court in this regard that demands a reversal of the judgment. Substantial injury to defendant must have resulted from the action of the court. If this complaint be uncertain as to whether or not some of the alleged damage done by McDade was done before the stay bond was filed, under objection, evidence offered tending to indicate that fact would not have been admitted. Again, the instructions to the jury could readily have protected defendant's right in this regard. There being no bill of exceptions before us, we know nothing that occurred at the trial pertaining to this matter. But defendant had abundant opportunity at that time to protect himself against any disastrous results which might have been occasioned by the uncertainty of the pleading. It is said in Alexander v. Mill Co., 104 Cal. 536, 38 Pac. 411: "It is not in all cases where error has been committed by trial courts in overruling demurrers to complaints upon the grounds of ambiguity or uncertainty that this court will order a reversal of the judgment, based upon the trial of the issues made by the complaint and answer. The same rule applies to errors of this character as is invoked as to all other errors of the court. It must not be mere abstract error, but it must be prejudicial and injurious error, in order to avail appellant, for otherwise he has no cause of complaint." We are satisfied there is no prejudicial error disclosed upon this point.

We find no merit in the plea of the statute of limitations.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

HELLMAN v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (L. A. 687.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—LOCATION OF STREETS—SUFFICIENCY OF CROSS COMPLAINT—EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY.

1. In an action to quiet title to land abutting on a street, a cross complaint by the city, seeking to establish the street line across the land, must set out with certainty the limits of the street, in order that the parties may know what land is alleged to encroach on the street.

2. In an action to determine the boundary of a street, evidence was introduced showing that defendant had occupied the land up to the present line for 25 years, that the other landowners built up to that line, and that the street was paved, using the present line as a boundary, and assessments made accordingly. On the other hand, there was no evidence showing the line to be different, except incompetent testimony of surveyors, based on notoriously inaccurate surveys. Held, that the evidence did not support a decision changing the line.

3. In an action to determine the location of a street line under a former survey, testimony of surveyors was offered. Their results were obtained by an accurate survey, using one established street as a basis. The former survey was notoriously inaccurate. Held, that this testimony was incompetent to show where the street had been under the inaccurate survey.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by H. W. Hellman against the city of Los Angeles and others. From a decree establishing a street as prayed by a cross complaint of the city, the other defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. E. Dunn and Brown & Newby, for appellants. McKinley & Graff, Graves, Omelveny & Shankland, and Gardner, Harris & Rodman, for respondent.

GRAY, C. This action was commenced by the plaintiff against the city of Los Angeles to quiet title to a certain lot of land at the northeast corner of Spring and Fourth streets in the said city. The city filed a cross complaint, alleging that the appellant Boaz Duncan, and other parties, all of whom were subsequently brought in and made parties to the action, owned lots along and fronting on Fourth street, on both sides thereof, between Spring and Main streets, and that all these lotowners, including the plaintiff, had "so encroached upon Fourth street, both upon the north and upon the south, that the width of said Fourth street, as it now exists upon the ground between the fences and other improvements of said parties, is considerable less than sixty feet." The cross complaint also sets forth that in 1849 a survey and map of said city was made, known as "Ord's Survey," which was adopted as the official map of said city, and which shows Fourth street to have a uniform width of 60 feet. The principal relief prayed for in the cross complaint is that the lines of Fourth street be determined, and that the claims adverse to the use of Fourth street as a public street of said city be forever quieted. The appellant demurred to this cross complaint for insufficiency of facts to constitute a cause of action, and for uncertainty because the north and south boundaries of Fourth street were not set out, and it could not be ascertained therefrom to what extent the improvements of the several parties, including appellant, encroached upon said street. In overruling this demurrer the court erred. The complaint was uncertain in the particulars specified in the demurrer. Whether the suit be treated as an action to quiet title, or to establish the boundaries of Fourth street, the appellant was entitled to be informed by the cross complaint specifically as to what portion of the premises occupied by him were claimed to be an encroachment, and within the boundaries of Fourth street.

We are also of opinion that the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision of the court. So far as the appellants' rights were concerned, the question of fact to be decided was as to the exact location of the south boundary of Fourth street, at the place where appellant's property was located, according to Ord's survey, which is conceded to be the original and official survey of the city of Los Angeles. Appellants introduced evidence tending to show that those under whom they claim title acquired the same by deed from the city of Los Angeles November 21, 1855, and that appellants' predecessors in interest erected a picket fence along Fourth street, on the line now occupied by the northerly line of appellants' building on the southeast corner of Spring and Fourth streets; that said fence was moved in the year 1888, when said building was erected; that said Fourth street was paved, and the sidewalk built to the line occupied by said building, and the owners of said property paid their proportion of said assessment for said paving up to said line; that up to 1897 all the improvements on the south side of Fourth street, between Spring and Main, were on a line occupied by defendants' building, and had occupied that line for at least 25 years prior thereto. This was the best evidence introduced, and the only competent evidence offered to show the location of the south line of Fourth street.

The testimony of the engineers was incompetent to establish the location of Fourth street, and the objection to such testimony should have been sustained; and the same may properly be said of the maps with the exception of the Ord map. This map, and the contract in pursuance of which it and the Ord survey were made, were proper evidence in the case; but the map could not locate itself on the ground. It appeared in evidence that all the monuments of the Ord survey were lost, and no attempt was made to establish their location, either by reputation, the declarations of deceased persons, or by the testimony of witnesses having knowledge of such location; but it seems that, in the absence of any such evidence, the engineers have attempted to locate the streets by selecting the most uniform street in the oldest part of the city, and, assuming that one boundary of that street is on the Ord survey, they propose to locate the other streets of the city, by first measuring the distance required by the Ord map, and then adding to or subtracting from such distance as may be required to leave all the streets of a uniform width of 60 feet, and require the removal of as few buildings as may be. In making their measurements on the ground, they have disregarded the Ord map. They make the block in which appellants' lot is situated 599.76 feet long, and the block immediately across Fourth street from and north of said lot they find to be 605.07 feet long, whereas the Ord map gives the blocks a uniform length of 600 feet. They might have come nearer the map if they had given the blocks on each side of Fourth street a more nearly uniform length, by placing Fourth street 2 or 3 feet further north. The work and testimony of the engineers is only a guess at the location of Fourth street as originally established by the Ord survey.

It may be proper, in the absence of any better evidence, to regard the line of ancient and continuous improvements as evidencing the line of Sixth street as it was run by the Ord survey; but no use of this line can be made to establish any other line in the city for two reasons: First, the engineers have demonstrated by their measurements, and their testimony is an admission, that the Ord survey must have been very inaccurate; second, the inaccuracy of the early surveys in California, as well as in other states, is a matter of such common knowledge that the courts are warranted in taking judicial cognizance of the existence of such inaccuracy, as they frequently have done. It needs no argument to show the impossibility of locating an unknown line of an inaccurate survey by running from a known line of the same survey. In the absence of better evidence, the court might have been warranted in finding for appellants on the evidence as to the south boundary of Fourth street as it had been indicated on the ground by the line of fence and other improvements for 25 years. Diehl v. Zanger, 39 Mich. 601; Orena v. City of Santa Barbara, 91 Cal. 621, 28 Pac. 268. There was no competent evidence in the testimony or maps of the engineers to show the location of the southern boundary of Fourth street, and, therefore, the judgment of the court has nothing to support it.

We think the conclusions reached herein find support in the following cases: Payne v. English, 79 Cal. 540, 21 Pac. 952; City of Los Angeles v. Cohn, 101 Cal. 374, 35 Pac. 1002; Bullard v. Kempff, 119 Cal. 9, 50 Pac. 780; Orena v. City of Santa Barbara, supra; Ralston v. Miller, 3 Rand. (Va.) 44. For these reasons, we advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

GRAVES v. HEBBRON. (S. F. 912.)

RES JUDICATA—PUBLIC LANDS—TITLE—PRE-EMPTION RECEIPT—PATENT—EVIDENCE.

1. A judgment in ejectment, wherein plaintiff claimed the right to possession of land under a final pre-emption receipt which entitled him to a patent of the land, the boundaries of which had been determined by government survey, is conclusive in another action involving the same issues between the same parties, though subsequent to the decision of the first action the plaintiff obtained a patent of the land described in his pre-emption receipt.

2. Evidence other than the record of a former judgment is admissible to show that a question in issue in a present action is the same as one determined in another action between the same parties.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county.

Action to quiet title brought by Thomas Graves against J. R. Hebbbron. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

H. V. Morehouse and F. J. Hambly, for appellant. A. S. Kittredge and W. A. Keeney, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to quiet title to a certain tract of land situated in Monterey county. Plaintiff had judgment. Defendant appeals from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The land in question is a piece of about 13 acres, which defendant claims lies in the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 29, township 15 S., range 6 E., but which plaintiff contends is part of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 30 of that township. Plaintiff describes in his complaint the particular tract by metes and bounds. Defendant denied plaintiff's title, and alleged title in himself. Defendant, by way of separate answer, avers that he commenced an action December 31, 1894, entitled "Hebbbron v. Graves," against plaintiff in this action, "for the recovery of the possession, claiming to be the owner thereof, and seised in fee and entitled to possession of the following described land." Then follows the description of certain land lying in sections 19, 20, and 29 of said township, as to which defendant avers that the title was then involved, and also that the location of the line dividing sections 19 and 20 and sections 29 and 30, running north and south, and the location of the corner common to sections 19, 20, 29, and 30, were involved and litigated, and averring that it was admitted by Graves at the trial of said action of Hebbbron v. Graves that, if the boundary line between sections 19 and 20 and 29 and 30 was situated and located as claimed by Hebbbron, then Hebbbron was entitled to judgment for the lands described in his complaint; that, to entitle plaintiff in this action to recover, "the said line running north and south between said sections 29 and 30 must be removed nearly eight chains further east than as located, fixed, and determined, adjudged and decreed, by the judgment in the said suit of the said Hebbbron against the said Graves, and the common corner to sections 19 and 20, 29 and 30, must be removed 6.84 chains east of where the same was located, fixed, determined, adjudged, and decreed in the said judgment of the said Hebbbron against the said Graves, duly given and made by the said superior court aforesaid"; that, if the line and common corner referred to remain as determined in that action, then plaintiff in this action has no right, title, or interest in the premises sued for. Averred that the defendant Graves appealed from the judgment and from the order denying new trial to the supreme court, where the judgment and order were affirmed. 20 Pac. 740.

Plaintiff introduced the patent of the United States, dated April 14, 1890, to the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 30. A witness testified that the land in question is part of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 30. Plaintiff thereupon rested. Defendant showed title to N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 29. It was stipulated that the transcript on appeal in Hebbron v. Graves might be offered and introduced in evidence for the same purposes and "to the same effect as the original record might be introduced, if the same were presented," and the transcript in that case is set out in the transcript in this case. It contains the judgment roll, statement of the case, the evidence at the first trial, the steps taken to appeal,—in short, the entire record on appeal. Defendant offered the transcript, as counsel stated, for the purpose of showing that the parties were the same as here, and to show that the land involved was the same, and that the object was to settle the boundary lines between the lands of the parties, the location of the corner common to sections 19, 20, 29, and 30, and that counsel would follow up the offer by showing that the appeal was perfected and the judgment of the lower court affirmed, and that "the controversy here is precisely the same controversy as in that suit." Plaintiff objected to the judgment roll on the ground of its immateriality, irrelevancy, and incompetency, and on the same ground objected to the admission of the statement of the case, part of the transcript; and it is now claimed by respondent that the statement is not properly part of this record, and cannot be considered, because there was no distinct ruling upon both of his objections. Some discussion ensued upon the objection, in which the court took part, and counsel for plaintiff stated as follows: "Our principal objection is that it is apparent from the inspection of the record itself [the transcript] that the judgment roll was made up and that judgment was entered long prior to the title which we are now litigating." In ruling upon the matter the judge said, among other things: "* * * do not see that the judgment, as against the party not holding the title, can be availed of, as against a subsequent patent from the United States government for the land. * * * The party, under his patent, has to go upon the ground and ascertain the stakes, and determine where his boundaries are, and the only right to put in controversy the boundaries (the survey of the United States government) exists under the patent; and any prior litigation in which that question is put in controversy, if it is decided adversely to him as to the limits of his possession under the patent, I do not think can be asserted in a subsequent action, and the offer of the judgment roll will be denied upon that ground." It is manifest from the colloquy which ensued upon the offer, between respective counsel and the court, and the remarks of the court when the ruling was made, that the point under discussion was as stated by plaintiff's counsel, and quite fully discussed by the court, from which the quotations above are taken. When the court ruled out the judgment roll, it practically ruled against the whole transcript. Having excluded the judgment roll, the statement went with it. It perhaps would have been well for defendant's counsel to ask a ruling also as to the statement, inasmuch as there was a separate objection to it; but we are unwilling, in view of the circumstances as they occurred, to hold that we cannot look to the statement here as part of the offer. It appeared in evidence that, prior to the action of Hebbron v. Graves, Graves held the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 30 by an original homestead entry, which, before commencement of the action, he had commuted to a pre-emption claim, and had made final payment to the government, and held a final pre-emption receipt, entitling him to patent. At that time Hebbron had patent to the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 29, and other lands.

In support of the ruling of the court, respondent relies upon Amesti v. Castro, 49 Cal. 325, and refers also to Caperton v. Schmidt, 26 Cal. 479. In the first of these cases the question arose between two claimants of contiguous Mexican grants, title to both of which was inchoate at the time the judgment pleaded in bar was entered. In that action the executors of Castro sued in ejectment to recover from Amesti a parcel of land, to which both claimed title under their respective grants, and Castro recovered judgment. Subsequently a patent was issued to Amesti which included the land recovered in the former ejectment suit. Castro's grant was also confirmed, and the survey excluded from his rancho the premises recovered in the ejectment suit. The claimants, being dissatisfied with the survey, caused the same to be returned to the district court for revision under the act of congress, and it was approved and became final. Subsequently the heirs of Amesti commenced an action in ejectment to recover, from the defendants claiming under Castro, the same lands which were formerly recovered by the executors of Castro. The only defense offered was the judgment in the former action as an estoppel, in support of which the judgment roll was offered, and was excluded by the trial court, and that ruling was affirmed here. An examination of the opinion will show that the court treated Amesti's title prior to confirmation as incipient, under which the question of the boundaries of his land remained undetermined, and that the duty later on of definitely fixing the boundaries rested first with the Mexican government, and later, by treaty, with the United States government, and that "It alone, or its properly constituted tribunals, could adjudicate his claim, fix his boundaries, and invest him with perfect title." In Caperton v. Schmidt the court said: "The estoppel of a verdict and judgment is necessarily limited to the rights of the parties as they exist at the time when such verdict and judgment are rendered, and cannot preclude either party from showing that their rights have been varied or extinguished at a subsequent period." The case now here is altogether different from Amesti v. Castro. When the parties acquired their rights, the surveys had been made and the boundaries of the land had been determined by the government. Graves had a clear right to the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 30, and could then go and find his land by the survey as already made, and he pre-empted the land according to this survey; and this was true as to Hebbbron's title. So far as the boundaries of his land were concerned, Graves acquired no new or greater right by his patent than he would have had under his final receipt. His final receipt was prima facie evidence of ownership of the land, and was a "certificate of purchase," within the meaning of section 1925, Code Civ. Proc. Witcher v. Conklin, 84 Cal. 499, 24 Pac. 302. The land, as then surveyed, could not thereafter be sold by the government, nor thrown open to pre-emption by another. Id. His receipt entitled him to a patent by the same description as given in the receipt, and in fact the patent so describes the land. It was held in Byers v. Neal, 43 Cal. 210, where judgment for the possession of a quarter section of land was rendered against one after he had proved up and paid for his land, under the pre-emption laws of the United States, and subsequent to the rendition of the judgment had received a patent for it, that the judgment was conclusive, and barred his rights in a subsequent action. It may be doubted whether the learned trial judge was correct as to the question of title, if that alone had been litigated, for Byers v. Neal, supra, seems to hold otherwise; but upon this point it is not necessary to express an opinion. As to the question of boundary, however, we think the court was in error in holding that, although formerly litigated and decided against him when he held only a final receipt, the pre-emptor (plaintiff) could again litigate the same issue with the same party after he had obtained his patent. And so it may be said of the remarks quoted from Caperton v. Schmidt, supra. So far as the question of boundaries is involved here, the rights of the parties are precisely the same as when the question first arose. Their rights as they then existed have not been "varied or extinguished."

It is not claimed by respondent that there was error or fraud in the original survey; nor was it claimed by him that his patent called for any land different from that described in his final receipt, nor that the land claimed in this action was different from the land claimed in the former action. The subject-matter of the action and the parties were admittedly the same, and it is now contended by appellant that the location of the line between sections 19 and 20, and the corner common to sections 19, 20, 29, and 30, had to be determined in that action before the court could determine which of the parties owned the land in dispute. Manifestly the trial court in this action so regarded the matter, but as it held that the plaintiff was not precluded from maintaining the action, notwithstanding the former adjudication, because he had subsequently obtained a patent to his land, he held, with entire consistency, that the judgment roll was immaterial and irrelevant. Indeed, any evidence tending to prove former adjudication would have been equally irrelevant, if the position of the court had been correct. For like reason the court refused to admit evidence of a witness called to prove that the land inclosed and occupied by defendant, and now involved, is the same land as that recovered under the former judgment, as surveyed and located by the county surveyor, who was a witness in the former action. While it is true, as contended by respondent, that this witness, under the statement of counsel for appellant that the evidence was offered solely to support his plea in bar, could not testify as to facts other than such as appeared at the former trial, we think the evidence offered was directed to the facts shown at that trial. The court ruled the evidence out,—no doubt because, no matter what the facts then were, the subsequent patent gave plaintiff a new cause of action. We think this conclusion of the court was erroneous, and entitles appellant to a new trial, for it goes to the very essence of the case.

But it is urged that the judgment relied upon by defendant is uncertain, ambiguous, and indefinite, and cannot constitute an estoppel; citing People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507; Ferreira v. Chabot, 63 Cal. 564. In the latter of these cases it is said, quoting from Russell v. Place, 94 U. S. 606: "A judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, upon a question directly involved in one suit, is conclusive as to that question in another suit between the same parties; but, to this operation of the judgment, it must appear, either upon the face of the record, or be shown by extrinsic evidence, that the precise question was raised and determined in the former suit. If there be any uncertainty on this head in the record, the whole subject-matter of the action will be at large and open to new contention, unless this uncertainty be removed by extrinsic evidence showing the precise point involved and determined." We have carefully examined the pleadings and the judgment in the former action. It would occupy much space—we think unnecessarily—to give the various descriptions there found. Suffice it to say that there is some uncertainty in the calls of the judgment. But looking to the pleadings in that action and the evidence found in the transcript, and to the pleadings in this action, together with the offer at the trial to follow up the judgment with proof that in fact the boundary lines now involved were in the former action fixed and determined, we think the court erred in excluding the testimony. Defendant did not rely alone on the face of the judgment, but he also relied upon the extrinsic evidence contained in the transcript, and upon what he expected to show otherwise, to establish the allegations of his answer. The evidence contained in the transcript, in connection with the other extrinsic evidence offered, was certainly admissible to show what appellant claimed was the fact; and inasmuch as the ruling of the court not only excluded the transcript, but would have excluded any and all evidence tending in the same direction, and was an erroneous ruling, we think a new trial is called for, and should be granted. What may be the result of this evidence, it is not our purpose to indicate. It is advised that the order be reversed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; COOPER, C.

ORLANDI et al. v. GRAY et al. (L. A. 543.)

HAYNE v. SAME.

MECHANICS' LIENS—FINDING ON ISSUES—TIME OF FILING—SUFFICIENT OCCUPATION.

1. A finding of fact on the issue of the validity of plaintiffs' contract with the subcontractor, created by affirmative matter set up by an answer in an action to foreclose mechanics' liens, alleging that plaintiffs performed the labor and furnished the materials for the architect, who was also a subcontractor, with knowledge that he was acting both as architect and subcontractor, is not necessary, where there is no claim of actual fraud or deception, and the pleadings admit that the owner of the building was fully conversant with the fact that the architect was also a subcontractor; the mere dual position of the architect not being sufficient of itself to render his contracts with the original contractors and with plaintiff void.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, relating to the time of filing mechanics' liens, providing that, in cases of contracts, the occupation of a building by the owner, or the acceptance by such owner of said building, shall be deemed conclusive evidence of completion, an occupation must be exclusive, and inconsistent with a continuance in the completion of the contract; and an occupation by the owner while work is being performed, with full knowledge of the circumstances under which the work is being done, is not sufficient to start the running of the statute as to the time when liens should be filed.

Department 1. Appeals from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Actions by C. Orlandi and J. W. Jones, partners, and by Lambert J. Hayne, against Mrs. C. M. Gray and others, to foreclose two mechanics' liens. At the trial the actions were consolidated, and from a single judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. S. Chapman, for appellants. Borden & Carhart, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This appeal arises upon the foreclosure of two mechanics' liens. At the trial the actions were consolidated, and a single judgment rendered in favor of plaintiffs. An appeal is taken from that judgment, and also from an order denying the motion for a new trial. Only two questions of any importance are involved.

By the answer of defendant Gray, the owner of the building, it is alleged that the architect, Bourgeois, was a subcontractor for Pugh & Sons, the original contractors, and that plaintiffs in this action performed the labor and furnished the materials for which they now seek a lien, for Bourgeois, under his contract, with knowledge of the fact that he was the architect of the building, and also a subcontractor. For these reasons it is claimed that the architect's contract with the original contractors is void, and that the architect's contract with these plaintiffs is also void. The trial court failed to make a finding of fact upon the issue created by this affirmative matter, and error is now predicated upon that failure. Whatever else may be said upon this contention, we deem it sufficient to say that the subcontract of Bourgeois was attached to the original contract, and recorded with it in the recorder's office. This fact is admitted by the pleadings. Therefore it must be held that the owner of the building was fully conversant with the fact, and under such circumstances the mere dual position occupied by Bourgeois, of architect and subcontractor, does not, ipso facto, render these contracts void. There is no claim of actual fraud or deception, and, in the face of the aforesaid admission, no finding was necessary.

One of these plaintiffs was to furnish materials and do the staff work upon the building at an agreed price of $920. The other plaintiff was engaged to do certain sculpture work upon the front of the building at a wage of $3 per day. The trial court found as a fact that the building was completed upon January 4, 1897, and this finding is now attacked as without support in the evidence. The building is a large building, and the owner, by herself and tenants, moved into it during the first half of October, 1896. It is now claimed by this appellant that the completion of the building dates from that time, by reason of her occupation. This contention is based upon the following provision of section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure: "And in cases of contracts the occupation or use of a building, improvement or structure by the owner or his representative, or the acceptance by such owner or his agent of said building, improvement or structure, shall be deemed conclusive evidence of completion." The owner now contends that, under this provision of the Code, she and her tenants having taken actual possession of the building, there resulted a "statutory completion" at that time, and the time for filing liens began to run at once. Under the peculiar facts of this case, such a construction of the statute would result in an absurdity; for here one of these lien claimants substantially did all his work after this occupation by the owner took place, and therefore, by such a construction, his time to file a lien began to run almost before he had performed any labor upon the building. The framers of the statute never intended any such results to follow. Neither did they intend that such a subcontractor should be cut off absolutely from the right to file a lien upon the building. The present views of the court upon this question are well stated in Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Manufacturing Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 94 Cal. 239, 29 Pac. 632. It is there said: "The occupation or use, however, which, under the statute, is to be deemed conclusive evidence of completion, must be open, entire, and exclusive, and not of such a character as would be consistent with a continuance by the contractor in the completion of his contract; and whether in any particular case there has been such occupation or use must be determined from the facts of that case, as in the ordinary case must be determined the fact of actual completion. One must be shown to have acted towards the contractor and in reference to the building in such a way as by necessary implication to give notice that the building had been accepted by him in satisfaction of the contract. A continuance by the contractor in the work of completing his contract while the building, or a portion thereof, should be occupied by the owner, or even used by him for the purpose for which it was intended, would prevent such occupation or use from being regarded as conclusive evidence of completion." It is now insisted that the rule of law quoted from the foregoing opinion is obiter. We will not pause to settle that contention. It is immaterial at the present time, for we deem the law there laid down eminently sound. Tested by the principle there declared, the facts of this case entirely fail to show an occupation or use by the owner which would start the statute in motion as to the time when liens should be filed. At least, a finding of fact made by the trial court to that effect would not be disturbed. Let us look at the facts. The sculptor began his work about the time the owner went into possession. He continued his work for almost 60 days thereafter. This work was done under plans and specifications found in the original contract, and also under plans and specifications found in the subcontract of Bourgeois, which contract was attached to and filed with the original contract in the recorder's office. It thus appears that the owner during all this time had full knowledge of the circumstances under which the work was being done. In addition to this, we find these plaintiffs doing this work with the owner's consent, and directly before her eyes. It necessarily follows that the occupation or use of the building by the owner was not exclusive. Neither was it inconsistent "with a continuance by the contractor in the completion of the contract." Again, in this case it may well be said the owner did not act towards the contractor, in reference to the building, in such a way as by necessary implication to give notice that the building had been accepted by her in satisfaction of the contract. Finally, the citation which we have quoted declares that a continuance of work by the contractor after the occupation or use by the owner would prevent such occupation or use from being regarded as conclusive evidence of completion, and that is exactly the case we have here. Tested by the law above declared, the finding of the court as to the time when the building was completed will not be disturbed. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are affirmed.

SELNA v. SELNA et al. (Sac. 656.)

VENDOR'S LIEN—WAIVER—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. The filing and allowance of a claim generally against the estate of a deceased purchaser for the balance of the purchase price of land do not constitute a waiver by a vendor of his right to a vendor's lien therefor, under Civ. Code, § 3046, which provides that one who sells real property has a vendor's lien thereon, independent of possession, for so much of the price as remains unpaid and unsecured otherwise than by the personal obligation of the buyer.

2. In an action to establish a vendor's lien, the burden is on the purchaser to show a waiver of the lien; and, so long as the debt remains unpaid, the courts will not presume that the lien has been waived, except on clear and convincing testimony.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Action by Leopold Selna, individually and as administrator, against Pearl E. Selna and others. Judgment for defendants and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Pearl E. Selna and Louttit & Middlecoff, for appellant. Budd & Thompson, for respondents.

COOPER, C. Action to recover $420, and have same declared a lien upon certain real estate. Judgment for defendants. Appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll.

It appears from the findings that on August 30, 1894, the plaintiff sold and conveyed by deed of grant the premises described in the complaint to one Patrick Selna, for the sum of $1,500, all of which amount had been paid prior to August 2, 1897, except the sum of $500, and on said last-named date said Patrick Selna executed and delivered to plaintiff his promissory note for said balance of $500. On this note there was paid on the 27th day of December, 1897, the sum of $80. On January 15, 1898, the said Patrick Selna died intestate, being at the time of his death the owner of the said real estate, leaving a balance of $420 due and owing to plaintiff on said promissory note, and leaving surviving him his wife, Pearl E. Selna, one of the defendants herein. February 4, 1898, the plaintiff was duly appointed administrator of the estate of said Patrick Selna, deceased, qualified, and letters of administration were issued to him. February 19, 1898, the plaintiff, as such administrator, published notice to creditors as required by statute, and on the 15th day of April, 1898, prepared his claim against said estate for the balance of $420 so due upon said note. The claim contained a copy of the said promissory note, but made no reference to any claim of lien, and was properly verified as required by statute. The claim, as so presented, was allowed and approved April 15, 1898, by the judge of the superior court in which the estate was pending, and was on said last-named date filed with the clerk of said court. July 15, 1898, the said superior court, by decree duly made and entered, set apart the said premises to defendant Pearl E. Selna as a homestead. The complaint was filed August 3, 1898. All recourse against any other property of the estate is expressly waived, and it is sought to have it adjudged that the $420 balance of the purchase price of said premises is a lien thereon, and that the premises be sold to satisfy said lien. The learned judge of the court below found all the facts as herein stated, but, as a conclusion of law, found that the plaintiff, by so having the said claim allowed and filed, waived all right to have the same declared to be secured by a vendor's lien. The sole and only question to be determined upon this appeal is whether or not the plaintiff, by so having his claim allowed and filed, waived his right to a vendor's lien upon the property described in the complaint. There is no proof or finding of any act or word of plaintiff tending to show an intention to waive the lien, except the act of having his claim so allowed and filed. As to vendors' liens, the provisions of our Civil Code are as follows:

"Sec. 3046. One who sells real property has a vendor's lien thereon, independent of possession, for so much of the price as remains unpaid and unsecured otherwise than by the personal obligation of the buyer.

"Sec. 3047. Where a buyer of real property gives to the seller a written contract for payment of all or part of the price, an absolute transfer of such contract by the seller waives his lien to the extent of the sum payable under the contract; but a transfer of such contract in trust to pay debts, and return the surplus, is not a waiver of the lien.

"Sec. 3048. The liens defined in sections

It is evident that the statute gives to the seller of real estate a lien for so much of the purchase price as remains unpaid and unsecured otherwise than by the personal obligation of the buyer. The court in this case found that the $420, part of the purchase price, remains unpaid and unsecured, except by the note and the filing thereof as a claim. The rule of our Civil Code was intended to make more clear and definite the equity rule as to vendors' liens. The principle upon which this lien has been established by courts of equity is that a person who has gotten the estate of another ought not, in conscience, as between them, to be allowed to keep it and not pay the full consideration money. The true origin of the doctrine may with high probability be ascribed to the Roman law, from which it was imported into the equity jurisprudence of England. 2 Sugd. Vend. p. 324, and note 2. Judge Redfield, in the case of Manly v. Slason, 21 Vt. 275, said: "There can be no doubt that the existence of such a lien is among the settled doctrines of the English chancery. * * * Its foundation exists in the general principles of equity and moral justice, by which the seller is entitled to hold upon the estate until he gets the price." The lien of the vendor is of so high a nature that it is not extinguished by his death, but passes to his representatives. Nor is it discharged by death of the grantee, but may be enforced against his estate, or those into whose hands the property may come. 2 Warv. Vend. pp. 700, 701.

The question as to what constitutes a waiver of this lien of the vendor has been a source of much controversy. The authorities generally agree that, to constitute a waiver of the lien, there must be some act or omission by the vendor showing an intention on his part to waive the lien. The rule is thus stated in Overt, Liens, § 622: "To constitute a waiver of the right to the lien, there must be some act or omission by the vendor which actually or impliedly evinces an intention on his part to dispense with the security given him in equity. Therefore, in any question of this character, the point to determine will be, has the vendor, by such or such an act or omission, so placed his rights in relation to the lands sold or to the vendee that it would be inequitable to sustain this right in his favor? Or has his act been such that it shows a determination not to rely upon his lien?" And to the same effect are the following authorities: 2 Jones, Liens, § 1073; 2 Warv. Vend. p. 712; Note to Mackreth v. Symmons, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq., pt. 1, pp. 482-484. Applying the rule thus laid down, was the act of plaintiff in filing his claim such an act as would make it inequitable to allow him to sustain his lien, or such that it showed a determination on his part not to rely upon it? We think that the mere fact of making out and filing the claim did not show any determination or intention of plaintiff not to rely upon his lien. Neither do we think such fact in any way would make it inequitable to now allow such lien. No one has been injured by any delay, act, or conduct of plaintiff. The filing of the claim did not deceive any one, and the right of plaintiff to a lien is such that we cannot presume from any trivial circumstance that such right was waived. The plaintiff could not have maintained any action upon the note without first presenting his claim. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1500, 1510. The claim was not secured by any mortgage or recorded lien, and therefore it was not necessary for it to contain any statement as to the claim of lien. Code Civ. Proc. § 1497. It might have stated the claim of lien, and that the claimant did not intend to waive it, and it would perhaps have been the better practice if it had so stated; but, as the statute does not expressly require such statement, we think it would be a harsh rule to hold that the absence thereof, of itself, waived the lien.

The burden of proof is upon the purchaser to establish that in the particular case the lien has been intentionally displaced or waived. If, under all the circumstances, it remains in doubt, the lien attaches. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1224; Wilson v. Lyon, 51 Ill. 168; Truebody v. Jacobson, 2 Cal. 269; 2 Warr. Vend. p. 713. And so long as the debt exists, courts will not presume that the lien has been waived, except upon clear and convincing testimony. Id. pp. 712-714; Coles v. Withers, 33 Grat. 195.

Defendant, in support of her claim that the lien was waived, relies upon Fitzell v. Leaky, 72 Cal. 484, 14 Pac. 201; Avery v. Clark, 87 Cal. 623, 25 Pac. 920; and Manufacturing Co. v. Ewing, 109 Cal. 355, 42 Pac. 435. In Fitzell v. Leaky, the action was brought to enjoin the defendant, as sheriff, from selling one-fourth of a water ditch claimed by plaintiff to be appurtenant to, and a part of, his homestead. The question discussed was whether or not the interest in the water ditch was a part of the homestead. There was no issue, or determination of any issue, as to a vendor's lien; but the court, in the opinion, used this language: "If Kelly ever had the right to have a vendor's lien adjudicated and declared by a court of equity, he has never commenced proceedings to that end, but has waived his lien by taking a general judgment, which, if docketed, was a lien on all the real property of the plaintiff." The remark made by the learned judge who wrote the opinion was obiter dictum, but, if it stated the law correctly, it has no application to the facts of this case. Here plaintiff had no judgment docketed, nor any judgment which was a lien upon any property. His allowed claim was in certain respects in the nature of a judgment, but only a qualified judgment. It was not a lien upon any real or personal estate. It was not conclusive upon the heirs of the estate. Code Civ. Proc. § 1636; Weihe v. Statham, 67 Cal. 84, 7 Pac. 143; In re Hill's Estate, 62 Cal. 186. Before the death of Patrick Selna, plaintiff had the right to look, not only to the land, but to the property owned by him, in determining whether or not the note could be collected. After his death, and the allowance of the claim, he had a right to look to the same property, diminished by the right given the administrator to take a certain portion of it for expenses of administration, for the payment of preferred claims and such family allowance as the court might make for the support of the family of deceased. The filing of the claim did not give plaintiff any security upon any specific property, nor any lien upon any property. It is stated by the authorities that if the vendor recover a judgment at law, and has not exhausted his remedy by execution, he is not precluded thereby from proceeding to enforce his equitable lien for the purchase money. Walker v. Sedgwick, 8 Cal. 404; Overt. Liens, p. 691; McAlpin v. Burnett, 19 Tex. 497; Dubois v. Hull, 43 Barb. 26; 2 Warr. Vend. p. 719; Palmer v. Harris, 100 Ill. 276; Chapman v. Lee, 64 Ala. 483. In Avery v. Clark it appeared that one Robbins, the grantor, conveyed to Mrs. Humeston a tract of land, and took as part payment the promissory notes of herself and husband, secured by their mortgage upon the land conveyed. It was held that the unpaid price of the land did not thereafter "remain unsecured otherwise than by the personal obligation of the buyer." The case of Manufacturing Co. v. Ewing was replevin for a harvester sold and delivered to one Ewing in his lifetime. Under the contract of sale the title to the harvester was to be and remain in plaintiff until the full payment of the price had been made. Certain promissory notes had been given to plaintiff by said Ewing, and upon the last one there remained a small balance due when the maker thereof died. The plaintiff duly made out and presented its claim against the estate of said Ewing for the balance due upon this note. The claim was allowed and placed on file. This court held that the sale was a conditional one, and that upon the default of the purchaser the plaintiff had either of two remedies: He could retake the property or recover it by action, or he could regard the sale as an absolute one and recover upon the notes,—but that, the two remedies being inconsistent, he could not pursue both. The principle upon which the case was decided has no application to the present case. We advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment upon the findings in favor of plaintiff, and in accordance with the views herein expressed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment upon the findings in favor of plaintiff, and in accordance with the views herein expressed.

PEOPLE v. KING. (Cr. 500.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 15, 1899.)

FORGERY—SUFFICIENCY OF INFORMATION—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 960, providing that no information is insufficient by reason of any defect in form not prejudicial to a substantial right, an information for the forgery of a check is not insufficient because it charges the forgery of a certain name to the check, instead of forgery of the check itself.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1863, providing that, when the characters in which an instrument is written are difficult to decipher, expert evidence is admissible to declare them, on a trial for forging a check on which, under the forged name, was an irregular character, expert testimony was inadmissible to show that it was a certain letter, when it did not appear that the characters in which the check was written were difficult to decipher, or that it had been executed by defendant as agent, or that the letter was an initial of his name.

3. On a prosecution for forging a check, testimony that defendant rented a room from complaining witness for a month, and handed her the check with his indorsement, saying it was good; that she gave him the difference between it and a month's rent, whereupon he went away, promising to return in the evening, but did not return; that the check was in fact a forgery; and that defendant refused to give his true name when arraigned,—is sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty.

4. On a trial for forging a check payable to defendant or bearer, it is not error to refuse to charge the jury that such check would pass from hand to hand as coin, and that they could not infer he knew it was forged from the fact that he was named as payee.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

J. M. King was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Fitzgerald, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Ford, for the People.

COOPER, C. Defendant was convicted of the crime of forgery, and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

The point most earnestly urged as ground for reversal is that the court erred in overruling defendant's demurrer to the information. The information charges that on the 15th day of August, 1898, in the county of San Joaquin, the defendant knowingly, feloniously, and with intent to defraud and damage one Mrs. Ewing, did falsely make, forge, and counterfeit the name of Mrs. E. M. Carson to a certain check, which check is fully set out in the information, and is for the sum of $15, drawn upon Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Bank; that the defendant on said day did willfully, knowingly, and falsely utter, publish, and pass as true and genuine the said check, with intent to damage and defraud the said Mrs. Ewing, the defendant well knowing at the time of so uttering and passing the said check that the same was false, forged, and counterfeit. It is urged that the first part of the information charges the forging and counterfeiting of the name only, and not of the instrument. Section 960 of the Penal Code of this state reads as follows: "No indictment or information is insufficient, nor can the trial, judgment or other proceeding thereon be affected by reason of any defect or imperfection in matter of form which does not tend to the prejudice of a substantial right of the defendant upon its merits." Section 959 provides that the indictment or information is sufficient if it can be understood therefrom "(6) that the act or omission charged as the offense is clearly and distinctly set forth in ordinary and concise language, without repetition, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended." Applying the above rules of our Code to this information, we think it sufficient. A copy of the check is set forth in the indictment, which is as follows: "San Francisco, Aug. 13, 1898. No. 93. Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Bank: Pay to J. M. King or bearer $15.00 (fifteen and no-100 dollars). Mrs. E. M. Carson." The defendant is charged with having falsely forged and counterfeited the name of Mrs. E. M. Carson to this check. Without discussing imaginary distinctions between the meaning of name and signature, we think that a person of common understanding by reading this information would know what was intended. There is not such defect in matter of form as would tend to the prejudice of a substantial right of defendant. An indictment or information is sufficient if it substantially conforms to the statute. People v. Mahlman, 82 Cal. 585, 23 Pac. 145. And no one could say that defendant, as a man of common understanding, was not fully informed as to the acts which he had committed, so as to enable him fully to prepare his defense. Again, the information charged the defendant with falsely uttering and passing as true and genuine the said false and forged check, knowing the same to be false and forged. We think the information did state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense, and that there was no error in overruling the demurrer. For the same reasons, the order of the court denying the defendant's motion in arrest of judgment was correct.

Upon the check offered and received in evidence, and under the name of "Mrs. E. M. Carson," was an irregular character, made by pen and ink, and apparently made at the same time the name was written. Defendant offered to prove by experts that the character was the letter "S," and the court refused to hear such evidence. Defendant saved an exception, and now claims the ruling was error. He claims the evidence was material, and that it should have been admitted, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1863, which reads as follows: "When the characters in which an instrument is written are difficult to be deciphered, or the language of the instrument is not understood by the court, the evidence of persons skilled in deciphering the characters, or who understand the language, is admissible to declare the characters or the meaning of the language." It had not appeared that the characters in which the instrument was written were difficult to be deciphered, or that the language of the instrument was not understood by the court. Conceding that the defendant could have proved that the character was the letter "S," it seems to us, from the light thrown on this investigation by the record, that the fact would have been wholly immaterial. It was not shown, nor attempted to be shown, that any agent of Mrs. Carson wrote the check or placed the character there. It was not claimed that the character was placed there by defendant as agent of any one, or that it was an initial letter of his name. We think, therefore, that the fact as to what the character was could not of itself and alone have been material. If defendant forged the check and the name of Mrs. E. M. Carson thereto, it was none the less a forgery, even if he did put the letter "S" under the name. The case relied upon (People v. Bendit, 111 Cal. 275, 43 Pac. 901) is not in point. In that case the defendant, in the presence of the clerk of William Cluff & Co., wrote the name to the receipt, "Wm. Cluff & Co., per A. B." This court, in holding the act did not constitute forgery, said: "There was no pretense that 'Wm. Cluff & Co.' was the genuine signature of that firm. It was written by appellant himself in the presence of the party who paid the money. He added the initials 'A. B.' to it, and he was understood to be acting as agent of the firm, and to have written the name Cluff & Co. as such agent." We do not understand in the present case that even a statement was made by defendant's counsel as to what was meant by the character claimed to be an "S."

Defendant testified that he did not sign the name of Mrs. Carson to the check, and that it was not his writing. It is claimed that there was no evidence that defendant made the check, or that he knew it was false when he uttered it. The testimony of Mrs. Ewing is to the effect that on the 15th of August, 1898, the defendant came to her house and wanted to rent a room, the price of which was $3 per month; that he handed her the check described in the information, and told her it was good, and that she could cash it at the office of Wells, Fargo & Co.; that he thereupon indorsed it "J. M. King," and she gave him the difference between the month's rent and the check,—$7; that he told her he would not return before half past 9 that night, and that he never returned; that this all occurred in San Joaquin county.

Mrs. Carson further testified that defendant worked for her three days in the month of August; that she never wrote the check or the signature, and never authorized any one else to do so, and never delivered it to defendant. Defendant, when arrested and shown the check, said he did not know that he had ever seen it before, that it was his name on the back of it, and that, if he passed it, somebody must have given it to him. When arraigned, the defendant refused to give his true name. This evidence is amply sufficient to sustain the verdict.

Defendant claims that it was error to refuse to give to the jury his instruction numbered 3. The instruction was to the effect that, if the check was payable to defendant or bearer, it would pass from hand to hand as freely as coin, and that for this reason the jury could not infer or presume that the defendant knew the check was forged from the fact that he was named therein as payee. We cannot see how the instruction was material, even if it stated the law in the abstract correctly. That a check payable to bearer would pass from hand to hand as coin would be no defense, if the defendant, with intent to defraud, forged the check. We know of no law, and defendant's counsel has pointed out none, that exempts the forger of such a check from the penalty of the law. The court, in other parts of the charge, gave the law bearing upon the facts fully, and more favorable to defendant than it would have been compelled to do under the evidence.

The eighth instruction given at the request of the people is assigned as error. No objection to this instruction is pointed out, and, upon reading it, we do not discover any error therein. We think the judgment and order should be affirmed, and so advise.

We concur: GRAY, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

WORMMOUTH v. GARDNER et al. (S. F. 1,143).¹

(Supreme Court of California. July 6, 1899.)
UNITED STATES LAND DEPARTMENT—DECISION—CONCLUSIVENESS—FINDINGS OF FACT.

1. An application to the United States land department by one claiming a right to purchase land, wherein a person having acquired a homestead entry was made defendant, is within the jurisdiction of such land department; and the decision of the department cannot be reviewed, unless founded on an erroneous notion of law.

2. An application for the right to purchase land from the United States land commissioners on the ground that a patent was issued to the heirs of one holding under a Mexican grant, and that the patent erroneously excluded the land in controversy, was determined against the applicant on the ground that the land never had been within the boundaries of the grant, and that the applicant at the time he purchased an interest in the land in controversy from parties claiming under the grant, knew that it was not included therein. Held, that the decision was based upon facts defeating the claim of the applicant, and could not be reviewed by the court.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Marin county.

Action by Ebenezer Wormouth against Peter and Jacob Gardner. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hepburn Willins, for appellants. E. B. Mahon and L. D. McKissick, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action in ejectment to recover possession of certain lands described in the complaint. Judgment below went for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment, and from the order denying a motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff claims title under a homestead entry made in accordance with the United States laws upon that subject (see Wormouth v. Gardner, 105 Cal. 149, 38 Pac. 646), and before the filing of the cross complaint herein-after mentioned he received a United States patent for the land in pursuance of his homestead entry. The principal contention of defendants for a reversal is in relation to what they call their "equitable title." This title, as shown in the cross complaint, is briefly as follows: It is averred that the land in contest here was within the exterior boundaries of a certain Mexican grant, made in 1835 to Juan Reed, of a certain tract of land, called the "Rancho Corte de Madera del Presidio" (usually called the "Reed Rancho"); that this grant was presented to the land commissioners and the United States district court, and was confirmed; that a United States patent to the rancho was issued to the heirs of Reed in February, 1885; and that the patent excluded the land in contest in this case; and that the Reed heirs supposed the land was included within said grant, and with that understanding conveyed the same to various parties, through whom, by mesne conveyances, whatever right they had to this piece of land became vested in the defendant Jacob Gardner, whose immediate grantor was one Throckmorton. It is further averred that in January, 1875, the said Throckmorton made application to the United States land department to purchase said land under the act of congress entitled "An act to quiet titles in California," approved July 23, 1866, basing his application upon the facts hereinbefore stated, and that the plaintiff herein, Wormouth, was made a party defendant in said application, and that a contest took place in the land department between Throckmorton, upon his claim as aforesaid, and Wormouth, as a homestead claimant; that the register and receiver of the United States land office at San Francisco, in which application was made, decided the case in favor of Wormouth, and against Throckmorton; that Throckmorton appealed to the commissioner of the general land office, who also decided the case against him; and that he then appealed to the secretary of the interior, who again decided the case against him and in favor of Wormouth; but that each of said officers decided the case upon an erroneous proposition of law, and that, therefore, it ought to be decreed that the plaintiff holds said land in trust for defendant Jacob Gardner, and should convey the same to the latter. A demurrer to this cross complaint was sustained by the court below, but upon appeal this court held that the averments of the complaint were sufficient on their face to show that the decision of the land department had been based upon an erroneous construction of the law, and reversed the case, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer; the court declaring, however, in its opinion, very clearly, the principles upon which it should be determined whether or not the decision of the land department was final. See Wormouth v. Gardner, 112 Cal. 506, 44 Pac. 806. After the remittitur went down, the plaintiff filed an answer, in which all the material averments of the cross complaint were denied. Upon the trial the defendants introduced all the proceedings had in the land department in the said contest of Throckmorton and Wormouth. That contest was one entirely within the jurisdiction of the United States land department; that is, each party was endeavoring to get title to what each admitted to be United States government land, which was subject to disposition under the laws of the United States. The land department therefore had exclusive jurisdiction to determine all facts which arose in the contest, and, in order to successfully attack the decision of the department, the defendant in this present case would have to show that such decision was founded upon an erroneous notion of the law. But this he has failed to do. The department, among other things, found that the land in contest never was within the boundaries of the grant to Reed, that it was never regarded as being included in that grant, and that Throckmorton, at the time he claimed to have purchased from the Reed heirs, either knew or had good reason to believe that the land was not included in the grant, and was not a bona fide purchaser, within the meaning of the act of July 23, 1866. In Wormouth v. Gardner, 112 Cal. 506, 44 Pac. 806, this court said: "Whether Throckmorton did in fact purchase the land for a valuable consideration, or whether after his purchase he used and improved and continued in the actual possession of the same, according to the lines of his purchase, were questions of fact to be determined by the secretary of the interior. The good faith of Throckmorton in making the purchase, as well as his belief that the land he purchased was included within the original limits of the Mexican grant, were also facts to be determined by that officer from all the circumstances under which the purchase was made. Whether that officer properly considered the weight to which the evidence before him was entitled, or whether he drew correct conclusions from that evidence, his determination with reference to these facts, whether correct or erroneous, is conclusive upon the judicial tribunals. These tribunals cannot exercise a revisory jurisdiction over him in matters which are within the scope of the authority conferred upon him, but if, upon the undisputed facts, he made an erroneous application of the law pertinent to those facts, his action is open to review." In the case at bar it nowhere appears that the secretary of the interior made an erroneous "application of the law," but it does appear that his decision was based upon facts which necessarily defeated the claim of Throckmorton. For the same reasons the decision of the United States land department was conclusive as to Wormouth's title as a homestead claimant. What appellant claims as his legal title was presented to the jury in the shape of an issue as to damages for detention of the land. The jury found a verdict of $2,000, which the court reduced to $1,600. The United States patent to the Reed heirs was finally determinative of the boundaries of the grant, and we see no other point in the case necessary to be discussed. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

In re CLARKE. (Cr. 536.)

INSOLVENCY — APPEARANCE OF DEBTOR — WAIVER OF BOND — VALIDITY OF ADJUDICATION — CONTEMPT PROCEEDINGS — PUNISHMENT — HABEAS CORPUS — GROUNDS FOR RELIEF.

1. A debtor in involuntary insolvency proceedings, who moved to strike a creditors' petition from the files because not properly entitled, and, upon denial of his motion, demurred, and then answered to the petition, thereby submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court, and waived all objections thereto for want of bond required, although his motion papers expressly stated that his appearance was special only.

2. Where a debtor has appeared by demurring and answering to a creditors' petition in involuntary insolvency proceedings, the want of the bond required therein will not invalidate an adjudication of insolvency, when no specific objection on that ground has been made until after such adjudication.

3. An adjudication of insolvency in involuntary proceedings, stating that all the allegations of the creditors' petition are true, and that the debtor was on a certain day, ever since has been, and still is, insolvent, is sufficient, without formal findings.

4. The failure of the clerk of the court to properly enter an adjudication of insolvency will not render it invalid.

5. Where a defendant in contempt proceedings has made a written showing in response to an order to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, his presence in person at the hearing is unnecessary.

6. Where the object of contempt proceedings is to compel an insolvent to answer concerning his property, he should be imprisoned until he consents to answer, and not for a definite period.

7. One who has been adjudged insolvent in involuntary proceedings, and imprisoned for contempt for failing to appear and answer as to his property, cannot be discharged on habeas corpus on the ground that he has been discharged from his debts in subsequent voluntary insolvency proceedings.

In bank. Habeas corpus by Alfred Clarke, to be discharged from imprisonment for contempt of court. Refused.

T. M. Osmont, for petitioner.

TEMPLE, J. The petition shows that on the 2d day of October, 1891, six creditors of petitioner filed a petition in the superior court asking to have him adjudged an insolvent. An order to show cause was issued, signed by the judge, but not made by the court. The bond given was not signed by the petitioning creditors. October 29th the petition was amended by adding three new creditors, and in other respects. No new bond was given after the amendment, and no new citation was issued. November 7, 1891, petitioner appeared, and moved to strike out the petition on various grounds, and also demurred. The motion was denied, and the demurrer overruled. He answered, a trial was had, and an order was made May 12, 1892, which adjudged that on the 14th day of September, 1891, Alfred Clarke was an insolvent debtor; and petitioner was ordered to file schedules as required by law. Petitioner represents that he has always challenged the jurisdiction of the court on various grounds, and particularly because no bond was given as required by the statute. It is further charged that the order of adjudication has never been entered, and that petitioner moved in the superior court to have the proceedings dismissed because the judgment was not entered within six months after it was made. Petitioner also states that, while said ineffective proceedings were pending, he made application to be declared an insolvent, and that on his petition and notice an adjudication was made, and such proceedings were afterwards had in the matter that on the 6th day of November, 1896, a decree was entered discharging him from all debts. The decree has never been vacated, suspended, or appealed from. It further appears from the petition that a citation was issued out of the superior court, requiring petitioner to appear on a day named and answer concerning his property. He did appear, and the matter was continued from time to time, until at last he failed and refused to appear and make answer to inquiries concerning his property. A citation was then served upon him, requiring him to appear on the 3d day of February, 1899, to show cause why he should not be adjudged guilty of a contempt of court for failing to appear and answer questions. He appeared by counsel, and showed cause by a demurrer and by an answer. The demurrer was overruled, and the answer held insufficient, and he was adjudged guilty of a contempt of court, and was committed until he would consent to answer touching the insolvent estate. By virtue of such order he is now being deprived of his liberty.

The evidence shows that the petition is incorrect in some of the most material points. The first appearance of Clarke in the insolvency proceeding was by a motion to strike from the files the amended petition for various reasons, among which are: (1) It was wrongly entitled; (2) did not conform to leave granted to amend; and (3) certain specified portions were impertinent, irrelevant, and immaterial. No point was made that the court had not obtained jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, except that it is stated, "This paper is not a general appearance or an appearance to the merits, and respondent reserves his right to demand that he be brought into court by the issue of a regular process."

On general principles, a statement that a defendant or party makes a special appearance is of no consequence whatever. If he appears and objects only to the consideration of the case, or to any procedure in it, because the court has not acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, the appearance is special, and no statement to that effect in the notice or motion is required, or could have any effect if made. On the other hand, if he appears and asks for any relief which could only be given to a party in a pending case, or which itself would be a regular proceeding in the case, it is a general appearance, no matter how carefully or expressly it may be stated that the appearance is special. It is the character of the relief asked, and not the intention of the party that it shall or shall not constitute a general appearance, which is material. See 2 Enc. Pl. & Prac. 625, notes, and cases cited. As a rule, one cannot avail himself of the advantage of being a party, and escape the responsibilities. Some early cases in this state (Deidesheimer v. Brown, 8 Cal. 340, and Lyman v. Milton, 44 Cal. 631) seem to hold that a defendant, having first objected to the process or service by which he was brought in, may then, if his objections are overruled, answer to the merits, and on appeal from the judgment still avail himself of his objections to the jurisdiction of the court over him. This rule seems unjust and illogical, and, I think, does not prevail elsewhere. It gives the defendant, whose objections to the jurisdiction of the court have been erroneously overruled, an opportunity to go to trial, and, if the judgment is favorable, to abide by it, while, if it is unfavorable, he can procure a reversal. The plaintiff would have no such advantage. And what would be the condition of such a defendant after reversal? If the reversal means that he is not yet in the case, he may move to dismiss, under section 581, Code Civ. Proc. If it merely gives him a new trial, the procedure seems farcical. In this case, by his first appearance, Clarke asked favors which could be demanded only by a party to the record; and, upon his motion being denied, he demurred to the petition upon nearly all the statutory grounds. He also filed an answer, which raised issues of fact, upon which a trial was had and findings were filed. Certainly by these proceedings he submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court.

Is the proceeding absolutely void because no bond was given? Anderson v. Superior Court, 122 Cal. 216, 54 Pac. 829, was a petition for a writ of prohibition; and it was said, in effect, that, though the alleged insolvent might have waived the bond, the court should not proceed in the matter against his objection. It would seem, then, if he did not object, it might be considered as waived. No specific objection on this ground was made by the petitioner,—at least, until long after the adjudication of insolvency. In his notice of motion to strike out, he stated as one of his grounds "that the court had not acquired jurisdiction to proceed under the amended petition." The same notice discloses that he was urging as an objection that the proceedings were wrongly entitled, and that the petition could not be amended; and, no doubt, these were the reasons why he thought the court had no jurisdiction. No other reasons are suggested. In his demurrer he stated as one ground that "the court has no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, or of the subject of the action." As he also demurred for insufficiency of the statement of facts, the demurrer itself constituted an appearance which gave the court jurisdiction of the person, if it had not already acquired it. There was no objection for lack of a bond. The petition avers that, four days after the petition was filed, Clarke appeared and objected to the form of the bond and the sufficiency of the sureties. The sureties failed to justify, but his objections were ignored. This is most decidedly a case where the allegations must be taken most strongly against the pleader. This notice may itself be construed into a waiver of all other objections to the bond. Several other instances are recited in the petition, but the particulars are not given, except that on January 5, 1894, he moved the court to vacate the judgment on the ground that no legal process was ever issued and no bond was given under the amended petition; and in October, 1894, he again moved the court to vacate the order because it had never been entered. The adjudication was made May 12, 1892. We find, therefore, that Clarke specifically objected to the form of the bond and to the sufficiency of the sureties, and at the same time denied the numerous allegations and charges of wrong-doing contained in the petition, and his insolvency, and caused a trial to be had of such issues, without calling the attention of the court to the fact that a bond had not been given. Doubtless he conceded the power of the court to allow an amendment, and believed that the bond already given under the first petition would serve under the new. The objection was in the nature of a plea in abatement, and I think it was waived.

It is objected that no sufficient adjudication was made, and that it has never been entered. The adjudication is complete in form and substance. It states that all the allegations in the amended petition are true, and that Clarke was on the 14th day of September, 1891, and ever since has been, and still is, insolvent. The adjudication then proceeds unnecessarily to add as a conclusion of law that Clarke was on the 14th day of September, 1891, an insolvent debtor. This is what the petitioner calls the adjudication. The document is one, and whether the court says it "finds" or "adjudges" or "decrees" or "considers" is immaterial. Formal findings were not required, and it is sufficient if the court, by order, adjudges the respondent in such proceeding insolvent, as required by statute. The clerk did, however, make an entry of an order in his minutes. It is too brief,—a trouble not infrequent in clerical work. After the title it is: "This matter having been heretofore submitted to the court for consideration and decision, and now the court having fully considered the same, it is ordered that Alfred Clarke be, and he is, adjudged and declared to be an insolvent debtor." From this order so defectively entered, Clarke appealed to this court, and the order was affirmed. Perhaps the court, as in the case of Miller v. Lux, 100 Cal. 609, 35 Pac. 345, 639, considered itself justified in looking to the entire record, including the findings. It is there said that, though findings are not required, still, if made, they constitute a part of the judgment roll. No other entry than in the minutes of the court was required. In re Blythe's Estate, 110 Cal. 229, 42 Pac. 642. The adjudication is but an interlocutory order, from which an appeal is specially provided. It should have been entered in the minutes, and an informal entry of it was made. Even if it be considered a judgment, and the attempted appeal from it was ineffectual, the fact that it was not entered does not render it invalid. In re Cook, 83 Cal. 415, 23 Pac. 392; Marshall v. Taylor, 97 Cal. 422, 32 Pac. 515.

Petitioner contends that there was not sufficient showing before the superior court to justify the issuance of the citation to him. Upon habeas corpus the burden is upon the petitioner to show that a restraint which is apparently legal is not so. The commitment states facts sufficient to authorize the citation, and there is no proof upon the subject.

The examination was postponed from day to day, and finally Clarke failed to be present at the appointed time. An order was served on him, requiring him to appear and show cause why he should not be punished for a contempt in refusing to appear. He showed cause by a written statement challenging the jurisdiction of the court. This was taken under advisement by the court, and finally overruled; and the petitioner was adjudged guilty of a contempt, and was committed for one day, and until, etc. He now contends that he should have been present in person. His showing in response to the order was heard and considered, and this was his own chosen method. He will not be heard to say he was not present.

The sentence was objected to because it provides for an imprisonment for a definite term of one day. It is contended that he could only be imprisoned until he would consent to testify. I think this is a mistake, but, if not, the illegal part is void. The portion not inflicting a punishment is not within the rule declared in Ex parte Kelly, 65 Cal. 154, 3 Pac. 673. To strike out the direction that he be imprisoned for one day would vacate the entire punitive part of the order. Had he consented during the day to testify, he might then have raised the point.

I cannot see that the voluntary proceedings by which petitioner claims to have been discharged as an insolvent, if proven here, as they were not, could help the petitioner. Such a discharge might in a proper case be pleaded in bar, but the fact would not deprive the court in which the other proceeding is pending of jurisdiction. The prisoner is remanded.

Taft v. Tarpey. (S. F. 1,163.)

DEDICATION—RESERVATION IN DEED—INTENTION—EVIDENCE.

1. A reservation in a deed, in form, "reserving from this grant the right of way over a strip of land thirty feet wide on the westerly line of said tract of land for canal or road purposes, both or either," does not operate of itself as a dedication to the public, and thereby conclude the owner from using such strip for the purposes mentioned in the reservation.

2. Where a reservation in a deed of a strip of land for a right of way for ditch and road purposes does not operate as a dedication of such strip to the public, and the owner has constructed a ditch and planted trees thereon, in an action to restrain defendant from entering upon the land and destroying the ditch and trees, for the purpose of opening a highway, an objection by such defendant to evidence to show the width of the land occupied by the ditch and trees, on the ground that the deed dedicated the entire strip to the public, is without merit.

3. In an action to restrain defendant from entering upon plaintiff's land to open a highway by virtue of a clause in plaintiff's deed reserving a certain strip for a right of way for ditch and road purposes, evidence that the grantor of plaintiff's grantor had made a reservation similar to that in plaintiff's deed in the sale of land to witness, and evidence of what he had told witness concerning it, is incompetent to show dedication, where such witness bought his land a year before plaintiff's grantor made his purchase.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county.

Action by Emma M. Taft against M. F. Tarpey to restrain defendant from entering upon plaintiff's land for the purpose of opening a road over the same. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. C. Williams and Frank C. Cleary, for appellant. H. H. Welsh, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Injunction. Plaintiff seeks to restrain defendant from entering upon her land for the purpose of opening a road over the same. Defendant claims that the strip of land in question was dedicated to the public for a road by plaintiff's predecessors in estate, and was also reserved for road purposes from the deed by which she claims title. The court found the following facts: That on April 21, 1884, one George H. Eggers was the owner in fee of the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ section 20, township 13 S., range 21 E., situated in Fresno county, and on that day conveyed the same to George W. Taft (plaintiff's husband) by deed which contained a clause following the description of the land, to wit: "Reserving from this grant the right of way over a strip of land thirty feet wide on the westerly line of said tract of land for canal or road purposes, both or either." Said Taft entered into possession and occupied the premises until July 15, 1895, when he conveyed the land to plaintiff, who has ever since occupied, and now occupies, the same. In 1883 said Eggers conveyed the E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the same section (lying directly west of plaintiff's land) by deed in which, following the description, is the following clause: "Saving and excepting therefrom a strip of land thirty feet wide off the east side of said tract of land, and a strip of land thirty feet wide off the west side of the northwest quarter of said section 20; * * * said excepted strips of land being reserved for road and ditch purposes." In January, 1884, said Eggers conveyed to defendant the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section, "reserving therefrom a road and ditch way on the easterly side thereof." In 1890 plaintiff's grantor constructed a ditch for purposes of irrigation along the eastern side of the strip of land so reserved from his deed for a distance of one-quarter of a mile. This ditch and its banks occupied a strip of land 15 feet wide for its entire length. Taft planted fig trees and grapevines along the western bank of said ditch, and in a straight line to the south boundary of his land. The ditch occupied no more land than was necessary for its purposes, and there is not now, and never has been, any highway or traveled road upon said 30-foot strip east of said line of fig trees and vines, since the same were planted there. In 1889 defendant entered upon the strip of land reserved as aforesaid, between the lands of plaintiff and the said lands directly west of plaintiff's lands, and graded and built a wagon road along the center of these two strips about 30 feet wide, occupying 15 feet of the strip reserved from plaintiff's land, and plaintiff's said ditch and trees and vines "do not in any way interfere with or obstruct the free use of said road and roadway by defendant or any other person. This road is the most convenient means by which defendant can have egress from his said lands in the direction of the city of Fresno." The court found, and the defendant admits, that he intends to enter upon the remaining portion of said strip of land, and dig up and destroy plaintiff's said ditch and trees and vines. The board of supervisors of Fresno county never accepted said strip of land as a highway, nor did they ever declare the same to be a highway. As conclusions of law, the court found the plaintiff entitled to judgment restraining defendant from "interfering with or digging up the portion of said premises upon which is now constructed plaintiff's ditch, and on which is planted plaintiff's said fig trees and vines, or from in any way entering upon said thirty-foot strip of land east of the line of fig trees and vines and ditch of plaintiff, and from * * * constructing * * * a wagon road thereon." Judgment was entered accordingly, from which, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, this appeal is prosecuted.

1. The principal question discussed by counsel arises out of the reservation in Eggers' deed to Taft in 1884. Appellant claims that this clause in the deed operated as a dedication to the public for a highway, and that the interest of the public extended and attached to the donation in its entirety, upon no part of which had plaintiff a right to encroach and plant trees or dig ditches. We cannot regard the language of the deed as showing an intention to dedicate the land for a public use in any such way as to conclude the owner, and, unless by the terms of the instrument such intention can be reasonably affirmed, there was no dedication effected by the deed itself. The condition or reservation, so far as the language discloses, was for the benefit of the grantor alone. In such case, or where the way is for the benefit of both parties to the deed, no presumption of any intention to dedicate such way to the public arises. The reservation was not only for road purposes, but also for ditches; and the public were equally entitled, if at all, to the way for both purposes. But it cannot be said that a use by the public for ditches was contemplated, for the public had no occasion for ditches, while the grantor might have. We must look elsewhere than to this deed for any right in the public. There is no evidence that Eggers ever made known his intention as to this strip of land prior to the purchases made by plaintiff and defendant. Defendant purchased his land in January, 1884, and plaintiff's grantor purchased in the following April. Defendant testified: "Inasmuch as I was buying the land, and the county road was a half mile away, I wanted to know whether I was going to have access to my land. I asked him [Eggers] about what reservations there were for roads in order to get to the county road, and he pointed out this reservation, and said it was his purpose, with any purchaser of land, as between his northern land and the county road, to leave a road where they could pass, and the public could travel to do their business." Defendant says he examined the record, "and found that he had done so in all cases as he had stated, and accepted it as such." But plaintiff's grantor's deed was not then in existence, and defendant could not have referred to the reservation now in question. A former owner of the land directly west of plaintiff's land, on which was also a reserved strip, testified that in 1889 he heard Eggers say "that he had dedicated to the public thirty feet off the west side of the land owned by Mr. Taft for road and ditch purposes, for the use of the public who bought his land." But this was five years after Taft had bought the land, and, besides, the declaration was not that the whole strip was for road purposes. Plaintiff's grantor, Taft, testified: "At the time I accepted the deed I did not know anything about the reservation. I supposed there was thirty feet there, but didn't know whether it was thirty feet off me, or thirty feet off both parties. I have talked with Mr. Eggers with reference to the matter. He has told me frequently that he reserved a road there * * * for road and ditch purposes, and he was surprised that Mr. Tarpey was trying to take the whole shooting match." In this there was no declaration that the entire strip was for road purposes. The evidence tended to show that before plaintiff's ditch was dug there was no defined road in use along the west line of her land. Plaintiff testified: "After the fig trees were planted, there was no travel east of them. * * * There was never any defined roadway west of the place at any time before this present road was placed there [the road opened by defendant], other than a mere trail leading up and down there. And the wagon tracks east of the line of fig trees ran diagonally through. In fact, they seemed to go where they wanted to over the place,—all over the land,—prior to the time the fence was built across the front. The fence was built in 1889." Defendant did not use this means of access to his land until in 1889,—five years after his purchase,—when he graded the road 30 feet wide, taking 15 feet from each of the reserved strips, and since that time this graded road has been in use by the public, with the knowledge and consent of plaintiff and her grantor. There is no evidence of the use by the public of the entire 60 feet embraced in the two strips at any time. The only defined road shown to have been in use since Eggers sold to plaintiff's grantor and defendant is a road 30 feet wide, which plaintiff concedes is a public highway, and which the court found, upon sufficient evidence, is of ample width for all public purposes without encroaching upon plaintiff's land any further than as now located. This road has its origin as a public road not by force of the deed of Eggers to Taft, but by subsequent dedication to, and user by, the public. It was probably the intention of Eggers that there should be roads for public use along all the reservations mentioned in the deeds made by him, but this intention was not expressed in the deeds, and was not carried out otherwise by him. The public acquired the right in the instance before us by the acquiescence and other acts of dedication by plaintiff and her grantor, and by the declarations of Eggers made after he sold the land. The declarations of Eggers show that it was not his intention that the entire width of 60 feet should be dedicated to the public for road purposes, for he included a way for ditches as well, and he expressed surprise that defendant should assume that the whole width was for a road. Besides, both defendant and plaintiff, by herself and her grantor, acted upon this view of the reservation; and defendant opened and graded a road 30 feet wide, leaving 15 feet for a ditch, which plaintiff's grantor occupied for ditch purposes about the same time. Defendant built the road in the spring of 1889, and Taft built the ditch and planted his trees and vines in February, 1890. This action was brought March 31, 1896. For six years defendant and the Tafts acted on the assumption that they were keeping within their rights; and as it was only by this actual user, and not by the terms of the deed, that they and the public acquired any rights, we do not see that defendant can now be heard to complain.

2. It is claimed as error that evidence was admitted to show the width of the land occupied by the ditch and trees and vines, the objection being that the deed dedicated the entire strip for road purposes, and it was immaterial where the ditch and trees were, as the public had a right to the whole 30 feet. There would be merit in the objection, if we could adopt defendant's construction of the deed. Upon the view of it we have taken, the evidence was relevant.

3. It is assigned as error that defendant was precluded from proving that Eggers had made a reservation similar to that in plaintiff's deed in the sale of land to witness, and that Eggers told witness "that it was his rule, when he sold his land out there, he reserved thirty feet right of way all around these places." This was not error. Witness bought his land in 1883. The evidence had no necessary connection with the purchase by Taft in 1884. Plaintiff admitted that the deed of witness contained a reservation similar to that in question. It was not competent to prove a custom or rule of Eggers in making deeds to land, and this is as far as the evidence proposed to go. We cannot see that its exclusion was prejudicial to defendant.

4. It is objected that the evidence does not support the fourth, fifth, and seventh findings. They are to the effect that the ditch occupies no more land than is necessary to its reasonable use; that the roadway is of sufficient width for all purposes of a highway, and as now used is not obstructed in any way by said ditch; that defendant threatens to enter upon said land and dig up and remove said ditch. Defendant's answer declares his purpose to be as found by the court, and justifies the finding, and we think there is sufficient evidence to support the other findings. Discovering no reversible error, it is advised that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SOLOMON. (Cr. 501.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 18, 1899.)

RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS—CORROBORATION OF ACCOMPLICE—GUILTY KNOWLEDGE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 1111, requiring corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice, evidence in a prosecution for receiving stolen goods that defendant placed the goods in the back room of a saloon, saying that he had loaned money on them, and offering no explanation why they were put there, is sufficient to corroborate the testimony of the accomplice.

2. Under Pen. Code, § 1111, requiring corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice, it is not necessary that corroborative evidence should go so far as to establish by itself, and without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice, that defendant in a prosecution for receiving stolen goods possessed the requisite guilty knowledge.

3. It is not error for the court to refuse to give an instruction, the substance of which he has given in a preceding one.

4. In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods it is not error for the court to refuse to instruct that the fact that defendant did not attempt to prevent the owner from recovering his goods is evidence that he did not know that they were stolen.

B. Solomon was convicted of receiving stolen goods, and appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Fitzgerald, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Ford, for the People.

GRAY, C. The defendant appeals from an order denying a new trial, and from a judgment convicting him of the crime of buying and receiving stolen goods, as defined in section 496 of the Penal Code.

It is objected, first, that the evidence is insufficient to convict, for the reason that there is no corroboration of the testimony of the thief and accomplice, W. H. Eldred, of whom defendant received the stolen goods. It appears by evidence, independent of the testimony of Eldred, that the defendant was in possession of the stolen clothes which he is charged with receiving soon after they were stolen, and deposited them in the back room of a saloon, telling the bar keeper that he had loaned $2.50 on them; that he would take them out the next morning, and that if an old soldier called, and paid $2.50, to let him have them; that defendant was a dealer in second-hand clothes, and his place of business was right beside this saloon; that he did not call for the clothes as he said he would, but let them remain in the back room of the saloon until discovered by an officer, four or five days after they were stolen; that defendant sold a pair of pants, part of this clothing, for $1, before his arrest; that the goods were worth $7.50; that he told the officer that he got the clothes from an old soldier, and had loaned him $2.50 on them, and he (the old soldier) was going to get him some more goods, or take the goods away. The goods, when found by the officer, were done up in a piece of bed ticking, tied up like a roll of blankets. No explanation is attempted as to the conduct of defendant in depositing the clothes in the back room of the saloon, instead of keeping them in his place of business. The stolen shears were found in defendant's shop. We think the foregoing facts tended to show guilty knowledge on the part of defendant, and thus tended to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense with which he was charged, and that the testimony of the accomplice was corroborated, as required by section 1111 of the Penal Code.

Instruction 1 asked by the defendant was properly refused by the court. It is not necessary that the corroborating evidence should "go so far as to establish by itself, and without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice, that the defendant knew at the time of the receipt by him of the goods described that they were stolen." In instruction 5 given at the request of defendant the court clearly and fully defined the rule as to the corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice as it applied to the case before the jury, and it was not necessary to repeat this instruction. For this reason the court was warranted in refusing instruction 3 asked by defendant. The seventh instruction requested by the defendant was properly refused. That the defendant "did not attempt to prevent the owner of said goods from again possessing his property" cannot be urged as evidence that he received the goods without knowledge of their having been stolen. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

LIVERPOOL & L. & G. INS. CO. v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (S. F. 761.)¹

FIRES SET BY LOCOMOTIVES—NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

1. Where it appears that defendant's engine was defective, and emitted cinders; that plaintiff knew of its defect, and continued to permit it to be used in hauling away ice from plaintiff's ice houses, but appointed a man to follow it up, and extinguish fires ignited by it,—the question whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence was properly submitted to the jury in an action for damages resulting from a fire caused by the engine.

2. In an action for damages resulting from a fire alleged to have been caused by defendant's engine, a charge that, if the jury believed it more probable that the fire was caused by the engine than by any other cause, they should find accordingly, is not erroneous as submitting the question to the mere conjecture or surmise of the jury.

3. In an action for damages caused by a fire ignited by defendant's engine, where it is not disputed that plaintiff employed a man to watch for fires caused by the engine, it is not erroneous for the court to refer to the existence of "counter precautions," where he leaves the question of their sufficiency to the jury.

4. In an action by an insurance company to recover from a railroad company a loss arising from defendant's negligence, and paid by plaintiff, proof of loss is properly admitted as showing plaintiff's liability to the insured.

5. In an action by an insurance company to recover from a railroad company a loss caused by defendant's negligence, the admission of a statement in a stipulation to the effect that defendant had offered to pay the insured $12,500 in addition to the insurance money is not injurious to defendant when the court expressly charges that this offer is not evidence that defendant had been guilty of negligence, or was responsible for the loss.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by the Liverpool & London & Globe Insurance Company against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for appellant. Van Ness & Redman, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Appeal from the judgment and from the order denying the defendant a new trial.

On July 15, 1893, the Sierra Ice Company was the owner of certain ice houses situated in Nevada county. Upon that day three of its houses, which were insured with plaintiff for $15,000, were totally destroyed by fire. The ice company presented its claim of loss for $44,000. The plaintiff paid the full amount of insurance, and after payment, being subrogated to the ice company, made demand upon the Southern Pacific Company for reimbursement, contending that the fire had been negligently set by the Southern Pacific Company in operating one of its locomotive engines. The Southern Pacific Company denied all responsibility for the fire, and refused payment. Plaintiff requested the ice company to join with it in an action against the Southern Pacific Company for a recovery. The ice company refused to do so, and was made a defendant in this action. During the trial of the action, however, the ice company, by stipulation of the parties, was dismissed from the case. The verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff.

The three ice houses which were destroyed were situated about a quarter of a mile from the main track of the railroad company. A side track was run into the premises of the ice company by the railroad company at the expense of the ice company. It was built for the convenient transportation of freight to and from the ice company's works. The engines and cars belonged to the railroad company, and were operated exclusively by it. The ice house which first caught fire stood close to the track, so that ice might be readily loaded from it upon the cars. Upon the day of the fire the railroad company was engaged in removing certain cars which had been loaded with ice from this ice house. In so doing the train men made a "flying switch." In making this switch the engine was started suddenly forward, pulling one of the cars away from the others and running with it on one track, leaving the other cars to follow more slowly behind and take another track after the engine and first car had passed. After the engine had made this sudden start in front of the ice house, and had run some distance down the track, a fire was observed on the roof of the ice house, just above the eaves, and exactly opposite where the engine had made its start. From these facts, and from others which appear in the case, and which will be set forth as occasion may require, plaintiff contends that the evidence sufficiently establishes that the fire was caused by the sparks discharged from the engine and falling upon the roof of the building. After the fire, the engine was sent to the roundhouse, and the spark arrester above the fire box of the engine was examined. The examination revealed that the screen of the spark arrester had a hole in it about two inches by six in dimension, which would allow the escape of live cinders and sparks. The superintendent of the ice company had heard that this engine had previously caused other fires, and had detailed a man to follow the engine as it ran in and out of the premises, and to be on the lookout and extinguish any fire that might be set. The fact that the spark arrester was imperfect does not appear to have been known to anybody until after its examination subsequent to the fire. Three different engines were from time to time employed in operating the "swing train" upon the ice company's premises, but the engine which was upon the premises at the time of the fire was the one most frequently used.

Appellant's first contention is that the evidence establishes that the ice company knew the danger to which its property stood liable from the use of the engine, and that with this knowledge, having invited the engine upon the premises, and voluntarily exposed its property to the risk, it is precluded from recovering from an injury which directly results from such exposure. That the principle of law here declared is sound there can be no question, but that the facts in this case were so well established in appellant's favor as to bring the ice company within the application of the principle is a very different matter. Appellant relies particularly upon the case of Railroad Co. v. Spear, 44 Mich. 169, 6 N. W. 202. The facts in that case were that plaintiffs owned a warehouse and a quantity of hay stored near it on premises of their own, and that upon these premises they had caused to be laid a track upon which railroad engines and cars had been running for their accommodation for a long time before the fire. When plaintiffs had occasion for cars, they had an arrangement with the railroad company to draw them in and take them out. A particular engine belonging to the railroad company was made use of for this purpose, and about the time of the fire it was going in and coming out several times a day. One of the plaintiffs testified that on the occasion of the fire the engine went in and out, throwing sparks. He was sitting in his office, watching them, and saw as she passed that a spark had communicated fire to the hay. The engine was noted for throwing sparks, and had two or three times before set loose hay on fire on the dock. "She had set fire, thrown fire around on the dock, and set loose hay on fire before in that season. She threw live cinders a quarter or a half an inch in diameter." The witness who so testified was one of the plaintiffs in the action. He had called the attention of the train dispatcher of the railroad to the dangerous condition of the engine, and the train dispatcher had said that he would see the engine fixed. Plaintiffs always had trouble with it, and were afraid of it because of its throwing sparks. The train dispatcher kept putting off the repairs. Nevertheless, plaintiffs continued to employ from day to day this dangerous implement until such a calamity as they feared actually occurred. These facts, Judge Cooley said, speaking for the court, instead of showing a cause of action, effectually disprove one. "It was a case of private employment, whereby the proprietors of the engine were solicited to send it upon the private business of the employers into a place where the latter well knew, and had for a long time known and understood, it was likely to do mischief. * * * There is just the same and no more reason for plaintiffs to complain of it than there would have been had they hired the owner of a vicious animal, known by them to be such, to bring him for their purposes upon their premises, and then been injured by him as they should have anticipated they might be. That which one consents to and invites he cannot complain of in the law as an injury." But in its facts the case at bar is broadly distinguishable from the one relied upon. The ice company did not invite this particular engine upon their premises. They requested the railroad company to send an engine, and it sent, from several which it was in the habit of using, this particular one. The ice company had not direct knowledge that the locomotive was dangerous. The extent of their information appears to be that they had heard it had set fires before; and finally they did, as apparently the plaintiffs in the Michigan case did not, take counter precautions against the risk of fire, by employing a man to watch and guard against this very danger. Therefore, if it be admitted that the evidence established that the ice company invited upon its premises for its own private ends a locomotive engine of the defendant known to be dangerous (a proposition which we are far from conceding the evidence does establish), nevertheless it appears that the ice company took certain counter precautions against the danger, and whether those precautions were such as reasonable care would dictate was a question properly submitted to the jury. We say properly submitted, for it does not follow, as appellant contends, that, because the facts as to the nature of the precautions employed by the ice company to guard against the danger were proved without conflict or dispute in the evidence, and from the additional fact that the precautions did not prevent the fire, that for these reasons the question of contributory negligence upon the part of the ice company became one of law to be decided by the court, and not one of fact to be submitted to the jury. If it is even fairly debatable whether or not the ice company acted with ordinary prudence in the light of its knowledge, the question is one for the jury; and the fact that such precautions as it took did not avail to prevent a conflagration is in no way determinative of the question, for, if it may be said that it can be determined by the result whether or not the person in any given case has exercised the degree of care with which the law charges him, it must logically follow that in every case in which a plaintiff has sustained injury he has been guilty of contributory negligence. It is always easy after an accident to see how it could have been avoided, but a man's duty before the calamity is not measured by such ex post facto information. Burke v. Witherbee, 98 N. Y. 562. There are some acts which, if a plaintiff commits, and there are some omissions of which, if he be guilty, that are of such nature as clearly to fix upon him culpability and contributory negligence, if injury to him thereby result. But there is a vastly larger number of cases which come, not within this category, but, where the question whether or not the acts of the plaintiff come up to or fall short of the degree of care required of him by law, is one of fact to be determined by the jury. Clearly this is such a case, and it seems necessary, in support of the conclusion, only to refer to such cases as Fernandes v. Railway Co., 52 Cal. 45; Carr v. Railroad Co., 98 Cal. 366, 33 Pac. 213; Van Praag v. Gale, 107 Cal. 438, 40 Pac. 555; Redington v. Cable Co., 107 Cal. 317, 40 Pac. 432; McKune v. Lumber Co., 110 Cal. 480, 42 Pac. 980.

Appellant complains of instruction 2 given by the court at the request of the respondent. The instruction is too long for quotation. In hypothetical form it groups certain facts, and tells the jury that, if they believe these facts to be established by the evidence, a prima facie case is made out which would warrant a finding that the engine of defendant caused the fire. It is said that the instruction violates the constitutional provision, and that the court trespassed upon the domain of the jury in advising them upon the facts, and that the whole instruction is argumentative and unfair. A careful reading of it satisfies us that the criticism is not well founded. The evidence as to the cause and origin of the fire was circumstantial. As a part of the instruction, the court said: "If, upon the whole evidence, and taking into consideration all the conditions and circumstances surrounding the fire, you find it to be more probable that the fire was caused by sparks escaping from the swing engine than from any other cause, your finding upon that point, to wit, the origin of the fire, should be accordingly." This portion of the instruction is especially criticised as a declaration to the jury that they might reach a determination upon an important fact from mere conjecture, guess, or supposition, without any evidence in support of it; that they were told that they could reach a verdict upon the doctrine of probabilities; and it is said that a case is not proven by a preponderance of evidence when a mere probability is established. We think, under the facts and circumstances of this case, that this criticism is also without merit. The question of the origin of the fire was one to be determined by circumstantial evidence. No one saw a spark from the engine alight upon and set fire to the roof of the ice house. It was, then, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, a proposition for the plaintiff to establish that the probability was that the engine occasioned the fire. Nor does the use of the word "probability," in the instruction of the court, cast the question into the domain of mere conjecture and surmise. In civil cases which are decided in favor of the litigant upon a mere preponderance of evidence, the rule of decision is, after all, but a rule of probability, and this is well recognized. Says Greenleaf: "In civil cases * * * it is not necessary that the minds of the jurors be freed from all doubt. It is their duty to decide in favor of the party on whose side the weight of evidence preponderates, and according to the reasonable probability of truth." And again: "A presumption of fact is an inference which a reasonable man would draw from certain facts which have been proved to him. Its basis is in logic; its source is probability." "Circumstantial evidence is of two kinds, namely, certain * * * and uncertain, or that from which the conclusion does not necessarily follow, but is probable only, and is obtained by process of reasoning." 1 Greenl. Ev. (15th Ed.) pp. 23, 24, 72. Says this court, in Butcher v. Railroad Co., 67 Cal. 518, 8 Pac. 174: "Evidence that sparks and burning coals were frequently dropped by engines passing upon the same road upon previous occasions has been held to be relevant and competent to show negligence, and to make it probable that the plaintiff's injury proceeded from the same quarter." And further reference may be had to Sheldon v. Railroad Co., 14 N. Y. 218; Kelsey v. Railway Co. (S. D.) 45 N. W. 204; Yanktown Fire Ins. Co. v. Fremont, E. & M. V. R. Co. (S. D.) 64 N. W. 514; Longabaugh v. Railroad Co., 9 Nev. 271.

It has already been said that the court did not err in submitting to the jury the question of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff in the matter of the use of the particular engine. It submitted to the jury the proposition as to whether or not the precautions made use of by the ice company to prevent a fire were, under all the circumstances, such precautions as would be employed by a prudent man in a like case. But appellant objects that the court instructed the jury that the ice company did employ counter precautions, and insists that the question whether or not it employed counter precautions was one of fact for the jury. We think this criticism captious. Whether or not the counter precautions were adequate to relieve the ice company from the charge of contributory negligence was properly for the jury; but it is not disputed that the ice company did something—took some measures—against the danger to which its property was exposed. It employed a man to follow and watch the engine. Over this there was no dispute. It could not have injured the defendant that the court designated these acts of the ice company "counter precautions," when it carefully left the determination of their reasonable sufficiency with the jury.

The proof of loss was properly admitted in evidence as establishing plaintiff's liability for the moneys which it had paid to the ice company, and as a declaration within the issues of the pleadings against the defendant ice company. Plaintiff's counsel stated upon its introduction that no claim was made that any statement contained in it was binding upon the appellant. It was admitted for a limited purpose. Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 279, 30 Pac. 529. The stipulation by agreement of the parties expressed upon the face of the writing itself was made admissible in evidence, and the declaration contained in the stipulation that the appellant had offered to pay the ice company the sum of $12,500 in addition to the insurance money was not injurious to the appellant, as the court instructed the jury, at the request of appellant, that "said offer was of itself neither an admission that the defendant had been guilty of negligence, nor that it had caused said fire, nor that anything was due to said Sierra Lakes Ice Company, or the plaintiff herein, by reason of said fire." The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, J.; HARRISON, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent for several reasons, but, waiving other points, it is sufficient to say here that, in my opinion, the court below, in giving instruction No. 2 asked by respondent, committed a material and prejudicial error for which the judgment should be reversed. The instruction is very long, and is, I think, erroneous as a whole, because it deals mainly with questions of fact, and is argumentative. The specific part of it which, in my opinion, is clearly erroneous is as follows: "Proof to the effect that immediately before the breaking out of the fire, an engine of the defendant, burning coal for the purpose of generating steam, was in operation immediately by, and in close proximity to, the place where the fire broke out, and that such engine had, on previous occasions, set fire by sparks escaping therefrom, and that said engine was so operated in relation to said property that a spark or sparks escaping therefrom could have set the fire, and the condition of the property and the surrounding circumstances being such as to warrant a belief on your part that the fire was more likely brought about by a spark or sparks from said engine than from any other cause, would be such reasonable evidence, and would prima facie establish that the fire had been caused by said engine, and would warrant a finding upon your part to that effect, in the absence of evidence that the fire arose from some other cause." This language does not include a single proposition of law. It simply tells the jury how they should weigh the evidence, and how certain inferences of fact should be drawn from other facts, and is an unwarrantable interference with the province of the jury. Such an instruction has been repeatedly held by this court to be erroneous, and to be in contravention of section 19, art. 6, of the constitution. The error of such an instruction is aptly illustrated by the case of People v. Walden, 51 Cal. 588. The defendant in that case was charged with having fraudulently changed certain ballots which had been voted at an election, after they had been deposited in the clerk's office; and it was shown on the trial that a key which would fit and open the lock of the door leading to the clerk's office had been found on the person of the defendant, and the court below, speaking of the key, told the jury: "If you believe it would open the clerk's office where the ballots were kept, then the possession by the defendant unexplained raises a reasonable presumption that he had it for the purpose of opening that door." The court, in its opinion, said: "In no view can this charge be sustained. If it be said that it was an attempt to charge in respect to a legal presumption, it was clearly error, since no such presumption would arise from the fact stated, as a matter of law. If it was an attempt on the part of the court to instruct the jury that the existence of one fact, in view of the ordinary experience of mankind, and connection of events, must be presumed from the existence of another, this was an interference with what, as we have shown, is the exclusive province of the jury. It was charging the jury 'with respect to matters of fact,' and was a contravention of section 19, art. 6, of the constitution of the state." In Re Carpenter's Estate, 94 Cal. 406, 29 Pac. 1101, the court (we quote from the syllabus, which correctly states what was decided) said: "Instructions as to the weight and value of evidence, stating what the jury are at liberty to conclude from certain facts, if found, involving a conclusion, not of law, but of the judging mind from the evidence, are in violation of the constitutional inhibition as to instructions upon matters of fact. The court has no right to dictate, or even suggest, the process of reasoning by which the evidence shall be judged." See, also, Stone v. Mining Co., 52 Cal. 315; People v. Carrillo, 54 Cal. 63. For these reasons, and in accordance with the principle declared in the above-cited authorities, the judgment, in my opinion, should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

In re PACKER'S ESTATE. (L. A. 691.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 18, 1899.)
EXECUTORS—SALES OF LAND UNDER ORDER OF COURT—WHEN TITLE VESTS IN HEIR.

Act March 23, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 212), amending Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1537, 1538, provides that an order to sell realty may be granted to an administrator when it appears to be for the best interest of the estate, although there are no debts or liens. Decedent died in 1891, leaving no debts or liens, and after the passage of this statute an order of sale was granted to his administrator under its authority. Held, that the title to the lands vested in the heirs at the testator's death, subject to the debts and liens, if any, and consequently the statute conferred no authority for this order.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

In the matter of the estate of John B. Packer, deceased. Application for an order of sale. From a decree ordering the sale, an heir appeals. Reversed.

Jas. Burdett, for appellant. C. L. Batcheller, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Pending administration of the above-entitled estate, the administrator filed his petition praying for an order to sell certain real property belonging to the estate "on the ground that it was for the advantage, benefit, and best interests of the estate and those interested therein," setting forth in detail "in what way an advantage and benefit would accrue to the estate, and those interested therein, by such sale." An order was duly made, reciting the substance of the petition, and fixing a time and place for its hearing. This order was duly published as required by law. Upon the hearing, proofs in support of the petition were submitted, and no one interested in the estate opposed the application. The sale was ordered and made in due course, and was duly confirmed after hearing of returns of account of sale and upon due notice. The surviving wife of deceased, one of the heirs at law, appeals.

The petition showed that there were no debts, expenses, or charges of administration to be met, and that the only ground for the order was as above stated. Section 1537, Code Civ. Proc., as amended in 1893, reads: " * * * And if said order for sale of real estate is petitioned for on the ground that it is for the advantage, benefit and best interests of the estate and those interested therein that a sale be made, the petition * * * must set forth in what way an advantage or benefit would accrue to the estate, and those interested, by such sale," etc. Section 1538, id., provides as follows: "If it appears to the court or judge, from such petition, that it is necessary, or that it would be for the advantage, benefit and best interests of the estate and those interested therein, to sell the whole or some portion of the real estate for the purposes and reasons mentioned in the preceding section, or any of them, such petition must be filed, and an order thereupon made" directing all persons interested to appear and show cause, etc., at a time and place specified. Section 1542, Id., authorizes the court to order the sale if the allegations of the petition are sustained by the proofs. Sections 1543 and 1544 relate to the same matters. Appellant relies upon the case of Brenham v. Story, 39 Cal. 179; citing, also, Pryor v. Downey, 50 Cal. 409; McNeil v. Society, 66 Cal. 110, 4 Pac. 1096; Smith v. Olmstead, 88 Cal. 582, 26 Pac. 521; Bates v. Howard, 105 Cal. 173, 38 Pac. 715; and some other cases; also, 2 Woerner, Adm'n, §§ 469, 470. In Brenham v. Story an act of the legislature approved April 15, 1861 (St. 1861, p. 152), authorized the administrator of Charles White, deceased, "to sell at public or private sale, at his discretion, and without having first obtained an order of the probate court therefor, the whole or any portion of the real estate, or any right, title, or interest therein claimed, held, or owned by the said Charles White at the time of his death, as in the judgment of such administrator will best promote the interests of those entitled to said estate." This act was amendatory of section 1 of an act approved April 6, 1860 (St. 1860, p. 148). Other sections of the act of 1860 required the administrator to report the sale to the court for approval, and empowered the court to act ex parte on the report, and made no provision for notice of any hearing on the report. Upon such approval of the court the administrator was authorized to make a deed. This was a special act, passed after the death of the intestate. The general law then was much the same as now, and authorized the sale of real estate for the purpose of making payment of family allowance, debts of the decedent, or the debts, expenses, or charges of administration or legacies; but the general law did not then provide for a sale of real estate, there being no such charges, whenever, in the judgment of the administrator, the sale would best promote the interests of those entitled to the estate. This latter, however, was what the legislature undertook to do by special act after the death of the ancestor. The court said: "Upon the death of the ancestor the heir becomes vested at once with the full property, subject to the liens we have mentioned [the debts, etc.]; and, subject to these liens and the temporary right of possession of the administrator, he may at once sell and dispose of the property, and has the same right to judge for himself of the relative advantages of selling or holding that any other owner has. His estate is indefeasible, except in satisfaction of these prior liens, and the legislature has no more right to order a sale of his vested interest in his inheritance, because it will be, in the estimation of the administrator and the probate judge, for his advantage, than it has to direct the sale of the property of any other person acquired in any other way." Respondent misconceives the controlling principle of the case in placing it on the fact "that in passing the act the legislature usurped judicial functions." The decision rests upon the want of power to order the sale after the title had vested in the heirs, except for the purposes provided by the law in force at the death of the ancestor. In the case before us decedent died July 10, 1891, while a resident of this state, and letters were duly issued to respondent as administrator in May, 1892. The act under which the sale was ordered and made was approved March 23, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 212). Whether the law is constitutional as applied to the property of decedents who have died since the passage of the act is a question not presented, and need not be considered or decided. But we think the precise question here involved was decided in Brenham v. Story adversely to respondent's contention, and must rule this case. The principle there laid down, that upon the death of the ancestor the heir at once becomes vested with the full property, subject only to liens then existing, or created by statute then in force, has never been questioned by the court. See Smith v. Olmstead, 88 Cal. 582, 26 Pac. 521; Bates v. Howard, 105 Cal. 173, 38 Pac. 715; and many other cases that might be cited. It is true, as we are reminded by respondent, that in the Brenham Case the court said: "The right of an heir to his inheritance depends upon positive law, and it is not a natural or an absolute right. It is competent for the legislature to change the rule of inheritance, or to restrict the testamentary power. It may provide, as it has done, that the heir or devisee shall take subject to certain burdens, as the payment of the debts," etc. But this is far from saying that the legislature might, as was attempted in that case, after the title had vested in the heir, empower the administrator to sell the inheritance for purposes not authorized at the time the title vested, and to which it was not subject when it vested. Respondent cites Cooley's Constitutional Limitations and some cases in support of the power. These may be worthy of consideration when a case arises under the statute where the decedent has died since the enactment of the amendments, but they do not convince us of any unsoundness in the principles stated in Brenham v. Story, supra. The statute authorizing the mortgaging of estates, to which our attention is called, rests upon the principle that the mortgage provides for the payment of liens existing under the law, or likely to arise thereunder.

Respondent presents reasons in support of the statute as applicable to estates where the decedent died after the passage of the law, but, as we have said, that question does not necessarily arise here, and ought not to be decided until it does arise. Any expression of opinion upon it now would be obiter. We advise that the order be reversed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is reversed.

RIGHT OF INHERITANCE.

Under Pen. Code, § 674, which provides that a person sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for life is thereafter deemed civilly dead, a person who is serving a life sentence at the time of his father's death does not inherit from him.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

In the matter of the estate of Thomas Donnelly, deceased. From a decree of distribution depriving him of a share in decedent's estate, Charles J. Stilwell appealed. Affirmed.

Crittenden Thornton, for appellant. Alex. D. Keys, Dunne & McPike, T. J. Crowley, T. J. Lyons, E. C. Harrison, and Humphreys & Morrow, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. Thomas Donnelly died intestate February 17, 1896, and on December 3, 1897, the superior court made a decree distributing his estate to his widow and the successors in interest of three of his children. The decedent left surviving him another child, James J. Donnelly, who, prior to his father's death, viz. October 5, 1894, was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison of the state of California for the term of his natural life, and who at the time of his father's death and at the date of the said decree of distribution was in confinement therein under such sentence. February 11, 1897, James made an assignment and transfer of his interest in the estate of his father to Charles J. Stilwell, who, by virtue thereof, claimed to have a portion of the estate of the decedent distributed to him. The court denied his claim, and distributed the estate as above stated. From this decree of distribution Stilwell has appealed.

Section 674 of the Penal Code is as follows: "A person sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for life is thereafter deemed civilly dead." Civil death imports a deprivation of all rights whose exercise or enjoyment depends upon some provision of positive law. In Anderson's Law Dictionary civil death is defined to be "extinction of civil rights." Bouvier says, "Civil death is the state of a person who, though possessing natural life, has lost all his civil rights, and as to them is considered as dead." Abbott defines civil death to be "the legal privation or extinction of a person's rights and capacities among his fellow members of society." In Nerac's Estate, 35 Cal. 392, the court said: "If the convict be sentenced for life, he becomes civiliter mortuus, or dead in law, in respect to his estate, as if he was dead in fact." If James had died a natural death at the time he was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of his natural life, the correctness of the decree would be unquestioned, and for the purpose of any right of inheritance his civil death must have the same effect. The right of inheritance is a civil right existing only by virtue of the law, and the legislature may make the deprivation of this right a portion of the penalty to be imposed for the commission of a crime. The provisions of sections 675 and 676 of the Penal Code, instead of impairing this construction given to section 674, strengthen it by showing that, but for these provisions, in the opinion of the legislature, the civil death of the felon would extend to the cases therein named; and the enumeration of the cases wherein section 674 is inoperative authorizes the conclusion that those are the only cases in which it is not to be applied. Avery v. Everett, 110 N. Y. 317, 18 N. E. 148, cited by the appellant, has no application to the facts of the present case. In that case the testator died in 1869, leaving to his son, Charles, an estate in the lands in question, which the court held to be a vested remainder in fee, limited upon the life of his mother, but subject to be defeated by his dying without children. This remainder was property capable of being transferred by Charles, and vested in him at the death of his father. In 1875 Charles was convicted of murder, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of his natural life. The court was not called upon to consider whether his right of inheritance was destroyed by the sentence, but whether the sentence operated to divest him of the property at that time owned by him, and held that the sentence did not have the effect to divest him of his interest in the land. The same rule exists in this state by virtue of section 677 of the Penal Code, which provides: "No conviction of any person for crime works any forfeiture of any property, except in cases in which a forfeiture is expressly imposed by law." Under the conclusion reached herein it is unnecessary to consider the respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal. The decree is affirmed.

In re STRAUT. (S. F. 1,185.)

INSOLVENCY—DISTRIBUTION OF ASSETS—INDIVIDUAL AND FIRM CREDITORS.

An involuntary insolvent in the inventory of his property included the assets of his firm, which had become insolvent, and also included firm creditors in his list of creditors. Many of the creditors proved their demands, some of them being creditors of the insolvent only, and others creditors of the firm. Of $2,100 to be distributed among creditors only $3.50 came from the firm assets, and the partnership affairs were never settled. The assignee distributed the fund to all of the creditors pro rata, including firm creditors. Held, that section 39 of the insolvent law (St. 1895, p. 144), providing that in cases of insolvent partners the proceeds of the partnership property shall be first applied to payment of partnership creditors, and moneys derived from the estates of the partners to the payment of individual debts, either set of creditors having the right to resort to any surplus there might be in the fund first to be appropriated, did not apply where only one partner was adjudged insolvent, and that the creditors were entitled to share pro rata, as provided by section 35 of the act.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Napa county.

Appeal by individual creditors of George Straut, an insolvent, from orders allowing firm creditors to share pro rata with them. Affirmed.

F. E. Johnston, H. C. Gesford, and E. L. Webber, for appellants. H. M. Barstow, for respondent. C. J. Beerstecher, for assignee.

TEMPLE, J. The insolvent had been a member of a co-partnership doing business under the firm name of Meigs & Straut. The firm had become heavily indebted, and had ceased to do business. Some individual creditors of Straut caused him to be adjudged an insolvent debtor on the 26th day of August, 1895. In obedience to an order of the court Straut made and filed an inventory of his property, which included the assets of the co-partnership. He also gave a list of his creditors, including the creditors of the firm. The sheriff of the county was directed to take charge of the estate, and a meeting of the creditors was provided for. Many creditors proved their demands. Some were only creditors of Straut, but others were creditors of the firm. An assignee was appointed, and the usual assignment made. On the 24th day of July, 1897, the accounts of the assignee were settled. He had subject to distribution to creditors $2,100.17. It was distributed to all the creditors pro rata, including the firm creditors. This distribution was objected to by the individual creditors, who contended that they should be first paid, and that the co-partnership creditors would take nothing unless there was a surplus after paying the individual creditors. The assets would suffice to pay only a small per cent. of the allowed claims of the individual creditors. The proceeds in the hands of the assignee were from individual property, except $3.50, which was from the partnership assets. The partnership affairs have never been settled. Whether its assets possess further value does not appear.

Section 39 (St. 1895, p. 144) of the insolvent act provides for the proceeding in the case of partnerships. The assets of the partnership and the individual estates of the partners are taken by the assignee, and the proceeds of partnership property are to be first applied to the payment of partnership creditors, and the moneys derived from individual estates to the payment of individual debts. Either set of creditors could resort to any surplus there might be in the fund first to be appropriated to the other class. Appellant contends that this rule should prevail in this case, where only one of the partners has been adjudged insolvent, and the court has no jurisdiction over the estate of the partnership. But the statute cannot be extended beyond the special case for which it was provided. According to section 35 all creditors whose debts are proved and allowed may share pro rata, without a preference, except as provided in section 1204, Code Civ. Proc., in regard to claims of servants and others. By section 41 all debts due or to become due may be proved against the estate. Each partner owes all the debts of the partnership, and his goods may be taken to pay them. He may become insolvent through the indebtedness of the partnership, and in the case of his individual insolvency his creditors may undoubtedly have recourse to his interest in the partnership assets. Of course, his interest would be taken subject to the prior rights of partnership creditors, and to the expense of settling the affairs of the partnership. As the partnership debts can be proved against the estate, a discharge must have the effect of relieving his separate estate from all liability for partnership debts. The partnership might not be insolvent, but the insolvency of an individual partner would necessitate a dissolution, and an assignee could insist upon a liquidation, and obtain for the creditors of the individual the value of the insolvent's interest in its assets. In this mode, perhaps, the assignee could cause the partnership assets to be applied to the payment of partnership debts before such creditors could have recourse to the individual estate. But as the statute now stands the court cannot discriminate in distributing the funds of the estate. The orders are affirmed.

COWDERY v. McCHESNEY. (Sac. 591.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1899.)

EVIDENCE—QUALIFICATION OF EXPERT WITNESS.

In an action to recover for personal services in nursing and caring for defendant's testator, plaintiff introduced as an expert witness as to the value of the services a woman of experience in the same kind of work, and who had seen the nature of plaintiff's services on the ranch where they were performed. In answer to the question, "From your experience, and what you saw on the ranch, are you able to say what such services are reasonably worth?" she replied, "Well, I am able to tell what I think." Held, that the court erred in excluding the testimony on the ground that witness had admitted her incompetency.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Action by Minnie E. Cowdery against Clark McChesney, as executor of George M. Kasson, deceased. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Minor & Ashley, for appellant. John A. Percy, Budd & Thompson, and Nicol & Orr, for respondent.

GRAY, C. This action is brought to recover the reasonable value of certain services, as housekeeper, superintendent of the household and domestic affairs, and as nurse, alleged to have been performed by plaintiff for her deceased uncle, George M. Kasson, in his lifetime. For several years immediately preceding the death of Kasson he was afflicted with various disorders of body and mind which rendered it necessary that he should have the constant attention of some one to take care of his person and home. He engaged the plaintiff to perform this service for him, agreeing that she should be well paid. To show the value of her services, the plaintiff called as a witness Mrs. S. A. Hathaway, who testified to her acquaintance with deceased; that she had been at his house the night before and on the morning of his death, and had observed what was necessary to be done to take care of him properly; and that she had occupied a position at the state insane asylum as a keeper of a ward, it being her duty to superintend the ward, and see that the work of caring for the patients was properly done. She was then asked, "From your experience at the asylum, and what you saw on the Kasson ranch, are you able to say what such services as Mrs. Cowdery rendered there were reasonably worth?" to which the witness answered, "Well, I am able to tell what I think." Plaintiff then asked her, "What were the services rendered by Mrs. Cowdery upon the Kasson ranch reasonably worth, if you know?" This question was objected to on the ground "that the witness has shown, by her own examination, that she is not competent to testify." It would seem that the court erred in sustaining this objection. The testimony of the witness shows that she was in a position to give an intelligent opinion as to the reasonable worth of the plaintiff's services in caring for her afflicted uncle, and the question objected to was therefore competent and proper. When plaintiff rested her case, no evidence had been elicited as to the value of her services; consequently the above ruling of the court was prejudicial to her rights. On account of this error we advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be reversed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

LANZ v. FRESNO LOAN & SAVINGS BANK. (S. F. 1,077.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1899.)
BANKS—LIQUIDATION—ACTIONS BY CREDITORS.

That the bank commissioners have directed a bank to liquidate, and wind up its affairs, and that this is being done entirely by its own officers, who are collecting its assets, and disbursing money to depositors, does not deprive its creditors of their right to commence actions against it.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county.

Action by Henry Lanz against the Fresno Loan & Savings Bank. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appealed. Affirmed.

Horace Hawes, for appellant. L. L. Cory and W. D. Tupper, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendant certain sums of money deposited with it. The answer alleged that the deposits were made under and in accordance with a by-law of the defendant which required notice to the bank of any intended withdrawal of moneys deposited. It was further alleged that the defendant was visited by the bank commissioners, who required the defendant to levy an assessment upon its capital stock of $10 per share, and use the funds thus raised in the conduct of its business; that defendant refused to comply with this direction, and the bank commissioners "advised and directed defendant to liquidate, and wind up its affairs"; that defendant closed its doors to all new business, and proceeded to wind up its affairs, and is still doing so under the direction of said bank commissioners. The court, after finding in substance the foregoing facts, further found: "That at all times since the defendant closed its doors the officers of the bank have had entire charge and control of the collection of all debts, securities, and assets, and the disbursement of the same, and a large amount of money has been since said time collected by the officers of said bank, and disbursed to various depositors; and securities have, from time to time, been turned over to creditors of the bank in payment of their claims; that no payments have been made to plaintiff, but that defendant has, however, from time to time, received advices and instructions from the bank commissioners." From the foregoing facts the court found as a conclusion of law that plaintiff was entitled to judgment, which was accordingly ordered, and this appeal is taken therefrom.

There is no question raised as to the validity of the indebtedness of the bank to plaintiff, but it is insisted upon the part of the bank that it is in process of liquidation, and therefore cannot be sued by a depositor. In view of the findings of fact made by the trial court to the effect that the bank had collected and disbursed to various depositors large sums of money, and that securities have been from time to time turned over to various creditors of the bank in payment of their claims, and that plaintiff has been entirely overlooked in the making of these disbursements, it would seem that there should be some legal remedy which he might invoke to secure his rights. We see no importance to be attached to the demand of the bank commissioners that the bank levy an assessment of $10 per share upon its stock, and a refusal upon its part to comply with the demand. That matter appears to be wholly immaterial here. Neither do we attach any importance to the mere advice or direction of the bank commissioners given to the bank to wind up its affairs. We do not see that the bank stands in a different position, as to the law, when it proceeds to liquidate upon the advice and direction of the commissioners to that end, from that which it occupies when, realizing its unfortunate condition, it proceeds to liquidate without advice or direction. The banking act (section 11, St. 1887) provides that whenever a bank refuses to comply with orders given by the commissioners, directing the manner and conduct of its business to be changed so as to comply with the requirements of its charter and the banking act, "or whenever it shall appear to said commissioners that it is unsafe for any such corporation as in this act mentioned to continue to transact business, they shall notify the attorney general of such fact, who, after examination, in his discretion, may commence suit in the proper court against such corporation, to enjoin and prohibit the transaction of any further business by such corporation; and upon the hearing of the case, if the judge of the court where the case is tried shall be of the opinion that it is unsafe for the parties interested or for such corporation to continue to transact business, and that such corporation or institution is insolvent, shall issue the injunction applied for by said commissioners and attorney general, who shall cause said injunction to be served according to law." This injunction of the trial court is, in effect, an order throwing the bank into liquidation, and until the bank goes into liquidation under such order it is not protected from the suits of creditors. Until such time it is acting entirely independent of courts, and largely independent of bank commissioners. In this case it nowhere appears that any proceedings have ever been taken by the bank commissioners and the attorney general resulting in the judicial declaration contemplated by the banking act, and until such action is taken the bank's legal status as to its creditors is not changed. From the standpoint of the law, in the absence of an express provision to that effect, it is incredible to believe that a bank, of its own motion, may close its doors, and proceed to a liquidation which prevents its creditors from seeking the aid of courts to enforce their rights. However tightly the doors of the bank may be closed to creditors by the directors, those directors cannot close the doors of the courts to its creditors; and the doors of the bank can never be closed so tightly at the mere desire of the directors or stockholders but that a court will open them at the request of the creditors. We conclude that, in the absence of the judicial declaration contemplated by the banking act, the right of action against the bank by creditors stands exactly as though its doors had never been closed, and its business was progressing in the usual and ordinary channels. There is no authority in this state opposed to the conclusion we have declared. In Crane v. Bank, 106 Cal. 64, 39 Pac. 215, there was a judicial decree against the bank as provided in the banking act, and in the other recent cases decided by this court bearing upon the construction of the banking act here involved nothing is decided contrary to the views now expressed. Under the authority of Mitchell v. Beckman, 64 Cal. 117, 28 Pac. 110, there is no merit in the claim raised by appellant as to the noncompliance upon the part of plaintiff with the by-laws of the corporation defendant. For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

STREET RAILROADS—BONDS—ISSUANCE—STOCKHOLDERS' LIABILITY.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 456, 510, which provide that street-railroad companies may issue bonds in payment of contracts for constructing and completing their roads, and section 359, which provides that the bonded indebtedness of a corporation may be created or increased by a vote of the stockholders representing at least two-thirds of the entire capital stock, a stockholder is not liable, in an action to enforce his stockholders' liability, for bonds issued in part payment for the construction of the road, for the issuance of which the stockholders never voted.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county.

Action by James T. Boyd and others against E. A. Heron and others to enforce stockholders' liability. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appealed. Affirmed.

Adair Welcker (W. H. Fifield, of counsel), for appellants. S. B. McGee, C. H. Wilson,

Chickering, Thomas & Gregory, Fitzgerald & Abbott, and John Yule, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiffs brought this action against defendants as stockholders of the Consolidated Piedmont Cable Company, a street-railroad corporation, for the purpose of enforcing their liability as stockholders for an indebtedness arising upon 10 bonds for $1,000 each, issued in part payment for the construction of the company's road. Plaintiffs suffered nonsuit, and from the judgment which followed they appeal.

The bonds were issued under authority of sections 456 and 457 of the Civil Code. These sections are under the subtitle of "Railroad Corporations," but by section 510 of the same Code their provisions are applicable to street-railroad corporations. It was urged, with other grounds of nonsuit, that no liability was cast upon the stockholders by the issuance of these bonds, because the mode of their issuance was unauthorized by law. The contention of the appellants upon this point is that the bonds were duly issued in compliance with the provisions of sections 456 and 457, were issued for a purpose recognized by those sections, and that, though issued in payment of the work of construction, by their issuance a new and original liability was created against the corporation and against those who were stockholders at that time. By respondents it is insisted that the bonds could only be legally issued after compliance with the provisions of section 359 of the Civil Code; that these bonds were not so issued, that the stockholders never assented to the issuance, and that, therefore, the bonds are void, or that, at the least, no liability against the stockholders on account of the bonds has been created. This position of respondents, we think, is sound. The issuance of these bonds was not an increase, but the creation, of a bonded indebtedness. Under the provisions of section 359 of the Civil Code the bonded indebtedness of a corporation may be created or increased by a vote of the stockholders representing at least two-thirds of the entire capital stock, at a meeting called by the directors, etc. Section 456 of the Civil Code declares that railroad corporations may issue bonds in payment of any debts or contracts for constructing and completing their road, and further authorizes the directors to impose regulations and restrictions upon the issuance. Section 359 is a general section, applicable to all corporations, one of the most important provisions of which is to give the stockholders a voice in saying whether or not a bonded indebtedness shall be created or increased. No reason is perceived why railroad corporations should be relieved from the operation of this salutary provision. It does not thereby follow that section 456 is void, but that it is to be construed with section 359, as was done in the case of Railway Co. v. Hellman, 109 Cal. 571-594, 42 Pac. 232. Therein it is said that section 359 "provides the method by which the bonded indebtedness of all corporations is to be created or increased," while section 456 confers upon railroad corporations the power to create such an indebtedness. Construing these sections together, then, under section 456 the directors may prescribe reasonable regulations which shall govern the proposed bond issue, but before the issue can be legally made the assent of the required number of stockholders thereto must be had in compliance with the mode laid down in section 359. In McLane v. Railroad Co., 66 Cal. 606, 6 Pac. 748, the provisions of the statute under which those railroad bonds were issued were substantially identical with the terms of section 456 of the Civil Code. The legality of the bond issue in that case was upheld, but at that time there was not upon our books any such statutory provision as is found in section 359, Civ. Code. Whether or not the bonds are void, so as to cast no liability upon the corporation, we are not here called upon to consider; but we think it quite plain that those who were stockholders at the time of the bond issue may be heard to say that, because of the irregularity of the issue, and of their deprivation of an important right to vote upon the bond issue, no liability against them has been created. The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

(Sac. 594.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 22, 1899.)

RECEIVER—APPOINTMENT—EXECUTORS' SALE OF LANDS—CONFIRMATION—TITLE.

1. In a suit for an accounting for the rents of lands, brought against one in possession by one who claims title, when the former denies the latter's title and alleges title in himself, equity will not appoint a receiver to collect the rents, as the principal question in dispute is legal, and not equitable.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1561, which provides that, when property is directed by the will to be sold, the executor may sell any property without an order of the court, but that no title passes unless the sale be confirmed by the court, a sale made pursuant to the provisions of a will which empowered the executor to sell without an order of the court must be confirmed, to authorize a conveyance and vest the title in the purchaser.

3. Where the executors of an estate have entered into a valid contract for sale of lands, and put the purchaser in possession, and he has made valuable improvements and collected the rents, equity will not appoint a receiver, in an action for an accounting, where the executors claim title on the ground that the sale was not confirmed, where it was their duty to report such sale for confirmation, and they failed so to do.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county.

Action by Mary A. Bennallack against W. G. Richards and others. From an order appointing a receiver, Samuel Granger, one of the defendants, appeals. Reversed.

Alfred D. Mason, for appellant. C. W. Kitts and J. M. Walling, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Appeal by Samuel Granger from an order appointing a receiver. Mary A. Bennallack in March, 1895, commenced an action in the superior court of Nevada county against William G. Richards, Francis S. Richards, and James Bennallack, as executors of the last will of Philip Richards, deceased, and William G. Richards, Francis S. Richards, and William S. Richards, personally, to quiet her title to lot 28 in block 30 in Nevada City. A sufficient statement of facts may be made without attempting a synopsis of each different pleading: Philip Richards in May, 1887, died testate, seised of said lot. His will was duly probated, and William G. Richards, Francis S. Richards, and James Bennallack, who were nominated therein as executors, were appointed and qualified as such. Certain legacies or "money bequests" were made in the will, and the testator's brothers Francis S. and William S. Richards were named as residuary legatees. The will directed that no part of the estate be sold until two years after the testator's death; that in the meantime the executors should collect the rents, and after paying taxes, etc., the remainder should be applied to the payment of said "money bequests." The will further provided: "After the expiration of two years from my decease, my said executors are hereby empowered to sell at public or private sale any portion of my estate, real or personal, to such persons, on such terms, and for such sums as they may deem advisable; and all this to do and perform without any order of court whatever, and also to make, execute, and deliver any and all deeds, bills of sale, or other conveyances necessary to dispose of said estate and convert the same into money, without any order of the court, or being required to account to any court." The lot in question was duly appraised at $3,000 in April, 1891, and on May 11, 1891, was sold by the executors, under the power given them by the will, to Samuel Granger, for the sum of $3,365; but the sale was not then reported to or confirmed by the court, but the executors, supposing that the will gave them power to convey without a confirmation of the sale, at once executed to the purchaser a deed for said lot, received the purchase money, and distributed it to the legatees, under an order of the court, and the purchaser was put in possession. In a cross complaint filed by Francis S. Richards, one of the executors, it is alleged that said sale was never confirmed by the court, nor any order made for a conveyance; that Granger entered into possession of the lot on May 11, 1891, and remained in possession until February 9, 1893, and during that time received rents to the amount of $500 over and above all expenditures thereon; that on May 16, 1891, "Granger assigned to James Bennallack, in trust for the benefit of Mary A. Bennallack, his interest in said lot, for the sum of three thousand five hundred dollars," of which he then received $3,000, and the remainder he received from rents collected between that date and February 9, 1893, when he conveyed the lot to said Mary A. Bennallack, who then went into and remained in possession of the property, and appropriated the rents, until May 8, 1897, when she sold and conveyed the lot to Granger for the sum of $3,500, and that Granger has ever since been in possession, and received a rental of $106 per month; that in 1894 Francis S. Richards conveyed to James Bennallack all his interest as residuary legatee in said lot, and Bennallack conveyed said interest to Granger on May 8, 1897. Said cross complainant further alleged that about the sum of $1,000 remains unpaid upon the legacies; that there is not sufficient money in the hands of the executors to pay the same; that said sum of $3,365, the original purchase money paid for said lot by Granger, was paid to legatees in 1891, by order of the court, in part payment of legacies; that during their said possession of said lot said Granger and Mary A. Bennallack each made valuable and necessary improvements, repairs, and expenditures thereon, the value of which he does not know. Alleges that they are trustees of the rents for the benefit of the estate, that an accounting is necessary, and that said Granger is a necessary party, and offered, as such executor, to make such restitution to Samuel Granger and Mary A. Bennallack as the court should direct. The prayer is that Granger be brought in and made a party; that he and said Mary A. Bennallack be credited with the amount for which the property was sold to Granger on May 11, 1891, viz. $3,365, and also with the amounts paid by them for necessary repairs, taxes, and insurance, and charged with the amount received by them for rents; the balance to bear interest at 7 per cent. per annum, with annual rests. The answer to said cross complaint alleged that said sale and deed had been duly confirmed by order and decree of the court duly made and entered on February 19, 1895; and, after denials as to the amount of rents received, they set out particularly the repairs and improvements made upon the property, amounting to $3,500, and alleged the payment of taxes amounting to about $300, and denied that they, or either of them, now or ever were trustees of the rents for the estate, or ever occupied any fiduciary relation to it. This answer was filed December 29, 1897. On March 28, 1898, W. G. Richards, as executor, served notice of a motion for the appointment of a receiver, which notice stated that it would be based upon the affidavit accompanying the notice, and the judgment roll in the case of Granger v. Richards et al. (No. — in said court), the papers in this case, and the decision of the supreme court on the appeal heretofore prosecuted herein. 48 Pac. 622. Said affidavit alleged that said estate owned said lot, that the monthly rental is $106, and attacked appellant's financial responsibility. Granger filed a counter affidavit alleging his ownership of the lot, denying that he is irresponsible, and alleging that he owns other and known visible property in this state of great value. On May 24, 1898, a receiver was appointed, and this appeal is from the order making said appointment.

The judgment-roll referred to in said notice of motion is not set out in the transcript, nor any intimation of its purport given. The reference to the decision of this court does not give the title of the case, nor refer to any question of law or fact decided in it. We must assume, therefore, that neither were used on the hearing to sustain any allegation of fact. The original complaint filed by Mary A. Bennallack in 1895 was stricken out on motion of defendants. Bennallack, one of the executors, died in November, 1897. Francis S. Richards, the other surviving executor, was not made a party (either plaintiff or defendant) to the cross complaint, though he was served with it, and his default entered for not answering.

No case was made for the appointment of a receiver. Appellant, Granger, was brought into the case by the cross complaint, and no relief was sought against him, other than an accounting for the rents and profits. The title was put in issue, apparently for no other purpose than for an accounting. Appellant is in possession, but the action is not in form for the recovery of possession, but solely for an accounting. Respondents are certainly not entitled to an accounting until their title and right of possession are determined. Appellant's answer to the cross complaint denies that the estate has title, and alleges title in himself. It is evident that without the adjudication of that question in favor of the executors, they cannot be entitled to recover the rents and profits; and, if the legal title is in the estate, the executors may recover possession in an action of ejectment. The principal question, therefore, is one of legal, and not of equitable, cognizance. High, Rec. § 557, lays down the rule thus: "Whenever the contest is simply a question of disputed title to the property (plaintiff asserting a legal title in himself against a defendant in possession and receiving the rents and profits under claim of legal title) equity refuses to lend its extraordinary aid by interposing a receiver, just as it refuses an injunction under similar circumstances, leaving the plaintiff to assert his title in the ordinary forms of procedure at law. * * * A departure from the rule can only be justified upon strong grounds of judicial necessity, or in case of fraud clearly proven, or of imminent danger, unless immediate possession is taken by the court; and the burden rests upon complainant to make out a clear case, to justify the relief." There can be no question that the executors had ample power and authority under the will to make a valid sale; but confirmation of the sale by the court was necessary, to authorize a conveyance (Code Civ. Proc. § 1561), and to vest the title in the purchaser.

The cross complaint alleges that the sale was never confirmed by the court, but does not allege that the sale was reported to the court, and that confirmation was refused or the sale vacated. That there was a valid contract of sale between the executors and the purchaser, subject only to confirmation by the court, I think is clearly shown by the cross complaint; and one term or provision of that contract was supplied by the statute, viz. that they would report the sale to the court for confirmation. This court has said (In re Pearsons' Estate, 98 Cal. 603, 612, 33 Pac. 455): "The purchaser from an executor at a sale under a power in the will deals with him, in making the purchase, as he would with any other vendor. He makes the purchase subject to a confirmation by the court, but in all other respects he may incorporate in his contract of purchase the same terms and conditions as he would in dealing with any other agent for the sale of property, and he can repudiate his contract of purchase only for the same reasons as he could in case he had bought from another. * * * In this state it is essential that the will shall have been admitted to probate before the power can have any validity, but in all other respects the contract of purchase and sale between the executor and his vendee is attended with the same incidents, and is to receive the same construction, as a similar contract between any other vendor and vendee. Prior to 1861 a sale by an executor under a power in the will was valid, without any confirmation by the court. In that year the legislature amended the procedure so as to require that such sales should be confirmed by the probate court, the same as those made under its own order. The confirmation thus required is, however, for the protection of the estate, and for the purpose of determining whether the sale shall be confirmed. The scope of investigation by the court is limited to ascertaining whether the sale was legally made and fairly conducted, and the sum bid was not disproportionate to the value of the property sold, and that a sum exceeding such bid at least ten per cent., exclusive of the expenses of a new sale, cannot be obtained. Code Civ. Proc. § 1554. If any of these facts exist, the court is authorized to vacate the former sale. In re Durham's Estate, 49 Cal. 490. But, unless such facts are shown to the court, the court must make an order confirming the sale. Section 1554." In making this sale the executors exercised and exhausted their power to deal with the property, unless, upon reporting the sale to the court, confirmation of the sale was refused. It certainly cannot be true that executors acting under such a power may make a valid and unimpeachable contract of sale to appellant, refuse to report it to the court for confirmation, in violation of a duty imposed upon them by law, and, having put him in possession, and permitted him to make improvements to an amount nearly or quite equal to the value of the property at the time the contract of sale was made, invoke the powers of a court of equity to compel an accounting for the rents received, doubtless largely increased by the improvements made, and have a receiver appointed to collect and retain them, to be disposed of by some future order of the court. "He who seeks the appointment of a receiver must himself come into court with clean hands." High, Rec. § 7. The statute does not limit the time within which the executors may report the sale for confirmation. "The executor or administrator, after making any sale of real estate, must make a return of his proceedings to the court, which must be filed in the office of the clerk, at any time subsequent to the sale." Code Civ. Proc. § 1552. The duty and power to report the sale of said lot to the court for confirmation, therefore, remained and existed at the time this cross complaint was filed; and, as the fact that the sale had been made was called to the attention of the court by the allegations therein made by the executor, he might with propriety have been cited to discharge that duty by making such report. Until that is done, we see no ground upon which the executors can invoke the aid of a court of equity to compel an accounting, or to place the property in the hands of a receiver. I therefore advise that the order appointing a receiver be reversed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appointing a receiver is reversed.

MAYBERRY v. ALHAMBRA ADDITION
WATER CO. (L. A. 367.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 22, 1899.)
WATER COURSES—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION —ARTIFICIAL WATERS.

A contract made in 1860 between the owner of a cañon containing a natural stream and an adjoining landowner gave the landowner the right to use the "waters flowing in said glen" for irrigating his lands, and in consideration the water owner was given a right of way across the lands for an irrigating ditch, subject to the landowner's right to use for irrigation the waters flowing in the ditch, "or in any water ditch, flume, or aqueduct used, dug, or erected" on the land. In 1887 the water owner began to develop water artificially, and ever since has conducted it with the natural water over the landowner's premises, and he has acquiesced therein. Held, that the parties had put their own construction on the contract by their acts, and that the landowner had a right to use the waters developed artificially and turned into the stream.

In bank. For opinion in department, see 54 Pac. 530.

BEATTY, C. J. A rehearing of this cause was ordered after decision in department.

We refer to the department opinion for a statement of the facts to be considered, and we adopt its conclusions, except upon one point. With respect to the rights of the parties to the use of the water artificially developed by the defendant, we think the contract of 1860 (quoted in full in 88 Cal. 68, 25 Pac. 1101) requires a construction more favorable to the plaintiff than was placed upon it by the superior court and by the department. When Kewen and Wilson entered into that contract, the possibility of developing in the future water in addition to that then flowing in the cañada was one of the circumstances by which they were surrounded, and there is nothing in the terms of the contract to denote whether they did or did not take it into consideration. If, therefore, the defendant, by causing the water which it has developed to flow through the aqueduct which it maintains across the Kewen land, has brought such water within the literal terms of that clause of the contract which entitles the plaintiff to use on two days of the week "the water flowing in any water ditch, flume, or aqueduct used, dug, or erected by the parties of the first part," etc., we cannot see how the defendant can appeal to the circumstances surrounding the parties at the date of the contract to modify the natural construction of the language in which their intention is expressed. But, aside from this, the least that can be said of this provision of the contract is that it is ambiguous and doubtful. Such being the case, the practical construction placed upon it by the parties must control. It appears that the defendant, from the commencement of its development of water, in 1887, down to trial of this action, has been conducting all the water "flowing in the glen"—natural and artificial mingled together—through its pipe across plaintiff's land. It does not lie in defendant's mouth to say that it has been doing this without right, and its only right is derived from the contract of 1860. It has thus put its construction upon that contract, and, the plaintiff having acquiesced, it must be held that the parties have themselves determined that the defendant has the right under the contract to conduct the developed water across the plaintiff's land. If so, it follows that the plaintiff has the right to use it on two days of the week, so long as it is so conducted. If one stipulation of the contract applies to the flow artificially created, so must the others. We do not decide that the defendant is obliged to continue to conduct the developed water across the Kewen tract, but only that, so long as it claims and exercises the right to do so, the plaintiff can claim and exercise the reciprocal right to use the water as the contract provides. Nor are we to be understood as holding that the plaintiff is entitled to divert from defendant's pipes at any time more water than is reasonably necessary for the irrigation of that portion of the original Kewen tract of which he is the owner. He is not, in other words, to make a wanton diversion, to the injury of defendant without benefit to himself. The judgment and order of the superior court are reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the opinion of the department as herein modified.

LEAKE v. COLGAN, Controller.
(S. F. 1,949.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 21, 1899.)

STATUTE — TITLE — AMENDMENT—ABOLITION OF OFFICE—LATER ACT.

1. An act amending a statute creating an office, defining its powers and duties, fixing the salary, and making an appropriation to carry it into effect, may abolish the office after a certain date without specifically mentioning such object in its title, where it refers properly to the act amended, without violating Const. art. 4, § 24, declaring that an act shall embrace but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title.

2. Where an act amending an act creating an office abolishes such office after two years, a later act, passed by the same legislature, creating an auditing board for the commission created by the original act, does not continue the office beyond the two years, but only regulates its affairs during the remaining period of its existence.

In bank. Petition by Ed. E. Leake for mandamus to compel E. P. Colgan, controller, to draw warrant for salary. Denied.

Judson Brusie, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a writ of mandate asking that the controller be directed to draw his warrant in favor of petitioner as commissioner of public works for his salary for the month of March, 1899. In 1893 the legislature created the office of commissioner of public works, defining its duties and powers, and fixing the salary, and made an appropriation to carry the purposes of the act into effect. St. 1893, p. 345. In 1897 the legislature passed an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to create a commissioner of public works, defining his duties and powers, prescribing his compensation, and making appropriation,' approved March 24, 1893, relating to the office of the commissioner of public works." Section 2 of this act is as follows: "This act and the act creating a commissioner of public works, defining his duties and powers, prescribing his compensation and making appropriation, approved March 24, 1893, relating to the office of commissioner of public works, of which this act is amendatory, shall cease, terminate and be at an end on the first day of March, 1899, and the office of commissioner created hereunder and under said act approved March 24, 1893, and all officers and employees appointed by said commission, shall cease, and their employment thereafter shall be discontinued, and the state of California shall in no manner whatever be liable for the compensation of the commissioner, officers, or employees employed by him, or by said commission, after said date." St. 1897, p. 26. As to the meaning of this language there is not the least uncertainty. It is contended, however, that the subject-matter of this section is not embraced within the title of the act, and that it is therefore void under article 4, § 24, of the constitution, which declares that an act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title, and that it shall be void as to matters not so expressed. But the fixing of the term or tenure of office under an act such as this, or the abolition of the office, are all matters embraced within, and germane to, the subject of the original act, and they may find an expression in an amendatory act without specific mention of them in the title to such amendatory act. Such is the well-settled rule, based upon very obvious considerations. Reference need only be made to Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) p. 174, § 3; Suth. St. Const. § 97 et seq.

It is further argued that an act passed by the same legislature at a date later than the one under consideration shows a definite purpose to continue the office beyond the time expressed in the act for its determination. St. 1897, p. 171. By this last-mentioned act an auditing board for the commission of public works is created; but this amendatory act continued the office in existence for about two years, and there is nothing in the latter act to call for the conclusion that the legislature meant to do other than to regulate the affairs of the office during the remaining period of its existence. The application for a writ is denied.

et al. (L. A. 289.)

PUBLIC LANDS—MEXICAN GRANT—TITLE ACQUIRED ON CONFIRMATION.

The original owner of a Mexican land grant conveyed a right to open an irrigating ditch over the same. Before the recording of the conveyance and the opening of the ditch, he conveyed the grant, without reservation, to other parties, who petitioned for its confirmation. After the ditch was opened, a patent in confirmation was issued to the petitioners. Held, that they acquired the whole legal title under their patent, free of every servitude.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by the city of Los Angeles against A. E. Pomeroy and another. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

R. H. F. Variel and J. S. Chapman, for appellants. W. E. Dunn and Lee & Scott, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a suit to enjoin the defendants from interfering with a certain dam and ditch by means of which the plaintiff diverts water from the Los Angeles river for the use of its inhabitants and for domestic purposes. The dam and ditch in question are situated upon a part of the Providencia rancho, which belongs to the defendants, and the question is whether the city has the right to maintain them. The cause was tried in the superior court without a jury, the facts found in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment entered accordingly. The defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

The following is a general outline of the case presented by the record: The Los Angeles river flows through the city of Los Angeles, which has succeeded to the rights of the former pueblo in respect to the waters of the river. Above the city is the Los Feliz rancho, and above that the Providencia. The Providencia was granted by the Mexican authorities to Vicente de la Osa in 1843. In 1845 De la Osa made a grant, in the form usually employed at that time, to Maria Ignacia Verdugo de Feliz, her heirs and successors, of "the right to open a zanja over my said land, and to use of the water of the river to irrigate the lands of the potrero known as that of the Feliz, or place of San Jose, for fifty dollars, which he has received to his satisfaction," etc. This instrument appears to have been inscribed, according to the Mexican practice, in a book of public records,—an authenticated copy being delivered to the grantee,—but it was never recorded in the county records of Los Angeles until 1868. In the meantime, in 1849, De la Osa had granted and conveyed the Providencia, without reservation, to Alexander and Mellus, who in 1852 petitioned for a confirmation of the grant. Upon their petition the grant was confirmed, and in 1872 a patent was issued to them. By various mesne conveyances the defendants have acquired the title of Alexander and Mellus. The successors of Verdugo Feliz in the ownership of the Feliz rancho, and their tenants, are shown to have been in possession of an irrigating ditch as early as 1855, through which they diverted water from the river at or very near the point where the dam in controversy here is situated. How long before 1855, if at all, that old ditch had been opened and used, there is nothing to show. Nor is there anything, aside from a highly reasonable presumption, to show that it was opened in pursuance of the grant or license from De la Osa, above quoted. It is very satisfactorily proved, however, that from 1855 to 1868 the tenants of the Feliz rancho continually maintained their dam and ditch, and diverted a sufficient quantity of the waters of the river to irrigate so much of the potrero of the Feliz ranch as lay under the ditch. As to the extent of the potrero, the only evidence offered was that of plaintiff to the effect that it contained in all 500 acres, of which only 324 acres were under the ditch; i. e. so situated as to be irrigable from that source. There is no evidence as to the quantity of water required for the irrigation of those 324 acres.

In 1868 the successors of Verdugo Feliz conveyed the potrero of the Feliz, with its appurtenances, to Howard, but without any special mention of the ditch or any water right or easements in the Providencia. Later in the same year Howard granted, bargained, and sold to the Canal & Reservoir Company, a corporation, its successors and assigns, "the right and privilege to use that certain zanja, or irrigating ditch, or canal, through which water is taken from the river Los Angeles, and conveyed in and upon that portion of the Feliz ranch heretofore conveyed, * * * together with all the easements and rights thereto appertaining, and the right of way over and through said Feliz ranch, * * * as also the ranch Providencia, * * * always provided that the said party of the first part, his heirs, executors, or assigns, have, and do hereby especially reserve, the right to take and extract all the water from the said zanja or irrigating canal that is or may be necessary for the irrigation and domestic purposes, benefit, and uses of the said afore referred to portion of the Feliz ranch, at such time and in such manner and for such places as the said party of the first part, his heirs, executors, etc., may deem proper." Under this grant or license the Canal & Reservoir Company took charge and control of the ditch, enlarged and extended it, and conducted water to the city of Los Angeles until 1872, when they executed a lease of the entire canal to the city for a term of 30 months, with an option to the city to purchase within the term the leased property for a stipulated price. Under this lease the city took charge and control of the entire works, from the dam on the Providencia all the way down, and so remained until 1886. The city did not, however, avail itself of its option to purchase within the term of its lease, which expired in December, 1874, but remained in possession, without objection on the part of the Canal & Reservoir Company, and without paying rent,—no rent being reserved in the lease, or mentioned in any way, except the nominal sum of one dollar,—for the entire term of 30 months. In 1877, and from time to time, the city enlarged the capacity of the ditch so that it carried, in 1878, about 30 cubic feet per second,—equivalent to about 1,500 inches constant flow under 4-inch pressure. What the original capacity of the ditch was is quite uncertain. The superior court found, upon evidence that seems to me very shadowy and untrustworthy, that it was 15 cubic feet per second, and based its decree on that finding. I think 8 cubic feet per second, or 400 inches constant flow, would be nearer the mark; and that, indeed, is all that the plaintiff claims in its complaint. In 1878 the Canal & Reservoir Company conveyed to the city all that part of its ditch, etc., situated within the corporate limits of the city, but no change in the use or management of the ditch, or any part of it, took place in consequence of this conveyance. The city continued thereafter, as before, to use the whole line of ditch for the supply of water to its inhabitants without objection on the part of the Canal & Reservoir Company. About this time, however,—that is to say, in 1877 or in 1878,—the city abandoned the use of that part of the ditch situated on the Providencia ranch, and made a new diversion at a point lower down, where a pile dam was constructed for the purpose of turning the water into the new ditch. This change in the place of diversion continued until the year 1891,—a period of 13 or 14 years,—during which time that part of the old ditch situated on the Providencia ranch grew up with willows and weeds, and fell into a state of general dilapidation. The dam at the head and 600 or 800 feet of the upper end of the ditch were entirely obliterated.

Pending this change in the point of diversion—in the year 1886—the city entered into a contract with the Citizens' Water Company, a corporation, whereby that company agreed, in consideration of the use of 20 inches of the city's water, to convey through its pipes all the water required by the city for public purposes within the district covered by its system. As the water company, under this contract, drew its supply from the Canal & Reservoir Company's ditch, the city seems to have left to it the task and responsibility of keeping the ditch in order at all times, except when a large quantity of water was required for irrigation. Matters being in this posture in the winter of 1889–90, the water company found it impracticable to obtain a supply of water at the pile dam on account of the damage caused by an extraordinary freshet in the river, and proceeded to open a new ditch connecting with a new dam on the lower end of the Providencia rancho. At that date the title to this portion of the Providencia rancho derived from De la Osa through Alexander and Mellus was vested in the Providencia Company, a corporation, the immediate predecessor of the defendants, and the officers of that company promptly contested the right of the water company to open a ditch, or divert water on their land. The city authorities were notified of the controversy, but they seem to have given the matter no attention, and the result was that the water company and the Providencia Company agreed upon a modus vivendi pending the determination of their respective rights. The substance of their agreement was a permission by the Providencia Company to maintain the ditch and divert the water on its land as long as the water company continued to pay five dollars a day for the privilege; the arrangement being terminable upon 60 days' written notice by either party. In pursuance of this agreement the water company reopened the old ditch originally used by the tenants of the potrero of the Feliz from 1855 to 1868, as above stated, and made a diversion of water by means of a dam located at or very near the site of the original dam, the only material difference being that the ditch was enlarged, and a much greater quantity of water diverted. Pending this arrangement, the defendants purchased the Providencia rancho, and thereafter permitted the diversion of the water under the agreement until August, 1893, when it was terminated by written notice from the water company. Upon the termination of the agreement and the refusal of the water company or the city to make any further payment thereunder, the defendants turned the water from the ditch back into the natural channel of the river by opening a gate therein just below the dam. Thereupon this action was commenced, in which the superior court has found that the city has a right to maintain its dam and a ditch with a capacity of 15 cubic feet per second—equivalent to 750 inches constant flow—on the lands of the defendants, and has enjoined them from obstructing or interfering with the city in the exercise of such rights.

The defendants, in support of their appeal from the order denying their motion for a new trial, contend that the findings of the superior court are contrary to the evidence, and the specific question to be determined is whether the city has proved a title by grant or prescription to the easement which it claims in the Providencia rancho. The right of the city to so much of the water flowing in the river at any point above the city limits as it may require for public purposes or for the use of its inhabitants is established by the decision in the case of City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy (L. A. No. 419) 57 Pac. 585, recently decided; but this right in the waters of the river does not include the right to maintain dams or ditches upon the lands of upper riparian proprietors for the purpose of effecting a diversion of the water, and to maintain this action the city, like any other litigant, must show a good title to the easement which it claims. In this case there seems to have been an attempt on the part of the city to assert a prescriptive title founded upon adverse user of the ditch and dam in question, but this claim was disallowed by the superior court upon the unquestionable ground that the complete disuse of the old dam and all that part of the ditch within the boundaries of the Providencia rancho from 1878 to 1890 extinguished any servitude that might otherwise have existed. Civ. Code, § 811, subd. 4. The only other claim of title which the city can make is through the deed of 1845 from De la Osa to Verdugo Feliz, granting the right to divert water on the Providencia rancho sufficient to irrigate the potrero of the Feliz rancho. Unless the city has deraigned a good title from that source, the findings of the superior court cannot be sustained. In my opinion, there is more than one fatal defect in this title. In the first place, De la Osa granted only the right to a ditch and flow of water sufficient for the irrigation of the potrero of the Feliz, and, conceding that this right was vested in Howard at the date of his conveyance to the Canal & Reservoir Company, in 1868, he, by that conveyance, reserved it all to himself, so that nothing could have passed to the Canal & Reservoir Company except such rights over and above that granted by De la Osa as Howard and his predecessors may have acquired by adverse user; and all such rights, it is conceded, have been lost to the city by cesser of the use. This, however, is not conclusive of the controversy here, for if the city, as successor of the Canal & Reservoir Company, has the right to maintain the ditch and dam, it does not concern the defendants what may be the respective rights of the city and the successors of Howard in the potrero of the Feliz to the use of the water lawfully diverted. To conclude the city on this point it would therefore be necessary to decide in favor of the defendants the much-debated question as to the character of the city's tenancy under the lease from the Canal & Reservoir Company, and whether it is still subsisting. In view of our conclusions upon the point next to be considered we find it unnecessary to determine this question.

The grant from De la Osa, under which the city claims, was made in 1845. In 1849 he conveyed the whole rancho, without reservation, to Alexander and Mellus, who subsequently petitioned for its confirmation. It was confirmed and patented to them, without reservation, in 1872. The title thus conveyed to them did not inure to any person claiming under a grant from the original grantee. As against Verdugo Feliz and her successors, Alexander and Mellus acquired the whole legal title to the rancho free of every sort of servitude. At most she and her successors had an equity, which, so far as appears, has never been established or asserted, and has certainly not been alleged or proven in this action. The authorities supporting this view are numerous and uniform. See McDonald v. McCoy, 121 Cal. 55, 53 Pac. 421, and authorities cited at pages 66, 67, 121 Cal., and page 424, 53 Pac.; Hartley v. Brown, 46 Cal. 202, and authorities there cited. The title of the city to the easement claimed therefore wholly fails, and for this reason the order and judgment of the superior court must be reversed. It would also be necessary to reverse the order appealed from upon the ground that there is no evidence that it would require 15 cubic feet per second to irrigate the potrero of the Feliz. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and cause remanded.

SAN DIEGO COUNTY v. RIVERSIDE
COUNTY. (L. A. 391.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 28, 1899.)

COUNTIES—CLAIMS AGAINST—DEMAND — COM-PLAINT — SUFFICIENCY—TAXATION—APPOR-TIONMENT—LIEN FOR TAXES ON RAILROAD—
WHEN ATTACHES.

1. St. 1893, p. 364, §§ 43, 44, providing for the allowance of claims against a county, or such portions thereof as may be found justly due, and for a second application on dissatisfaction of claimant, and for suit against the county on rejection of claim, do not apply where the entire claim has been rejected on the first demand; and where defendant county, created out of territory part of which belonged to plaintiff county, received more than its amount of delinquent taxes belonging to plaintiff before the creation of defendant, according to a ratio established as the basis of division of the assets of plaintiff, one presentation of plaintiff's claim before commencing suit is sufficient.

2. In an action by plaintiff county against defendant county, created out of territory part of which belonged to plaintiff, to recover money received by defendant as delinquent taxes beyond its apportionable amount according to a ratio established as the basis of division of the net assets of plaintiff at the time of the creation of defendant, where the complaint alleges that the taxes in question had been delinquent for a long period, owing to a question as to the validity of the assessments, and that the state board of equalization had made reassessments which were accepted by the county and the railroad company, it is sufficient to show a lawful reassessment as against a general demurrer, though there is no direct allegation that the first assessments were invalid.

3. Under Const. art. 13, § 10, providing that the franchise and roadway of all railroads operated in more than one county shall be assessed by the state board of equalization at their actual value, and the same shall be apportioned to the counties and cities in which such railroads are situate in proportion to the number of miles of railway in such counties and cities, the state board of equalization, in making a reassessment to take the place of an invalid assessment, are required to make their apportionment to the counties as they existed at the time of the invalid assessment, and not as they existed at the time of reassessment.

4. The lien for taxes on the property of a railroad company is not created by the assessment, but attaches on the first Monday of March in each year; and, after assessment has been made, and the amount of taxes ascertained, it is payable to the county in which the roadbed was included at the time the lien attached.

5. In an action by one county against another to recover a sum of money received by defendant county as taxes on a railroad beyond its apportionable amount, errors in the complaint as to the number of miles of railway on which defendant received taxes, making the complaint ambiguous, are not reached by a general demurrer.

In bank. Affirmed.

For opinion in department, see 55 Pac. 7.

BEATTY, C. J. This action was commenced in the county of Los Angeles to recover certain moneys claimed to have been received by the defendant to the use of plaintiff. Defendant demurred to the complaint upon the grounds of absence of jurisdiction and want of facts. The superior court overruled the demurrer, and, defendant declining to answer, entered judgment for the plaintiff, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

If the facts alleged in the complaint constitute a cause of action, there appears to be no ground upon which the jurisdiction of the court can be successfully assailed. It appears from the complaint, among other things, that the county of Riverside was created by an act of the legislature approved March 11, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 158), out of territory formerly belonging, part to the county of San Diego and part to the county of San Bernardino, and that commissioners were appointed in pursuance of the provisions of said act to settle and adjust the mutual claims and obligations of the counties of Riverside and San Diego with respect to the property and existing indebtedness of the latter county; that said commissioners duly organized, and afterwards made their award, by which it was determined, among other things, that Riverside county should pay to San Diego county the sum of $2,782.86, and that the net assets of San Diego county, as the same stood at the date of the act creating Riverside county, should be divided between the two counties as follows: 61,087 parts out of 71,087 parts to San Diego county, and the remaining 10,000 parts to Riverside county. This ratio of division was subsequently ratified and accepted by the respective boards of supervisors of the two counties, and partly carried out. Before the creation of Riverside county, there were 158.85 miles of railway belonging to the Southern Pacific Company within the county of San Diego upon which the taxes were delinquent for the years 1880 to 1887, inclusive, no part of which taxes were paid until after reassessment in pursuance of the act of March 23, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 290). The taxes of 1880 to 1885, inclusive, were paid by the railroad company in 1893, and were considered and included in the award of the commissioners, and divided by the supervisors of the respective counties according to the ratio above stated. But the taxes for the years 1886 and 1887 were not then paid, and were not considered, or in any manner adjusted, by said board of commissioners, or by said boards of supervisors. In August, 1894, and subsequent to the award of said commissioners, the taxes of 1886 and 1887 still remaining unpaid, the state board of equalization, in pursuance of said act of March 23, 1893, made reassessments of said 158.85 miles of railway for the years 1886 and 1887, but, instead of apportioning and certifying the whole of said assessments to the county of San Diego, as they should have done, they apportioned and certified the assessments upon 71.06 miles to the county of Riverside, that being the number of miles within the territory transferred from the former to the latter county by the act of March 11, 1893. These reassessments were thereafter entered upon the tax rolls of the respective counties according to the erroneous apportionment of the state board of equalization, and the taxes were paid by the state treasurer (by whom they were collected from the railroad company) to the treasurers of the respective counties, according to the same erroneous apportionment, the result being that, out of the whole amount paid, the county of Riverside received $7,969.65 more, and San Diego that amount less, than they would have received if the whole amount of said delinquent taxes had been divided according to the ratio established by the commissioners and accepted by the respective boards of supervisors as the basis of division of the net assets of San Diego county. The county of San Diego accordingly made due demand upon the county of Riverside for said sum, and, payment being refused, brought this action, in which judgment is rendered in its favor for the amount so demanded, with legal interest. Appellant contends, upon several grounds, that this judgment is not sustained by the allegations of the complaint.

1. It is contended that one presentation, only, of plaintiff's claim, before commencing suit, was insufficient, in view of the construction placed upon sections 43 and 44 of the county government act (St. 1893, p. 364) in Arbios v. County of San Bernardino, 110 Cal. 553, 42 Pac. 914. But neither that decision nor the law construed has any application to a case in which the entire claim has been rejected on the first demand for allowance, which was the case here.

2. It is contended that the county of San Diego can have no claim against San Bernardino county for any of the moneys here in question, because the facts alleged do not constitute a legal basis for a reassessment, and, consequently, that there was no legal obligation upon the part of the railroad company to pay them, or any part of them, to San Diego county. The particular point of this objection is that it is nowhere alleged in the complaint that the original assessments for 1886 and 1887 had been adjudged invalid, or that they were invalid in fact, whereas such adjudication or such actual invalidity was a necessary condition precedent to a reassessment. It is true that under the act of March 23, 1893, no reassessment was authorized, except in case of an invalid assessment; and it is true that there is in this complaint no direct allegation that the railroad assessments for the years 1886 and 1887 were invalid. It does appear, however, that the taxes for those years had been delinquent for a long period, owing to a question as to the validity of the assessments, and that the state board of equalization had made reassessments which were accepted and acted upon by the county and by the railroad company by payment and receipt of the taxes levied thereon. As against a general demurrer, I think these allegations sufficient to show a lawful reassessment and rightful claim on the part of San Diego to any taxes justly apportionable to that county.

3. It is contended that, if the state board of equalization had the power to make these reassessments, they were required, by section 10 of article 13 of the constitution, to make the apportionment to Riverside county, as they did make it. That section provides that "the franchise, roadway, * * * of all railroads operated in more than one county in this state shall be assessed by the state board of equalization at their actual value, and the same shall be apportioned to the counties, cities, * * * in which such railroads are situated in proportion to the number of miles of railway laid in such counties, cities," etc. Under this provision of the constitution, the state board of equalization, making a reassessment in 1894 to take the place of an invalid assessment for the year 1886 or 1887, were required to make their apportionment to the counties as they existed in 1886 or 1887, not as they existed in 1894.

4. It is contended that, if the original assessments for 1886 and 1887 were invalid, then there was no valid lien for the taxes until the reassessment in 1894, and that, Riverside county having been created in the meantime, the taxes on that portion of the railroad within Riverside county accrued to and were payable to it. But the assessment does not create the lien. It is merely one of the steps for its enforcement. The lien for the taxes justly leviable upon the property of a railroad company attaches on the first Monday of March in each year, and the obligation to pay necessarily accrues at the same time, if not earlier. Payment is not due, of course, until the assessment has been made; but when that has been done, and the amount of the tax ascertained, it is payable to the county in which the roadbed was included at the time when the lien attached.

5. There is an evident mistake in the complaint where it is alleged that the money paid to Riverside county was the tax upon 92.60 miles of railway. Taking all the allegations of the complaint together, it clearly appears that in the territory transferred from San Diego county to Riverside there were 71.06 miles of road, and in the territory transferred from San Bernardino county there were 21.54 miles, making in all 92.60 miles. These figures have been used in two places instead of the correct figures 71.06, but by computation from the figures given in the complaint it is readily shown that the tax levy in San Diego county for 1886 was $1.14 upon $100, and that the sum paid to Riverside county for that year was the exact amount of the tax on 71.06 miles of road. In the same way it will appear that the payment on the reassessment for 1887 was also the tax on 71.06 miles. These errors in the complaint made it, to some extent, ambiguous, but they are not reached by a general demurrer.
